In answer to the question put to him by the Political Service of KEYHAN, Zabol representative Hosseyni said: "The government has two most important tasks to perform. First, it must turn its attention to internal situation and move towards repairing the damages done to the country. These are topped by the condition of the poor and the creating of jobs for the unemployed. Second, it must put the country's foreign policy in order so that our Islamic revolution could better be reflected abroad and the Islamic Republic be able to fulfill its mission." Regarding the role played by the government in the economy, he said that the stagnant economy must be revived on an Islamic basis, free from exploitation, until the country becomes self-sufficient. With sufficient effort we even can export our products on an international level. Regarding agriculture, he said that because of the geographical conditions Iran had great potential for agricultural development. What is needed, he said, was a thorough study of various aspects and a proper use of the needed manpower. He said the country was ready for this and all that was now needed was organization and proper planning. In conclusion, he referred to problems in the border areas, saying that the government bore a heavy responsibility with regards to fortifications in these areas. He said that because of the strategic importance of the nation's frontiers the problem of border security was of utmost importance which deserved priority over some domestic issues.

Fortunately, he said, the Majles is considering this problem and has drafted and submitted a bill for immediate debate calling for construction of roads in border areas which will be sent to officials for action following its approval.

FUNDAMENTALISTS UNABLE TO VISIT MECCA--Tehran, 11 Oct (KUNA)--Iranian Moslem Fundamentalists who are still fully determined to export their Islamic revolution to neighbouring Moslem countries would not be able to 'exhibit' their revolution at the annual pilgrimage in Mecca this year. The export plans were foiled due to the Iran-Iraq conflict and after Tehran expressed its inability to send Iranians for Haj by the land route. About one thousand Iranian pilgrims who left for Mecca before the war are being called back by the Iranian Government to take part in the 'holy war,' Iranian officials said today. Iranian Moslem Fundamentalists were making brisk preparations for the effective propagation of Islamic revolution among the Moslem pilgrims gathering from all over the world in Saudi Arabia. Influential religious leader Ayatollah Hosein Ali Montazeri in a statement issued only two days before the war had called on all Iranian pilgrims to make themselves ready for exporting Islamic revolution at the international gathering in the 'House of God' in the holy city of Mecca. NATIONAL ASSEMBLY ELECTIONS, FOREIGN POLICY DISCUSSED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 4 Jul 80 pp 24-25

[Article: "What Are Resolutions Which Will Be Given Quality of 'Popular Legitimacy' by National Council; Iraqi-Syrian Political, Financial, Oil and Commercial Relations Are Normal; Baghdad Considers Its National Security to Include Gulf and Opposes 'Written' Agreements With United States"]

[Text] Two prominent and serious events coincided with the elections for the Iraqi National Council which took place in the middle of last month: The first was the attempt to storm the British Embassy in Baghdad and the second has been the military clashes on the Iraqi-Iranian borders which escalated before, during and after the elections. Iraq has accused the "Persian regime" of spurring these clashes.

Though the Iraqis no longer classify the clashes on their borders with Iran as surprises because such clashes have become a daily occurrence, they have dealt with the embassy incident which took place on the eve of the elections (the first incident of its kind since the monarchy was overthrown in 1958) as a serious matter aimed at diverting the media attention from the elections, not to say aimed at foiling and derailing the elections, as an Iraqi official source has stated. This is why quick and decisive action was taken to put an immediate end to the operation.

The National Council elections have given Iraq the first representative legislative parliament which includes 250 members representing Iraq's various governorates and citizens who amount to nearly 13.5 million people and of whom more than 6 million were called to take part in the elections. The voters did come to the polls in large numbers which were noticed by the hundreds of journalists from various countries who had responded to the invitation of the Iraqi Ministry of Information to cover the news of the elections which took place in one day from the northernmost to the southernmost part of the country, including the Kurdish self-rule areas which consist of the three governorates of Irbil, al-Sulaymaniyah and al-Huk [presumably meaning Dahuk].

The outcome of the elections has not been surprising, whether in terms of voters or of winning candidates, most of whom are members of the ruling party. The Iraqi official departments have asserted that "only a very small number out of the 6 million Iraqis of age 18 and above who are entitled to vote in accordance with the National Council law issued by the Revolution Command Council more than 3 months ago have failed to vote."

The fundamental observation concerns the qualitative "victory" scored by the Iraqi women whose right to vote and to be elected has been guaranteed for the first time by the law. Women have exercised this right strongly and have elected to the parliament 17 out of a total of 19 women who have run for election in the various governorates. Manal Yunis, the chairman of the Iraqi Women's Federation, is one of the most prominent women elected.

Election winners include four Revolution Command Council members, led by Na'im Haddad who may be elected council speaker. In the self-rule area, where elections will be held shortly to elect members of the area's special legislative council, 'Ubaydallah Barzani, the son of the late Kurdish leader Mulla Mustafa Barzani, and Bakr Rasul, a Kurdish notable, have won the elections. These two have run for election against 'Aziz and Hashim 'Aqrawi (the latter a minister of state) who are also Kurdish. The elections have also brought to the new council Sa'd Qasim Hammudi, the former minister of information and the current chief editor of AL-THAWRAH. Prominent media people elected to the new council also include Taha Yasin, the undersecretary of the Ministry of Information and Culture.

Even though the officials are eager not to differentiate and make distinctions between Ba'thist and independent and even though they have been asserting that the candidates came from the various political inclinations, excluding "the revolution's enemies," the certain fact is that the overwhelming majority of the 250-member council belongs to the ruling Ba'th Party and represents at the same time the various popular groups, such as the Peasants Federation. Five of the members of this federation's leadership have won seats in the new parliament, exactly as representatives of the workers, some retired military men and other personalities representing various sectors organized in labor unions have won.

In terms of organization and of the goals for which it has been established, the Iraqi National Council is not different from any other parliament in the world. Its basic task is that of legislation, but in participation with the Revolution Command Council, and of watchdog over the state establishments. This council is founded on a number of fundamental and general principles that are similar to those of most [parliamentary] councils in other countries.

Article 53 of the law in accordance with which the National Council has been founded states that "the National Council shall be summoned to convene by a republican decree within a period of no more than 15 days after announcement of the election results." This announcement was actually made on the day following the elections, i.e. on the 21st of last June.

However, the general impression among the Iraqi officials is that the preparations for the revolution celebrations which begin on the 17th of this month will delay convocation of the council's session for a few days to make it coincide with the start of the celebrations.

It is certain that Iraqi President Saddam Husayn will take the opportunity of the opening session, which will be headed by the most senior member, to deliver a speech in which he will focus on the importance of this "phased step" that has been made at the level of "building the Iraqi-style democracy." The general impression is that the Iraqi president will outline in his speech the major tasks of the council during its term which has been set by the law at 4 years.

Observers in the Iraqi capital say that the significance of the council's task in the coming phase should not be underestimated at the Iraqi and Arab levels. These observers point out in this regard a number of important factors that have urged the Iraqi authority to speed up the formation of this council. One of these factors is the desire to give the quality of "popular legitimacy" to some of the domestic and external political resolutions expected to be made through having the council take part in preparing and announcing these resolutions.

AL-HAWADITH has learned from some well-informed circles in the Iraqi capital that the Revolution Council's permission to a number of its prominent members to run for election and the subsequent victory of these members has been meant to introduce strong elements to the centers of guidance and influence in the assembly's work and to give moral significance to any resolution this assembly adopts, especially since it has become almost certain that the assembly speakership, deputy speakership and secretariat will belong to these strong elements. It is true that there will be no "opposition" or "support" in the western (and Lebanese) sense insofar as the council's internal structure is concerned. However, the eagerness to secure consensus for the required resolutions, be they of a domestic or external nature, is a big concern.

At the foreign policy level, the positions which the assembly can help to crystallize are numerous, especially in regard to the relations with Syria, the Arab Gulf states, the Soviet Union and the United States, as well as Iraq's Lebanese, Palestinian and other policies.

Jasim 'Ulwan, the minister of state for foreign affairs, describes the Baghdad-Damascus pan-Arab relations as normal. Despite the tension arising as a result of incidents of infiltration on the borders between the two countries and despite the lukewarm bilateral political relations, the economic relations and Iraq's financial commitments toward Syria emanating from the Baghdad summit have not been at all affected because Iraq is paying its share of these commitments on schedule. Moreover, oil is still flowing to Baniyas. The commercial relations have suffered no ill effects whatsoever by evidence of the fact that Syrian goods were present in the Baghdad fair which was held a few months ago.

Insofar as Lebanon is concerned, the Iraqi policy is summed up in supporting any step decided upon by the legitimate authority and the government to end the Lebanese problem. It seems that the Iraqi officials are enthusiastic for the detente efforts being exerted by President Sarkis and the government. However, they consider the Lebanese issue a part of the game of the major powers "and the Lebanese must make the first step to pave the way for a solution because it is difficult to impose any solution to the Lebanese problem from abroad." Even though these officials acknowledge that the Lebanese issue is tied to the Middle East issue, they do not encourage putting a stress on this point because such stress is not in Lebanon's interest.

During his meeting with the Lebanese journalists, the Iraqi minister of state for foreign affairs gave the impression that there is a kind of frost in the relations between Beirut and Baghdad when he said that direct contacts with Fu'ad Butrus, the Lebanese minister of foreign affairs, are almost nonexistent and that the only remaining channel of communication is the Lebanese Embassy in Baghdad. However, most of the Iraqi officials deny that there is a problem behind the delay in appointing a new Iraqi ambassador to Lebanon to replace the former ambassador who was wounded in an assassination attempt, returned to Baghdad for treatment and stayed in Baghdad after being appointed head of the Tourism Organization. The officials attribute this delay to a major factor, namely "the qualifications that any Iraqi ambassador to Lebanon must have," according to the words of an official Iraqi source.

The Iraqis are fighting the Iranian tide on two fronts: A military front all along their borders with Iran and a political front whose arena is the Arab Gulf states, especially Bahrain. The Iraqi officials do not conceal their support for Bahrain in the face of the Iranian threats on the basis of a principle which they stress, namely that any threat to the security of any Gulf state constitutes a direct threat to Iraq's national security.

The coordination attempts made with the Sultanate of Oman and embodied in the visit paid to Baghdad by the Omani minister of state for foreign affairs in the wake of the reports about Omani military "facilities" for the Americans can be viewed within this framework. The Iraqis say that they have expressed to Qasim al-Zawawi [Omani minister of state for foreign affairs] their strong opposition to any agreement between Oman and Washington in this regard and have said that if what is meant by the word "facilities" is "friendly visits" by some units of the U.S. navy to the Omani ports, then that is normal. But to have written and binding agreements concluded would constitute something that Baghdad rejects absolutely, especially since Baghdad is the advocate of the call for keeping the Arab world, particularly the Gulf, neutral in the struggle between the two superpowers.

In the Iraqi-Palestinian relations, Baghdad is inclined to disengage itself from some factions and organizations and to strengthen its ties with the PLO in its capacity as the vessel that contains the various currents.

It is within this perspective that closure of the offices of the Popular Front and of the Democratic Front in Baghdad can be interpreted. An Iraqi official has said that the disagreement with the Popular Front came to the forefront after the emergence of "special assessments in the front insofar as the situation in Iraq is concerned."

As for the United States, the Iraqi officials deny that any efforts are being exerted on their part to resume the two countries' diplomatic relations that were severed in 1967. However, these officials admit that the U.S. efforts in this regard are continuing, either directly through the U.S. Relations Branch in Baghdad or indirectly through some delegations friendly to the United States that have visited Iraq in recent times.

Minister 'Ulwan has said: Resumption of the relations with the United States can constitute a means to serve our national interest. However, our position in this regard is a principled pan-Arab [qawmi] position that has existed since the 1967 war and caused by the U.S. position of support for Israel. Our position cannot change unless the U.S. position changes.

On the Soviet side, the officials describe the relations as having returned to normal after being lukewarm because of the Iraqi position toward the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan. The tepidity was eliminated as a result of the Kremlin leaders' understanding of the explanations on the Iraqi position regarding Afghanistan. The visit made by the Iraqi minister of industry to the Soviet capital (at the head of the committee overseeing the good progress of the Soviet-Iraqi friendship treaty) has contributed to this understanding.

But what about the impact of the presence of the new assembly on the country's ministerial and administrative structures?

It is evident that the success of a number of ministers, Revolution Command Council members, ministers of state, directors and others in the elections will bring about an inevitable change at these levels. It is expected that the assembly's opening session and the conclusion of the 17-30 July anniversary celebrations will be followed by important ministerial and administrative changes affecting a number of the main ministerial portfolios and major administrative posts.

However, the presidential system will remain the same and there will be no prime minister. This can be concluded not only from the officials themselves but also from the National Assembly law which puts the power of determining the fate of ministers in the hands of the president of the republic and of the Revolution Command Council solely. The assembly can withdraw its confidence in one minister only but necessarily in the ministers and the cabinet.

LARGE HOUSING PROJECTS PLANNED

Baghdad AL-THAWRAH in Arabic 11 Jun 80 p 7

[Article by Ra'd 'Abd-al-Jabbar: "Start of Seminar on Public Housing in Iraq; Construction of 1.38 Million Housing Units by Year 2000"]

[Text] Muhammad Fadl Husayn, the minister of housing and reconstruction, opened yesterday morning at al-Mansur Hotel hall the study seminar for familiarization with the Iraqi public housing plan. The seminar is organized by the Public Housing Organization.

At the outset of the seminar, the minister delivered an address in which he welcomed participants in the study seminar on the Iraqi housing plan. The housing sector gains its importance from the fact that it is connected with and affects the daily life of the citizens and that it influences society's movement and development.

The minister underlined the special attention given to the housing sector by the party and revolution leadership, headed by leader and President Saddam Husayn, through the leadership's adoption of and reliance on programmed scientific planning that seeks to secure proper housing for every citizen so that he may take part in strengthening society. This planning also seeks to secure happiness and reassurance for every citizen and his family. This goal is the cornerstone in the housing policy which the party and revolution leadership has decided to adopt.

The minister also underlined the inclination of the Ministry of Housing and Reconstruction, represented by the Public Housing Organization, toward conducting complete studies to determine the country's housing needs until the year 2000.

He said that the volume of work awaiting us is embodied in the construction of 1.38 million new housing units of various kinds, in addition to improving and carrying out maintenance work for nearly 355,000 already existing housing units, in the next 20 years, and preserving the existing housing asset which represents a national wealth that must be preserved and developed.

He said that the support and care which the leader president gives this issue through his daily instructions and through his awareness of the problem and of the hardship that the masses suffer from it--an awareness developed as a result of his on-the-spot visits--give us absolute confidence that we will solve this problem ahead of schedule.

Engineer 'Abd-al-Muttalib al-'Uraybi, the chairman of the Public Housing Organization, then delivered an address in which he underlined the importance of this seminar for familiarization with the contents of the studies and programs included in the plan--a seminar aimed at deeper understanding of the contents of the plan and a deeper discussion of its various aspects, especially since the talk about housing has become an issue that concerns all the citizens of all walks of life because of the impact of housing on their daily lifestyle, on the future of their life and on the citizen's role in society's general development movement.

The participants were then familiarized with a model of the general housing plan which the Public Organization has set up in the meetings hall of al-Mansur Hotel.

The three-day seminar will discuss the research and studies presented by the participants and will also discuss the general housing plan in the country until the year 2000.

Representatives of Morocco, Tunisia and Jordan and of a number of international firms specialized in housing affairs are taking part in the seminar, in addition to a number of the officials concerned in the country's various ministries.

FRENCH RAILROAD EQUIPMENT--The French railroad industry has recently won two big overseas contracts in Iraq and Brazil after a very active year in 1979 when the [French] export sales realized an increase of 40 percent to reach 2.2 billion French francs (330 million dollars). The two contracts have been concluded with the French consortium of (Francorail) which includes five French industrial firms. These two contracts have come shortly after this French industry won a deal to supply 340 railroad cars to East Germany and 60 cars to the Netherlands and Costa Rica. The Iraqi agreement provides for supplying 72 electrical diesel locomotives with a total value of 556 million francs for the five partners in the Francorail group. This is considered the biggest contract for French diesel locomotives even though 23 percent of the contract's value will go to the U.S. (Elco) Company which will supply the engines. The Brazilian contract, valued at 300 million dollars, has been awarded to a group of European firms led by Francorail. The contract provides for supplying 600 kilometers of railroad lines to the Brazilian railroad network, as well as supplying this network with 60 electrical trains. EDITORIAL DENOUNCING QADHDHAFI QUOTED

LD111202 Kuwait KUNA in English 1038 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Kuwait, 11 Oct (KUNA)--ARAB TIMES on al-Qadhdhafi and the Iranian-Iraqi war:

"The Arab world, and the Gulf states in particular, have found memories of al-Qadhdhafi's lead in denouncing the shah's seizure of the three Gulf islands. He had then not only broken off relations with Iran, but also sequestrated the assets of the British Petroleum in Libya, because he genuinely believed that there was British complicity behind the shah's action.

"When the Islamic revolution came to power, the Libyan-Iranian relations did not improve as hoped for by both sides because of the Musa as-Sadr affair, and also the declaration by the revolutionary regime that it will not return the islands to the Arab fold as one of the measures of undoing the wrongs committed by the shah. Only after forceful PLO intervention, Tehran and Tripoli had established diplomatic relations early this year.

"Therefore, if Iraq is now fighting a war for the defence of Arab rights, including the recovery of the Gulf islands, then Libya (?should) be among the first and the most vociferous and active supporters of the Iraqi campaign.

"Libya has broken the age-old and time-tested--but unwritten--convention that the Arab world is one when any of its members is locked in an armed battle against a non-Arab country. No independent Arab nation has ever actively supported a non-Arab country in its armed war against an Arab country. Col al-Qadhdhafi thus takes the dubious credit for making a deplorable beginning in this direction."

PHALANGISTS REPORTEDLY USE GAS WARFARE, PALESTINIAN FORCES TO UNITE

LD071515 Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 3 Oct 80 p 16

[Untitled report on London MIDDLE EAST magazine article]

[Excerpt] The PLO permanent observer at the United Nations Zuhdi Tarazi said that he was reprimanded by PLO Executive Committee Chairman Yasir 'Arafat for his failure to coordinate with his colleagues, the Arab ambassadors to the world organization, during the recent General Assembly meeting on the Palestine problem.

Tarazi's behavior has angered the Arab ambassadors because he submitted a draft resolution to the General Assembly in cooperation with Third World ambassadors without consulting the Arab delegates and one of the Arab ambassadors personally complained to 'Arafat.

Regarding the question of chemical warfare which is currently being raised in the Western capitals, reports from Beirut said that the Phalangist party militia used a chemical gas that causes total paralysis for several minutes, during its clashes 2 months ago with Camille Shamun's National Liberal Party militia.

Palestinian sources said that the PLO feels concerned over these reports because of the military buildup by the Phalangist militia against the Palestinians in Lebanon.

Meanwhile, reports spoke about talks currently taking place in order to merge the al-'Asifah forces, the military wing of the Fatah movement, and the Palestine Liberatory Army under one single command within a single structure. This question as well as the question of uniting all the Palestinian resistance forces will be discussed at the coming Palestine National Council meeting.

ISRAELI ARMY MAGAZINE ON PLO MANPOWER PROBLEMS IN LEBANON

[Unattributed report: "PLO Facing Manpower Shortage in Lebanon"]

[Text] "The PLO is in distress in the area of manpower recruitment for its forces, which are dwindling as a result of battles with rival forces in Lebanon and in the wake of the constant military pressure the IDF is exerting in that country." This is reported in this week's edition of BAMAHANE, in the framework of a series of articles, by Hayim Raviv, on the Palestinians' institutionalization in Lebanon.

The PLO's manpower problem in Lebanon has become so acute that the organization's leader, Yasir 'Arafat, found it necessary to intervene personally to solve it. In his recent trip to several Arab countries, 'Arafat tried to get their leaders to help him to introduce compulsory mobilization among the Palestinians residing in their countries; however, the heads of these countries showed no tendency to accede to his request.

The PLO's manpower shortage was also recently reflected in 'Arafat's call to the Palestinian students in Europe to enlist for a half-year in the ranks of the terrorist organizations. In Lebanon itself the PLO has set up a bureau for the registration of student recruitees, but the response appears to be miniscule, with the young persons who do enlist in the PLO doing so in order to finance their studies in the Arab University of Beirut.

OFFICIAL DISCUSSES ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Jiddah AL-MADINAH in Arabic 20 Jul 80 p 19

[Interview with 'Ali Fadil, Deputy Minister of Justice, by Kamil Hazir; "Judiciary System in Aden Not Marxist; Islamic Shari'a One of Sources of Legislation; There Are Now in Aden 90 Courts, 10 Lawyers and 3 Female Judges"]

[Text] Aden--Before independence, the judiciary system in Aden was foreign or, to put it more accurately, British and Indian. Litigations, sentences and everything in the judiciary system from A to Z was in English. Appeals, if ever anybody thought of appealing a sentence issued against him, had to be made in India and then in Kenya. The Democratic Yemen was subject to laws which Britain called the "Aden laws" and which the British drew up for [sic] themselves and then abolished them after applying them for 100 years.

'Ali Fadil, the deputy minister of justice and of Islamic awqaf, has talked to us about the post-independence period and the laws issued during this period and about the difficult confrontation Aden faced in the wake of its independence in its search for a purely South Yemeni judiciary system.

The first law issued--the public prosecution law--came in 1973 and was followed by the family law in 1974 and the penal code in 1976. Lower courts have spread throughout the districts and the governorates and have reached nearly 90 courts in number, in addition to the governorate courts and the republic's Supreme Court which is considered the highest step in the judiciary system.

What is the role of the Islamic Shari'a in this regard? Fadil says it is one of the sources used, especially in matters concerning personal status and the family. The deputy minister, who spent years studying the Islamic Shari'a in Medina and in al-Azhar, has also said that the Islamic Shari'a is a complete system that prevents monopoly, tyranny and oppression. Following is the text of the interview:

[Question] Let us first talk about the path that the judiciary system in the Democratic Yemen has followed to reach its present legal form?

[Answer] Before independence, we did not have judiciary in the conventional sense. In the days of the British colonialism, Yemen was divided into 24 emirates or shaykhdoms in which the free system prevailed. Meanwhile, the Shafi'i rite dealt with cases concerning personal status or what is called the family. There was no complete judiciary system and the matter was confined to a number of courts present in the emirate of Aden, in addition to the Aden Higher Court. Appeals litigation took place in India when Aden was attached to the colonialist administration present in India. After India's independence, appeals on major cases were conducted in Kenya.

After independence, we faced extreme difficulties in setting up a complete judiciary structure. The number of then existing laws, enforced in Aden only, had been in force in Britain 100 years earlier. The judiciary cadres were comprised of members of the British and Indian foreign communities. Adenis were not permitted to perform such a task, not even study law abroad. English was used for all case trials, litigations and sentences. In 1968, we encountered difficulty in setting up a complete judiciary system when we were still in the first days of independence.

[Question] How were you able to overcome this situation?

[Answer] In the first months of 1968, we started setting up district courts throughout the entire republic while maintaining the Aden Higher Court to perform its role within the jurisdiction of the Aden Governorate. The major lawsuits filed in the other governorates were presented to a judiciary authority formed by the Ministry of Justice to examine such cases which were not within the jurisdiction of the district courts.

[Question] This is insofar as the judiciary apparatus is concerned. How did you face the issue of legal legislations?

[Answer] The legal and law legislations posed a more complicated problem. In Aden, the legislations in force had been enacted in Britain more than 100 years earlier and had then been abolished in Britain itself. It was difficult to get a law permitting those legislations and laws to be enacted in the republic's governorates. This is why we started issuing partial laws dealing with problems of an arbitrative nature. With the onset of 1970, the year in which the constitution was promulgated, we started to establish legal approaches through bills drafted by specialized legal committees. The general prosecution law issued at the beginning of 1973 is considered the first law connected with the judiciary. The family was then promulgated in 1974. Through these two laws, the unified judiciary situation began to take form throughout the republic in terms of application. Then a number of other laws were issued in succession, including the penal code which was issued, along with its executive bill, in 1976.

At present, there are governorate courts, in addition to lower courts in the districts. In large districts, more than one court exists. This is in addition to the republic's Supreme Court which is the highest step in the judiciary system.

[Question] Is there a state security court?

[Answer] We have abolished this type of courts with the promulgation of the amended constitution at the beginning of 1979 when all the special courts, called the People's Courts, were abolished.

[Question] Why were they abolished?

[Answer] With the promulgation of numerous laws and with the full completion of the judiciary apparatus throughout the republic and to give the judiciary greater guarantees, we found that there was no longer any need for the presence of People's Courts. The cases of a special nature, most often political cases, are examined by the court governorates and by the republic's Supreme Court in accordance with the penal code. This means that we do not have a special law. We have one law (general law), namely law No 3 of 1976.

[Question] What is the number of judges at present?

[Answer] The entire judiciary body in the republic is Yemeni. The number of judges at present is (equal) to the number of courts which amount to 15 courts per governorate at the average. It can be said that there are 90 judges distributed over Yemen's courts in the six governorates. In 1973, we established an institute to prepare and qualify judges. The graduates of this institute are not university graduates. Most of them work in public prosecution. In the governorate courts and the Aden Court, all the workers are university graduates. There are three female judges in the republic, one of whom has been working in the judiciary corps since 1970. The other two were nominated this year and they are currently undergoing a period of preparation and training.

[Question] Is there a sufficient number of lawyers?

[Answer] I said at the outset of the interview that the pre-independence judiciary corps in the republic consisted of foreigners. This is one of the problems that faced us. In 1976, we had only five lawyers. Now we have 10 lawyers who have broad experience with the law and with public prosecution.

[Question] What is the role of the Islamic Shari'a in the laws promulgated so far?

[Answer] The Islamic Shari'a is one of the sources from which we have clearly taken. There are strictures in the Shari'a and they are clear strictures.

We have taken from the Islamic Shari'a whatever concerns personal status affairs, such as inheritance and family affairs. In this regard, we are like any other [Islamic] country.

[Question] In the family law, you have restricted marriage to only one woman. Isn't this in conflict with the Shari'a?

[Answer] In fact people try to raise this issue and to depict it as if it were in conflict with the Shari'a. But if we think calmly, we find that the venerable Koran itself asks us to think. The Koranic text does not set the limit of four [wives] as an absolute limit but as a permissible limit that allows marriage to four wives. But the text sets a condition by stating: "And if you are afraid not to be just, then marry only one." Insofar as we are concerned, we have not restricted marriage to just one woman. We have permitted marriage to two, but only under certain conditions. If we weigh these conditions in the light of the Shari'a, we can say that we have taken regulatory measures to realize broader justice. The public interest in the Shari'a is the same and is based on the principles of analogy followed in all the jurisprudence rites of the Islamic Shari'a.

[Question] What is the situation insofar as divorce is concerned?

[Answer] In addition to regulating the issue of marriage, we have also regulated the issue of divorce so that a person's charge [wife] may no longer be subject to his disposition and psychological whims. If a person feels that his life within his family has become impossible, he must submit a request to the court explaining the reasons justifying a sentence in favor of a divorce. This is an organizational matter that was discussed in more than one meeting attended by a number of jurisprudents, clergymen and judiciary men. Regarding divorce, women also have the right to demand it the same as men. The person demanding a divorce will have to pay compensation [alimony] to the other party.

[Question] From what perspective can the Islamic tide that has begun to invade the world as a contemporary phenomenon demanding a return to the roots and fundaments of religion--from what perspective can this tide be viewed and what is your opinion of what has been said about the current confrontation between Islam and Marxism?

[Answer] We believe that the message of the venerable prophet is a social message against monopoly, slavery and tyranny and for justice and equal opportunities. When we examine Islam, we find it to be a message carried by the prophet, may God's peace and prayers be upon him, and in which he was supported by the poor, the slaves and a few rich people, led by Abu-Bakr al-Siddiq who sacrificed his money to buy and liberate slaves.

The issue, in our view, is not an issue of an Islamic tide. I say this as a man who has studied the Islamic Shari'a. This Shari'a is a complete system that prohibits monopoly, tyranny and the exploitation of man. We find that the thing with which the Shari'a is in strongest conflict is capitalism.

[Question] What kind of attention does the ministry pay to mosques and to clergymen?

[Answer] There is a large number of mosques in Yemen. In the town of Tarim (Hadramaut Governorate), there nearly 360 mosques for every day of the year [sic]. The state takes full care of whatever concerns repair and maintenance for the mosques and whatever concerns all the mu'adhdhins and guards.

> [Text] Fifty Percent of the UAE's Estimated Oil Revenues of More Than $60 Billion Are to Be Deposited in Central Bank. Its Most Important Function Is Control of Banking. Its Range of Objectives Includes Securing Monetary Stability and Guiding the Investment of State Funds.

The Central Bank is considered to be one of the major pillars of the national economy. This fact will become obvious to the people of the United Arab Emirates [UAE] within the next few weeks, when they will become aware of the many advantages of this bank. The law creating the bank was promulgated last Friday.

All economic circles in the state have welcomed this law, because they realize that the central bank will play a great role in stabilizing economic conditions and protecting the state and the citizens.

We present this two-part article in recognition of the importance of the bank's mission.

Today we will present the views of government officials. Tomorrow, we will present the views of a group of officials in the banking sector in the UAE.

The need for a Central Bank

The bill creating the central bank of the UAE has been under study since late 1977. Many amendments have been made in it to accommodate the developments that have taken place on the international and local scenes, especially in the field of the national economy.

Commenting on this, 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamr, Chairman of the Monetary Council of Abu Dhabi, said: "The development of the State, the growth of its agencies and activities, the increase in the number of banks and financial institutions, the economic and financial development of the country in the past ten years, and the inevitable interaction between local and international economic conditions have all led to the need for the creation of a well developed central monetary system to organize the economic activities of the nation at home and abroad, so as to keep pace with the most modern monetary systems of the advanced countries. This is particularly important, in view of the pace of progress of the world around us."

A Federal Step

'Abd al-Malik added: "The decision of the president and vice-president of the state to deposti 50% of the oil revenues in the Central Bank to support the budget of the state is a very progressive federal step."

He added: "The decision to create a central bank is in itself a federal step forward. Armed with financial and legislative support, the Central Bank will have a great opportunity to act freely in the planning and execution of monetary policy, and its coordination with fiscal policy. These policies may be compared to the two wings of a bird. Together, they serve the national economy and protect the interests of the citizens and of future generations."

A Transitional Period

'Abd al-Malik continued: "Following the promulgation of the Central Bank law, there will be a transitional period of four months to permit the transformation of the Monetary Council into a central bank. This transitional period is needed to take inventory of assets and liabilities, and determine the general financial position of the council. This will be followed by the issuance of decrees appointing members of the board of directors of the Central Bank, establishing tables of organization and internal by-laws, defining the functions of various divisions of the bank and their interrelationships, and, finally, formulating high policy which will be applied in daily operations."

'Abd al-Malik concluded: "Our acquisition of financial support coupled with the necessary comprehensive legislation provide us with the necessary tools to exercise close control over both internal and external economic transactions in which the state is involved."

Key Positions

Muhammad al-Hadi, chairman of the monetary council in Dubai, commented as follows: "As we have repeatedly said, the central bank is the bank of banks. It is the state bank, and the economic and financial advisor of the state. Its most important functions are: issuing paper currency and coins; issuing permits to banks and financial institutions; supervising banking operations; and regulating money exchange and brokerage businesses.

"The Central Bank will represent the state at international monetary organizations, such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Settlements Bank, and all similar Arab and Islamic organizations.

"The Central Bank is considered to be a public agency having an independent legal entity. Its headquarters will be in Abu Dhabi and it will have branches in most of the Emirates. It also possesses authority to appoint agents and correspondents overseas."

Al-Hady emphasized the central bank's role in supporting the local currency, maintaining its stability at home and abroad, and supervising the exchange of foreign currencies.

Al-Hady mentioned that the central bank will prepare the national balance of payments in cooperation with the appropriate authorities at home and abroad.

Al-Hady indicated that the central bank is authorized to invest the state budget surpluses in cooperation with the ministry of finance.

Banking Supervision

Al-Hady added: "The most important function of the bank we are presently interested in, and which we wish to develop, is its banking supervision department. The mission of this department is to guide and direct the banks and cooperate with them in the interest of both the banking community and the state.

"This control does not mean restricting bankings activities. It constitutes mutual consultation and the giving of advice which should be respected. A bank violating guidelines attracts attention. If it repeats the violation, its license will be revoked. This is expected to be an infrequent occurrence, because all banks cooperate with us and understand our mission. For our part, our doors are open to anyone having a question or inquiry. Our main goal is to maintain the monetary liquidity of the state, prevent fraud, and reduce risks to depositors. Deposits are equivalent to an act of trust in the bank. The trust has to be protected and invested faithfully for the benefit of both depositor and the investors.

"We are also concerned with maintaining the confidentiality of banking transactions of individuals and the secrecy of the profession."

Al-Hady said,: "The Central Bank will review the policy of granting credits presently followed by commercial banks, because it has caused some imbalance in the liquidity of the country. The central bank will attempt to correct the course of all of these matters in keeping with national policy."

Al-Hady concluded: "The Central Bank law will necessarily be supplemented by other laws at a later date. These will include: the depositors' protection law, the law governing checks and commercial paper, and the transfers law."

Credit Control

Since credit has an important effect on the economics and level of welfare of any country, governments entrust public organizations known as central banks with the mission of supervising and controlling credit. The laws authorize central banks to supervise the operations of commercial banks.

In this regard, Khalaf Sa'id al-Ghayth, director general of the finance ministry in Dubai told us: "Credits mean that the banks are granting loans. The Central Bank can influence the volume of credit in many ways. The most important ways are:

1. The rediscount rate. This represents the interest rate charged by the Central Bank when it rediscounts commercial paper accepted by commercial banks from their customers at a discount. If the Central Bank wants to increase the volume of credit in the community at large, it lowers the rediscount rate. This encourages commercial banks to rediscount notes in their possession, so as to increase the liquid funds which they can lend to their customers. When the Central Bank wants to reduce the volume of credit, it raises the rediscount rate. This forces the commercial banks to raise their discount rates, thus discouraging customers from asking for loans.

2. The legal reserve requirement. This involves changing the percentage of individual deposits which commercial banks are required by law or custom to maintain with the Central Bank. This percentage is raised when the Central Bank wants to restrict the volume of credit granted by commercial banks. When the Central Bank wishes to induce the commercial banks to expand the volume of credits, it lowers the percentage.

3. Moral suasion. The central bank has moral suasion powers over the commercial banks. It can induce these banks to follow a certain credit policy in keeping with definite political goals. Commercial banks have to heed the directions of the central bank, in view of the legal means it has to impose its credit policy.

4. Open market operations. These presuppose the existence of a highly organized financial bonds market. By this method, the central bank is able to control the volume of credit by buying and selling bonds on the open market. When the central bank buys these bonds, it gives the seller a check drawn on the Central Bank. The seller submits this check to his bank for collection from the Central Bank. The commercial bank credits the customer's account, and submits the check to the Central Bank. The latter credits the account of the commercial bank, and thereby increases the commercial bank's ability to expand its volume of credits. The opposite is true if the Central Bank sells bonds. When the Central Bank sells these bonds for checks drawn on commercial banks, it reduces the reserves of the commercial banks with the Central Bank, and, consequently, restricts their ability to extend credits."

Control of Credit Objectives

Al-Ghayth added: "Control of the volume of credit is not an end in itself in central banking operations. The basic purpose of these activities is to direct credit in a way which is beneficial to the national economy in general.

"The commercial banks may grant credits for projects which are not essential to the welfare of society. At this point, the Central Bank intervenes to induce the distribution of credits to projects according to their importance.

"The Central Bank can also be an instrument in the hands of the authorities to harness all available resources in society. In the developing countries, the Central Bank takes upon itself the responsibility of enforcing a particular credit policy and requiring the commercial banks to follow it. For example, each economic sector receives a share of the financial resources of the commercial banks. This share can be determined on the basis of the sector's importance and its contribution to the economic development of society. Thus, if government policy is intended to encourage the agricultural sector and the industrial sector, credits to these two sectors can be facilitated, and credits to other sectors can be restricted.

[Text] The Central Bank's Control Covers 53 Banks and 340 Branches in the Emirates. The Bank's Responsibility Extends Beyond the Limits of the State to Reach the World and its Financial Organizations.

Yesterday, we presented the views of government officials regarding the promulgation of the Central Bank law, the importance of that step, and the effect it will have on the national economy in the Emirates.

Today, we present the views of bankers and financiers regarding this important event, what it means to them and what they expect to result from it.

Banking Supervision

"The existence of a Central Bank is undoubtedly very important. It is in the best interests of the national economy in general and the banking system in particular," stated Salah Al-Basus, director of marketing, planning and follow-up at the central Office of the Abu Dhabi National Bank.

He added: "At the present time, the Monetary Council plays a commendable major role. We wish its authority had enabled it to exercise complete supervision of all banking operations in the country. This will be one of the Central Bank's functions, which will be more comprehensive and highly specialized than those of the Monetary Council.

"Accordingly, the Central Bank will have a more effective role, especially with regard to controlling the activities of the nation's banks. This is particularly important, in view of the large number of national and foreign banks, which has reached 53 banks with more than 340 branches in the country.

"This large number of banks undertakes various and diversified activities which have a great impact on the national economy. The Central Bank must control the activities of all banks in order to be in a position to rectify any aberrations of the national economy as they occur.

"The Monetary Council law was enacted in 1973. Since then, successive important events have occurred at home and abroad. The establishment of the Central Bank is an effort to reconcile the Monetary Council law with the chain of modern developments in the domain of monetary systems and policies at home and abroad, and to benefit from the experience of others in serving the national economy of the UAE."

Protecting the Banks

"The creation of the Central Bank will no doubt be in the interest of all banks. It has greater authority [than the Monetary Council] to balance the money supply, and steer economic activity in cooperation with other agencies in keeping with the dictates of the present state of economic development." So commented Ahmad Sadiq Muhammad Sami', vice-president of the Commercial Bank of the Gulf, Limited.

He added: "The Central Bank will have the ability to intervene in any ordinary banking practices, so as to direct them in the interest of the national economy. It will intervene in the money market; so as to maintain the value of the dirham versus foreign currencies at home and abroad. More important, it will support the national banks and stand by them in difficult times, since the bankruptcy of any one bank would be a serious setback to the national economy."

Interest Rate

David Alexander, President of the Gulf Bank said: "The enactment of the Central Bank law is a very important step. It will create beneficial cooperation within the banking family. It will also help strengthen the banking system in the UAE through effective control. It may try to merge or reduce the number of banks in the country in proportion to the population and the volume of local economic activity."

David Alexander added: "We hope that the Central Bank will intervene to maintain a low rate of interest, so as to help keep the cost of living down at home. This could be realized through the creation of numerous local investment opportunities, which would enable the banks to invest their funds at home, instead of looking for hugh rates of interest abroad.

Courageous Board of Directors

"The establishment of the Central Bank was an important economic necessity." said Abdullah Salih, president of Dubai National Bank, Limited. He added, "For the Central Bank to enjoy the trust of local and international financial institutions, its board of directors should consist of persons possessing national and international banking experience. These individuals should be courageous enough to exercise comprehensive control over the movement of capital at home and abroad. They must enjoy sufficient independence to resist any pressures which may be exerted upon them contrary to the goals of the establishment of the bank. There is no objection to the utilization of some foreign experts, provided their role is strictly consultative and that they do not interfere with the decision-making process."

Coordination of Banking Activity

Abdu Mahmud, assistant manager of the branch of the Abu Dhabi National Bank in Dubai commented on the importance of the enactment of the Central Bank law as follows: "In the absence of a Central Bank in the past, many commercial banks engaged in some erroneous practices. They can be excused for doing so, because they were not aware of each others' activities. When businessmen sensed demand for a commodity or type of merchandise, they rushed to the banks to obtain loans to make that commodity available on the market through manufacture or import. Thus, more than one businessman submitted loan requests to more than one bank for the same purpose. This resulted in flooding the market with a particular commodity. The commodity would not sell, and the businessmen would be unable to repay their loans to the banks.

"The Central Bank will be in a position to detect a situation like this, and advise the banks that a particular project has already been financed by one bank. Therefore, the banks will refrain from financing identical projects. Thus the Central Bank can play the role of coordinator of banking activity and can act in the best interests of the banking system. As an extension of this role, the Central Bank can be a clearing house for the various banks. However, for this role to be effective, a stable account must be kept by each bank with the Central Bank. This account would be adjusted after each clearing operation."

The Banking Credit Book

"The establishment of a Central Bank in the Emirates is an important step to strengthen the economic structure of the state," commented Ahmad 'Abd al-Hamid, the General Manager of the Bank of Cairo branches in the UAE. He said: "We have been hoping for the creation of this bank for a long time, because of the significant effect it will have on the organization of the commercial and financial sector, as well as on the planning and execution of monetary policy, which steers the country along the road of development and economic progress.

"The new element which the Central Bank can introduce for us who work in the banking sector is accurate and advanced control of banking operations. This can be accomplished in two ways:

1. Creation of a credit record for every customer who is granted a loan from any bank operating in the country. The Central Bank would be the only one in a position to initiate and maintain such a record, since it receives credit information from every bank for each customer. The Central Bank would maintain a record for each customer indicating the capital of the customer and the loans he has received. If the same customer applies for new credit from a different bank, the latter could contact the Central Bank to obtain a true picture of the customer's status and determine whether or not he is already burdened by loans. In other words, the Central Bank would be in a position to advise each bank if it is in its best interest to grant new credit to a customer. This is important, because it was possible in the past for a merchant with a capital of 1 million dirhams to obtain loans of up to 56 million dirhams from the 56 banks operating in the country. Each bank granted credit without full knowledge of the customer's total financial position.

2. A uniform tariff for banking services. The imposition of a uniform tariff for banking services on all banks would have a stabilizing effect. The setting of a maximum interest rate on deposits stabilizes deposits in the banks. And the setting of a maximum interest rate on loans would protect borrowers from exploitation by some banks."

ABU DHABI PETROLEUM EXPORT STATISTICS FOR 1978, 1979 GIVEN

Abu Dhabi AL-BAYAN in Arabic 8 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] Abu Dhabi crude oil exports to the U.S., Japan, France, the United Kingdom, Italy and Sweden decreased in 1979. At the same time, exports to Holland, West Germany, Pakistan, India, Brazil and Madagascar increased in comparison to 1978. A statistical report of the Abu Dhabi Planning Department indicates that the export of crude oil decreased from 172,743,000 barrels in 1978 to 163,561,000 in 1979. Exports to other countries were as follows:

-The U.S.: 69,358,000 barrels in 1978; 64,908,000 barrels in 1979.

-France: 61,193,000 barrels in 1978; 55,677,000 barrels in 1979.

-Holland: 30,844,000 barrels in 1978; 38,404,000 barrels in 1979.

-West Germany: 11,665,000 barrels in 1978; 28,320,000 barrels in 1979.

-The United Kingdom: 16,682,000 barrels in 1978; 8,082,000 barrels in 1979.

-Italy: 13,387,000 barrels in 1978; 7,605,000 barrels in 1979.

-Switzerland: 6,356,000 barrels in 1978, 8,928,000 barrels in 1979.

-Sweden: 9,474,000 barrels in 1978; 8,772,000 barrels in 1979.

-Pakistan: 7,397,000 barrels in 1978; 9,060,000 barrels in 1979.

-India: 7,380,000 barrels in 1978; 12,503,000 barrels in 1979.

-Poland: 3,283,000 barrels in 1978; 1,316,000 barrels in 1979.

-Bangladesh: 4,460,000 barrels in 1978; 4,504,000 barrels in 1979.

-Thailand: 4,441,000 barrels in 1978; 4,826,000 barrels in 1979.

-Brazil: 6,283,000 barrels in 1978; 9,201,000 barrels in 1979.

Last year Abu Dhabi exported crude oil to 4 new countries: Portugal, Ethiopia, Morrocco and the Democratic Republic of Yemen, while it stopped exports to Egypt.

Although total exports decreased, development and public projects were not affected, due to the fact that oil revenues still yield a surplus amounting to millions of dirhams.

ABU DHABI GAS INDUSTRY TRAINING PROGRAMS DISCUSSED

Dubai AL-BAYAN in Arabic 2 Aug 80 p 3

[Interview with unnamed vice-president of Abu Dhabi Liquefied Gas Company, by Khalid 'Aylbuni; date and place not given]

[Text] The gas industry in Abu Dhabi is a new industry in the full sense of the word. Until 1977, the gas associated with the oil extracted from sea and land oilfields was separated and burned. This wasteful situation continued until a project was initiated to liquefy both types of gas: natural gas and gas separated from petroleum in the offshore oilfields in Das Island.

With the rise of this new industry, the authorities began thinking of training citizens or Arab residents into personnel capable of running it.

Training is Investment

In an interview with the vice-president of the Abu Dhabi [Liquefied Gas] Company, our first question was about the progression of steps taken by the company in the field of training, and how the company views this subject.

He replied: "We view training as an investment. Our company is new, and our plant in Das Island is new. It uses the latest developments in Western technology. Our people who work in this industry must be trained and qualified. Otherwise we will remain at the mercy of foreigners, and will continue to pay them high wages. When we train our young men, we save a great deal, benefit our young men and avoid being at the mercy of foreign expertise. Since we opened the plant in October 1977, we have been training cadres from the ranks of our own citizens and those of other Arab nations. We sent trainees to the U.S. and Britain even before we officially inaugurated the plant."

[Question] Let us pause briefly to consider the subject of training overseas. How many trainees were sent to the U.S. and Britain?

[Answer] Twenty trainees. Sixteen were nationals and 4 were Arab brethren.

[Question] What kind of training do they receive?

[Answer] Actually, all of them are enrolled in scientific universities and institutions. In Britain, they study for a bachelor's degree in science or engineering, in various fields relating to the gas industry. They also study for British graduate degrees, in order to become engineers and technicians, and return to their homeland to assume their proper roles in this industry. In the U.S., the trainees also seek college degrees in various fields of the gas industry.

Local Training

[Question] Granted the importance of these study missions, training cannot be limited to sending personnel abroad. The company cannot be expected to send all trainees abroad on study missions which may last several years, and which may not be in fields essential to the gas industry. What is the status of local training within the company's training programs?

[Answer] Be assured that we have not overlooked this matter. We realized from the beginning that we had to establish a training center in Abu Dhabi, and provide it with the necessary technical facilities and expertise to train the number of people needed in all specializations of the gas industry. We started this program under the supervision of the mother company, the Abu Dhabi National Petroleum Company (ANDOC). We selected thirty citizens and Arab nationals, and enrolled them in the center. We hope to begin to reap the benefits of this domestic training program within the next few years through the graduation of qualified technicians who are able to work in this modern industry.

Trainee Selection

[Question] On what basis are the trainees selected?

[Answer] At the beginning, we required that trainees should have a high school diploma, but we found that this condition was difficult to meet. There were not enough applicants, especially among the citizens. Therefore, we relaxed this condition, and accepted students who had finished the first year of high school. This enabled us to screen many applicants and select the best qualified for training.

[Answer] The trainee at the Abu Dhabi training center receives 2000 dirhams, if he lives outside the housing facilities of the company. If the trainee lives in the company housing facilities, he receives 1600 Dirhams, in addition to food and transportation. Those who study outside the country, receive 4500 Dirhams monthly, besides tuition fees and travel expenses. This amount is enough to cover the various expenses needed by the student.

Study Subjects

[Question] We need to pause and take a look at the training center in Abu Dhabi. How long does the program of study take? What are the subjects studied by the trainees in the course of two years?

[Answer] The length of study in the institute is two years. The emphasis in the first year is on learning the English language, since it is the language of the industry. Without it, it would be impossible to handle the equipment and technology at the plant.

In the second year, emphasis is on scientific subjects and on work in the laboratories to conduct experiments and acquire specialized technical knowledge.

The Language

[Question] We cannot deny the importance of the language. However, we should mention that the Arab Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (AOPEC), realizing the importance of Arabizing the oil industry, agreed to establish an oil industry training institute in Baghdad.

[Answer] We wish to achieve Arabization of technology, but we cannot stay behind and wait for that to happen. As long as our oil industry depends on Western technology, we must teach our trainees the English language, which is the only available key to the specialized knowledge of this industry. This is not a difficult problem, since our youth have proved capable of mastering the language during their first year of training.

Graduates' Salary is 8,000 Dirhams

[Question] Does the training end after the completion of the two years at the training institute?

[Answer] The graduates need some on-the-job training after they complete the two years at the center. During this period, the trainees are not all on the same level or competence. Some forge ahead, while others slip behind slightly. We send those who show potential for advancement on study or training missions abroad, or we give them more advanced positions at the gas liquefying plant in Das.

[Question] If the trainee receives 2,000 dirhams during the two years of training he spends at the center, what is his salary after graduation?

[Answer] Upon graduation, the trainee is given a salary of not less than 7,000 dirhams. He may even be paid up to 8000 dirhams a month.

Arabization [of Personnel] of the Petroleum Industry

[Question] The training of citizens and Arab nationals by the Abu Dhabi Liquefied Gas Company does in effect constitute serious steps toward Arabization of the petroleum industry in general, and the gas industry in particular. This leads us to ask about Arabization in the Abu Dhabi Liquefied Gas Company.

[Answer] The company follows the general policy of the state Execution of this policy is supervised by the petroleum department under the leadership of Dr Mani' ibn Said al-'Utayba, minister of petroleum and mineral resources. This is a policy of naturalization and Arabization. We train our Arab brethren in order to achieve this national goal. We have made good progress in the direction of Arabization. A good percentage of the technicians working for the company in Das Island is now Arab. The percentage of these Arab technicians has reached 35%.

I should mention that our attention to Arabization begins with the higher technical positions. If we consider these higher technical positions separately from other simple positions that require simple skills, the percentage of Arab personnel would be higher than 35%.

As I mentioned before, investment considerations are involved in this matter: we train our Arab brethren in order to benefit from them, and to gradually substitute them for foreign expertise.

Training Coordination:

[Question] What about coordination of training among the national companies?

[Answer] Actually, there is real coordination in the field of training between the mother company (ADNOC) and its affiliates. If you visit the training center, you will see that the students who study in joint groups are from various projects, especially in the first year. The curriculum and the programs are centrally prepared in a way that fits the practical needs of the various fields of the petroleum industry. For example, our first year students study with students of the chlorine factory, and students of the technology programs. Specialization begins during the second year. [End of interview]

Conclusion

There is an open invitation to all young citizens and Arab nationals to apply for any of the training programs of the Abu Dhabi Liquefied Gas Co or of ADNOC. Undoubtedly, the participation of youth in these programs will secure their future on one hand, and serve the future of the petroleum industry on the other.

An application is not a mere investment, but also a strategic move to secure the future of a young industry, which is still at the beginning of the road. Before we demand naturalizing this industry, we must make serious efforts to train the necessary Arab human resources capable of undertaking the responsibilities entailed by such naturalization.

UK DAILY CITES EMIRATE CLAIM OF HORMUZ ISLANDS

LD031447 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 3 Oct 80 p 4

[Dispatch by Guy Rais: "'Return Hormuz Isles' Says Emirate Shaykh"]

[Text] A "request" for the return of two strategic islands in the Strait of Hormuz was made yesterday by Shaykh Saqr Ibn Muhammad al-Qasimi, ruler of the northern-most state in the United Arab Emirates.

The islands were taken over by the shah of Iran from the emirate, Ras al-Khaimah, nine years ago.

The 64-year-old bearded shaykh who has ruled for 32 years told me: "Our request is simple. The emirates want to see the islands restored to their rightful owners--in this case the emirates--as soon as possible.

"The islands belong to my emirate but now we are in a federation the issue should be dealt with on that basis. [as published] We want to continue friendly relations with Iran."

Naval Activity

The shaykh was speaking amid reports emanating in the Gulf that Iran had stepped up naval activity around the two islands.

Unconfirmed reports said that an Iranian warship was standing off the two islands, the Greater and Lesser Tunbs, and the Abu Musa which is shared jointly by the emirate of Sharjah and Iran.

The islands, about 80 miles from the strait at the mouth of the Gulf, are strongly fortified by the Iranian Navy. So far they have not been blocked and Iran has given a pledge that the Gulf would remain open to shipping.

Tankers have continued to pass through the strait since the war began 12 days ago.

Shaykh al-Qasimi, who took over control after an inter-family dispute and who, in 30 years has brought the backward emirate into a state of prosperity, received me in his palace, a modest white-washed single-storey building.

The only open display of opulance was a blue "Rolls-Royce" standing in the sweltering heat of the courtyard.

Answering questions in Arabic which were translated by one of his eight sons, the shaykh would not be drawn into specific replies on the Iraqi-Iranian war.

But he categorically rejected suggestions that facilities had been offered to both Iraq and Iran by the emirates. "The emirates have adopted a policy of neutrality and our ports and airports are not being used by either side. We are not at war."

Asked about reports that anti-aircraft guns had been positioned at his little-used international airport which has two or three scheduled commercial flights a day, he said: "What you have seen is the emirates' forces and they can go wherever they want."

Shaykh al-Qasimi agreed that he had visited Baghdad three weeks ago. "I went at the invitation of the Iraqi Government," he said. "It is a Moslem country and we discussed economic matters."

Asked what he felt about the super-powers' presence through their fleets in the Indian Ocean not far from the Gulf, he said: "This war has so far been confined to a limited military engagement. We are concerned with the possibility that it could escalate into a more dangerous stage. That is something we wish to avoid."

PLO LEADER COMMENTS ON UN SESSION

Kuwait AL-SIYASAH in Arabic 16 Aug 80 p 13

[Interview with PLO executive committee member Yasir 'Abd Rabbuh, by Manar Baras, in Beirut; date not given]

[Text] Yasir 'Abd Rabbuh, member of the Executive Committee of the PLO in charge of the information department, declared that implementation of the recent UN resolution calling on Israel to withdraw from the Arab lands occupied after 1967 requires a modification in the balance of power in the region, which would force the Zionist enemy and American imperialism to yield to the demands of our people and their just rights. He disclosed messages sent by the United States to the leaders of the European states calling on them to vote against the resolution.

Commenting on the position of the states which voted against this resolution or abstained from voting, 'Abd-Rabbuh said that the PLO is conducting a widespread diplomatic campaign to deal with the positions of states hostile to the Palestinian cause and Arab questions.

He said that the PLO will present a complete plan to the first Arab meeting for the purpose of taking tangible steps toward an economic and oil boycott and withdrawal of Arab capital from American banks. He said that these sanctions would cover other nations with positions hostile to the Arab cause.

'Abd Rabbuh called on all Arab states to take a stand opposing by action, not by word, the step to annex Jerusalem to Israel, which supplements the "conspiratorial Camp David plan."

The following is the text of the interview conducted with 'Abd Rabbuh immediately after he returned from New York after he participated in the Palestinian delegation to the UN General Assembly session which discussed the Palestinian question.

[Question] What is your evaluation of the resolutions which were issued by the UN General Assembly about Palestine, and what can result from these resolutions, from your point of view?

[Answer] The recent resolution by the emergency session of the United Nations is considered more advanced than the previous resolutions, since it calls unequivocably for Israel's withdrawal from occupied Arab and Palestinian territory, without conditions or restrictions, sets a deadline for this withdrawal, calls for the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, and guarantees the right of the refugees to return to their nation.

The resolution considers that the United Nations should demand follow-up of implementation, and, for the first time, deems it necessary to apply the sanctions included in the United Nations Charter against Israel, if it does not comply with this resolution. Also, this emergency session remains open and can be convened in the future if the need arises.

We have absolutely no illusions that Israel and its American protectors will comply with this resolution, but the resolution does indicate the isolation in which Israel and the parties to Camp David have been placed, since 112 states voted for the resolution, the highest percentage of votes cast for any Palestinian resolution.

The resolution proves that in spite of the strong pressure which the United States has applied to other international blocs, especially Latin America, Africa and Asia, could not achieve any success in forcing these blocs to vote against the resolution or even abstain from voting.

Only a handful of client states on these three continents, such as Guatemala, the Dominican Republic, Liberia and Burma, support the American position. The rest of the states belonging to the OAU and the nonalined states voted in support of this resolution. Although the United States sent personal messages to the leaders of the West European states calling on them to vote against the resolution, it did not achieve complete success with the exception of Norway, which bowed in abject fashion to American pressure and was among the seven states which voted against the resolution. However, the West European position of abstaining from voting reveals the truth about claims that there would be a positive new European initiative before the United Nations session is convened, and proves that the nations of Western Europe continue to be subject to the blackmail of America and to provide a cover for Zionist expansion against our Palestinian people and our Arab nation. The states of Western Europe justified their position at the United Nations by claiming that the resolution is imbalanced, because it does not provide for the right of all states of the region to live within secure and recognized borders. This alleged imbalance is an obvious excuse, since Western Europe has thus far refused to accept, in return [for balance], recognition of the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people and the right of our people to establish their independent state on their land. They are content to use obscure phrases such as "right to self-determination."

Put in another way, Western Europe grants all of the clearly defined and detailed demands presented by Israel and America, while refusing to accede to the demands of the Palestinian people and the Arabs in general.

The session was an effective test of this European position, and it dispelled Arab illusions about it. The session and the final resolution confirmed that the vast majority of the states of the world refuse to consider Camp David as a sound basis for a just solution, especially with respect to the question of Palestine.

In light of this resolution, the PLO senses the complete and worldwide support of the socialist states, the nonalined states, the Islamic states and some other friendly nations. The PLO leadership is now studying the necessity of pursuing the political campaign to develop the historic results of this resolution. From another angle, we will carry out a widespread diplomatic campaign to deal with the hostile positions taken by some states, such as Norway, and with the negative positions of the states of Western Europe and Japan, which abstained from the voting.

Sanctions

'Abd Rabbuh added: "As for the mastermind of this conspiracy, the United States, we will submit to an 'Arab meeting' a complete plan to take tangible steps toward an economic and oil boycott, withdrawal of capital from American banks, and action to further isolate and unmask U.S. policy.

These sanctions must cover nations which have hostile positions, be they those which voted against the resolution or those which maintained their embassies in occupied Jerusalem, such as Norway and Holland.

As we know full well, implementation of this resolution depends upon achievement of a balance of power in the area which would force the Zionist enemy and American imperialism to submit to Palestinian and Arab demands. However, in spite of bad Arab conditions, which hinder the adoption of a resolute policy against the United States, Israel and the Sadat regime, we will pursue our work on the international level, especially to demand implementation of the resolution concerning sanctions and economic and political boycott of Israel because of its refusal to implement this resolution.

We emphasize here the responsibility of the Arab states to do everything in their power to enforce these sanctions and obtain wider international support for this position.

Annexing Jerusalem to Israel

[Question] What do you think of the Zionist Knesset stating that the Arab city of Jerusalem is considered the capital of the state of occupation?

[Answer] This step comes under the umbrella and protection of the Camp David agreements and within the policy of imposing the fait accompli which Israel, with U.S. support, is trying to implement. This dangerous step makes it incumbent upon all Arab states to take a position opposing this American-Israeli conspiracy in action, not just words.

Without a policy opposing American interests and influence in the area, there is no value in any declarations of disapproval issued by this or that nation.

Following the Zionist resolution in the Knesset, we decided to call immediately for a meeting of the Security Council and of the Committee to Save Jerusalem. We are also thinking of inviting the Arab foreign ministers to an emergency meeting to discuss methods of confronting the steps of the Zionists and their American protectors.

INCREASE IN SHIPPING INSURANCE--Sources of the national Insurance Companies reported that Lloyd's Insurance Co. has increased its premiums by 1% on ships heading towards the Gulf area. The sources further asserted that the increase in insurance premiums covers the ships' structures and engines. However, products destined to ports in the UAE, Bahrain, Qatar and Kuwait, were exempted from this increase except that insurance on products destined to Iraq and Iran ports increased by one half percent. Moreover, these sources added that this increase will be reflected, one way or another, on prices and Lloyd's has decided to review these percentages weekly based on the size and direction of the war operations between Iraq and Iran and this will in turn affect whether percentages will be increased, decreased or stabilized. AL-KHALIJ also learned that the ship "Al-Riyad," which is owned by the Arab Maritime Transport Co. was seriously damaged while docked in al-Basrah port in Iraq, and was towed to the dry dock in Bahrain for repairs. KARMAL REPORTEDLY LOSES REVOLUTION COUNCIL CHAIRMANSHIP

Lahore NAWA-I-WAQT in Urdu 19 Aug 80 p 3

[News report: "Babrak Karmal Removed from Chairmanship of Revolution Council; He Is also Prevented from Attending Council Meetings; Two Opponents Promoted to Important Posts in his Absence"]

[Text] New Delhi, 18 August (Reuter)--The meeting of the Revolution Council and the Politbureau, in which decisions were made to promote two members of the faction opposed to Babrak Karmal, was not attended by Karmal himself. Although Karmal is head of not only the government, but also of the party and the Revolution Council, no mention was made of his participation in the meeting in announcements broadcast over Radio Kabul and heard in New Delhi.

Among the new appointments made, Mr Abdorrashid Arian, who was minister of justice and attorney general, and belongs to the rival group, has been appointed deputy prime minister, and Saleh Mohammed, former minister of agriculture and health, and a member of the Politbureau, has been appointed chairman of the Revolution Council, a post which was formerly held by Babrak Karmal himself.

According to reliable sources, both appointments have been made with the purpose of ending differences between the opposing factions, Khalq and Parcham. Since 80% of the army officers belong to the Khalq faction, there is deep resentment and rebellion in the army over the anti-Khalq actions of the ruling party. This has gotten Russia worried.

Therefore, it is speculated that these two leaders of the Khalq faction have been promoted at the suggestion of the Russian advisors.

According to analysts and commentators, the fact that President Karmal did not attend the meeting has deeper significance. Some commentators have said that Karmal was not allowed to attend the meeting, and that these decisions were made in his absence.

Meanwhile, Radio Kabul broadcast an official announcement last night, in which it said that Deputy Prime Minister Asadullah Sarwari has been appointed Afghanistan's ambassador to Mongolia. At the beginning of this year Mr Sarwari had gone abroad for medical treatment. According to the announcement, he is already in the capital of Mongolia. Mr Sarwari is between 30 and 40 years of age. He is the leader of the Khalq faction, rival of Babrak Karmal's Parcham faction. Mr Sarwari had become notorious for his cruel, atrocious acts during the administration of the former President, Mr Taraki. People used to call him "King Kong" and "butcher."

POSSIBLE MUJAHID-KHALQ ALLIANCE SUGGESTED

Lahore MASHRIQ in Urdu 8 Aug 80 p 9

[News report: "Babrak Karmal Has Exiled Several Ministers and Generals of the Opposite Parcham Party; Those Sent to Moscow Include Watan Yar, Gen Dagarwal and Gulab Zai"]

[Text] Islamabad, 7 Aug--According to Radio Kabul and the NEW TIMES, the official newspaper of the Afghan government, fighting between the ruling Parcham Khalq faction of Babrak Karmal and the faction in opposition, Kha Khalq, has reached its climax. The Karmal regime has exiled to Moscow several ministers, generals and other high officials belonging to the opposition Khalq Party. These include Aslam Watan Yar, Abdurrashid Arian, Asadullah Sarwari, Dr Shah Wali, Dr Saleh Mohammed Zairi, Gen Abdul Qadir Dagarwal and Gulab Zai. Positions vacated by these persons have been given to members of the Parcham faction, which is now in total control of the government.

After eliminating the Khalq faction, seven leaders of Babrak Karmal's ruling Parcham faction have assumed control of administrative affairs. These seven are: Nun Ahmad Nur, Nur Wakil, Dr Inayat Ratibzad, Mahmud Barali, Sultan Ali Khishtmand, Bij Habib and Bij Rafi. All these had been accused of being traitors by former President Hafizullah Amin, and had been made targets of severe reprisals. After Babrak Karmal came to power, Khalq leaders supported his regime. But they later opposed the government of the question of Russian intervention in Afghanistan. Now, the Khalq faction has gained influence in the rural areas. This has led to speculation that the Khalq faction and the mujahidin will cooperate with each other to bring about the downfall of the Karmal regime and to oust the Russian army. Such a speculation has been confirmed by one mujahid leader, Prof Sayaf Gul.

WRITERS' UNION TO PROPAGATE SAUR REVOLUTION

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 6 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] One of the long cherished aspirations of the writers and poets was finally fulfilled with the convening of the Founding Congress of Union of Workers and poets of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan.

Held in a very grand ceremony the meeting of Founding Congress of the Union of Writers and poets was unprecedented in the history of Afghanistan. It was in fact another step taken forward to organise the different sections of the people of Afghanistan under the leadership of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, the vanguard of the working class in the country.

The establishment of the Union of Writers and Poets which took place with all enthusiasm and interest showed the full preparedness of the writers and poets to form a strong and fiercing force and to stand behind the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan to defend its progressive ideas and programmes and safeguard the gains of Saur Revolution at a time when the entire nation has risen up to fight the sinister vistages of the past feudal order and the remains of the corruption which was prevailing during the reign of oppressive rulers.

In the message of greeting which was sent to the Founding Congress of the Union of Writers and Poets of Afghanistan by the Central Committee of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan and the Revolutionary Council of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan it is said: "At this sensitive stage of the second phase of Saur Revolution when the party has directed all forces towards the full annihilation of counter-revolution and the aggressive armed bands--these hirelings of imperialism and hegemonism the homeland expects its writers and poets to create such works which would arouse the sense of hatred of the people against the enemies and strengthen their belief in the performance of this sacred task and praise the heroism and gallantry of the prideful defenders of the people."

In this way we may say that the writers and poets roles have become more important and assumed a new colour and turn.

Like other revolutionary elements the writers and poets have to arouse the sense of hatred and hostility against the enemies of the revolution and the people of Afghanistan.

They have to defend and revive the heroism displayed by the defenders of the interests of the working class, the workers, peasants and toilers.

At this time when the party and DRA government with the support of the people have sent out their forces to wipe out the counter-revolutionaries despatched to Afghanistan by the US imperialism in collusion with the Chinese hegemonists the writers and poets have to wage a fierce battle against the enemies of the progressive regime in Afghanistan through their progressive ideas which have to be expressed by their strong pens and sharp minds.

The contributions of writers and poets are very important because they mobilize the minds and hearts of the nation towards the building of the new society, a society free of exploitation of man by man, and a society where everyone will receive his own share according to his work and expected to produce according to his ability.

The establishment of the Union of Writers and Poets gave legal recognition to the status and stand of writers and poets in the Afghan society. With this move the ground is prepared for our writers and poets to come into contact with their colleagues in other countries of the world.

It is now the duty of the Union of Writers and Poets of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan to seek means and ways to consolidate its relations and friendly ties with the Unions of writers and poets and other progressive organisations in the world and exchange views and experiences with the object to expedite the pace of movement towards the building of the new society.

No doubt the Union of Writers and Poets has made our progressive elements, writers, poets and intelligentsia take their pens and serve the interests of the working people and enrich the progressive cultural wealths of different nationalities living in Afghanistan.

Now that our writers have been provided with ample opportunity it is hoped that they produce valuable works in every area of social political, economic and cultural fields and help the vast masses of our land take active part in the development efforts and progressive plans undertaken by the party and government and feed our newspapers, periodicals, radio and television with their highly needed articles and progressive materials. We are sure that with the great sense of service that our writers are endowed with they will prove very fruitful in nation buildup and defence of the gains of revolution.

GOVERNMENT INVESTS IN SHOE FACTORY

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 6 Oct 80 p 3

[Excerpt] "The Afs. 60,000,000 Government assistance extended to the Watan Plastic Shoe Factory through banking credits is one of the most significant, useful and timely measures taken by our revolutionary government towards protecting, promoting and guiding the private industrial sector. This timely aid of the revolutionary government has been widely welcomed by the national traders, patriotic workers and toilers of our beloved country."

In an interview with the reporter of Kabul New Times while elaborating on the government aid, the President of Watan Plastic Shoe Factory said: The government has undertaken long-term effective plans for protection, promotion, and guidance of private industries, aiming at further expansion and improving the quality of goods and finding market for consumer commodities produced by this sector of national economy as well as removing their financial difficulties through the related banks. The extension of the sixty-million afghanis assistance through opening of letter of credit in the name of the Watan Plastic Shoe Factory is indicative of the government's earnest desire for the expansion of industrial sector and promotion of private investment.

He added that the objective behind granting afs. sixty-million credit to this factory was to facilitate the import of raw materials from abroad and to meet the requirements of the factory. As usual the factory pays in advance 25 percent of the total cost of material imported and the remaining 75 percent is paid when the raw materials reach Kabul. Sometimes it happens that though the imported materials reaches Kabul, the factory due to financial difficulties cannot pay the cost. Of course, the services and assistance rendered by the Pashtany Tejaraty Bank and the Export Promotion Bank in solving our financial and banking problems are worth of every appreciation.

The assistance, he added, rendered by these banks is not in cash. The banks extend loan to the factory and the loans are payable after the materials or goods arrive in Kabul Custom House. So far the services of the said banks have been very useful in smooth flow of materials needed by the factory.

As to the production capacity and the present capital of the factory, the President of the Watan Plastic Factory said: The Watan Plastic Shoe Factory which came into existence under DRA Private Investment Promotion Law and was registered by the Planning Affairs Ministry as a joint-stock company with an initial capital of twenty-million afghanis has played a significant role in the further growth of national economy and has been of valuable service to the compatriots. The factory at present functions with a capital of thirty-five million afghanis.

He further added: The maximum production capacity of the factory in one shift daily is 12,000 pairs of footwears, but unfortunately, during the despotic and oppressive reign of hangman Amin, the factory stopped production for one year and fortunately with the victorious uprising of the evolutionary phase of the glorious Saur Revolution which prepared the ground for reactivation and normalisation of national trade our factory resumed operation.

At present as a result of the government's assistance the factory produces 7,000 pairs of different kinds of men's, women's and children footwears.

As far as the equipment, machinery, and personnel employed at the factory, he said: The factory employs over 120 persons including technical and administrative personnel in its various sections and the work performed by them is appreciated by the management. The factory operates more than 20 different kinds of machines.

The president of the factory further added: The production of this factory can compete well with similar local and foreign products and that our products are greatly demanded by the compatriots in the capital as well as in the provinces. The setting up of branches sales stores of our factory in centre and provinces is indicative of great demand for our products throughout the country.

Regarding the timely assistance of the revolutionary government toward the further growth and development of national industry particularly the facility provided to the Watan Plastic Shoe Factory, he said: In the first step the Industrial Development Bank functioning in the framework of Finance Ministry is duty-bound to render any assistance to the private investors to help them in solving their financial problems. We haven't yet presented any official request to the said bank pertaining the bank's financial assistance to the factory, but if we feel any need to do so, we are sure the bank will promptly come to our aid.

YOUTH FESTIVAL HELD TO HONOR REVOLUTION

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 30 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

Jashn-i-Jawanan or Youth Festival which was helde here was another event in the history of Afghanistan. Featured by artistic, sport and cultural programmes the Youth Festival was highly celebrated in grand ceremonies. These ceremonies were attended by party members, representatives of national and international youth organisations who had attended the all-conference of the Democratic Organisation for Afghan Youth, and large crowds of the noble and heroic people of Afghanistan.

Never before there has happened any such event in the history of Afghanistan. It is an indicative of the great importance which the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan attaches to the role and the activities of youth in taking part in development efforts of the country.

In the happy and delightful and grand solidarity meeting which was held on the occasion of Youth Festival the heads of the national and international youth organisations delegation once again expressed their militant support for the Saur Revolution and the government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and the patriotic and progressive youth of Afghanistan organised under the banner of the Democratic Organisation for Afghan Youth.

On behalf of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, and DRA Government Sultan Ali Keshtmand Vice—President of RC and Deputy Prime Minister described the occasion as a new age, an age of youth, for revolution of Afghanistan and called the all—conference of the Democratic Organisation for Afghan Youth as an important event in the social and political life of Afghanistan and wished the solidarity grand meeting of the world democratic youth with the Afghan Youth every success in maintaining peace, ensuring democracy and Social Justice.

It is a matter of great delight to note that the Youth Festival was also marked by solidarity meetings held in various organisations in the Kabul city. In these meetings the youth and noble people of Afghanistan expressed their full support for the Saur Revolution and appreciated the solidarity expressed by the national and internation democratic youth organisation delegations with the Afghan youth. The participants of these grand solidarity meetings and functions declared their readiness to fight the enemies of Saur Revolution and safegard its gains in the interest of the working people.

These functions and meetings are indicative of the fact that the Saur Revolution is a turning point in the life of the suffering and oppressed large masses of the people of Afghanistan. The revolution, no doubt, consolidated the rule of the toilers and labourers who produce all the moral and material wealth of this land.

The young men and women of revolutionary Afghanistan have without any doubt great role in translating into action the lofty aspirations of the Saur Revolution and the useful and fruitful social, economic, cultural and political programmes undertaken by the leadership of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan and the DRA Government during the second phase of glorious Saur Revolution.

With the high value and significance attached by the PDPA, DRA government and the entire people of the country and the full solidarity expressed by the representatives of the democratic youth organisations of the world the position of our progressive and patriotic youth has been further strengthened and consolidated. The people of Afghanistan are very much appreciative of the activities of the young men and women carried in toppling the tower of oppressive ruling classes and of the great support they have been giving to the progressive moves made by their revolutionary regime in Afghanistan.

During the last two and half years since the victory of the great Saur Revolution and especially its second phase the progressive and heroic youth of Afghanistan have fought gallantly the internal and external reactionaries and counter—revolutionaries who are trained, armed and backed by the US imperialism, Pakistan militarists and Arab reaction. Our youth have voluntarily been taking part in the construction and development work in Afghanistan.

The revolution certainly makes headway towards the building of the new society of Afghanistan. The youth have therefore greater tasks ahead and the people of Afghanistan are looking forward to the patriotic and progressive youth to bring the Saur Revolution to final victory and thus realise the objectives of the revolutionary Afghanistan.

We hope the festival of youth and the massive solidarity meetings held will provide further incentive to the youth of Afghanistan to organise their forces in a better manner so that they could play more constructive role and help better the party and government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan in carrying out their activities and discharging the responsibilities they are shouldering for ensuring progress and social justice.

CRAFT UNIONS ESTABLISHED FOR WORKERS

[Text]

The consolidation and strengthening of the craft unions have led thousands of thousands of our workers to stand firm behind the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan. It is an important step taken forward especially after the emergence of the second phase of the glorious Saur Revolution. Politically speaking, the craft unions of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan constitute a strong arm to help the PDPA and DRA government realise the lofty aspirations of Saur Revolution and put into effect the social, economic and cultural programmes undertaken in the interest of the masses of workers and peasants in the country.

The Central Council of the Craft Unions which has been established after the second phase of the revolution have launched an intensive and extensive efforts to get the workers organised in the capital and the provinces as well.

Admittedly, the members of the Craft Unions have carefully followed the instructions and orders of the Central Council as the highest authoritative body of the Craft Unions of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan.

Eye catching achievements have been made by the Craft Unions and its central council. We have witnessed that the workers with the help of their unions under the instruction of their central council have cooperated in establishing resistence groups, in propagation of the lofty objectives of the Saur Revolution and the importance of getting united in the craft unions, expanding the artistic and cultural activities, forming sport teams and taking part in the activities carried out by the illiteracy courses.

In line with other useful and fruitful measures adopted by the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan and the DRA Government the first Plenum of the central council of the Craft Unions was held in the headquarters of the Unions of Workers of Afghanistan sometimes ago. It was indeed an important event in the life of the workers. The first plenum of the unions of workers instructed the presidium to take effective steps towards establishment of city and provincial councils of unions of workers. With the establishment of these councils of workers' unions the activities of the workers will be organised in an effective manner in the interest of the working class led by the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan to help realise the lofty objectives of Saur Revolution.

As repeatedly said by the leadership of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan now the rule of workers and peasants has been consolidated in our country There will be no room for the past feudal lords, big land owners and exploiters to serve their interests in the revolutionary Afghanistan at the expense of the lot of millions of workers and peasants.

The city councils of the Unions of Workers are supposed to work as middle bodies between the workers and the Central Council of the Unions of Workers. The establishment and convening of the Kabul City Council of craft union took place as a result of the second Plenum of the Central Council of the Unions of Workers.

Convened to put into effect the resolutions of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan about the roles and duties of the unions in the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan the second Plenum of the Central Council of the Craft Unions passed a number of important resolutions which have significant role in the life of the workers in Afghanistan.

The city councils of Unions of workers will pass down the directions and instructions of the Central Council of the Unions of Workers of Afghanistan to the workers and toilers through the primary organisations and transmit the demands and needs of the millions of toilers to the upper echelon of the Unions of Workers.

The city councils of the Unions of Workers are expected to do every thing in their power to raise the level of production and to enhance the standard of knowledge and culture of workers and toilers of Afghanistan.

It is hoped that the City Councils of the Unions of Workers will try their best to establish primary organisations within different public and private organisations including factories and industrial establishments to implement the decisons made on the top level of the workers unions and thus serve the interest of the working class.

1980-1984 FIVE-YEAR PLAN STUDIED

Committees To Begin Work

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 25 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Algiers (APS)--The standing committees of the Peoples National Assembly will begin, starting Monday 25 August 1980, to examine bills related to the 1980-1984 five-year plan and to the Appropriation Bill for 1981.

Wilaya Studies Development Plans

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 26 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] Tlemcen (APS)--The five-year plan was, on Sunday, the central piece of work taken up by a meeting held at the offices of the Peoples Wilaya Assembly [PWA] of Tlemcen, which brought together members of the PWA Economic and Administrative Committee with those in charge of the Wilaya Department of Planning.

During this meeting, proposals from the APC's [People's Communal Assembly] on the development projects of their communes were examined. From these proposals it emerges that a considerable effort will be undertaken as part of the plan to finish the entire range of projects approved for this region.

Indeed, this work represents close to 54 percent of all the programmed projects since 1970.

Other important considerations have moreover motivated the basic proposals made as part of this plan, namely the investment efforts of all sectors, economic, social, and cultural, including agricultural, which is to receive important credits principally for small and medium-sized hydraulics.

Furthermore, particular attention will be paid to the modernization and maintenance of the road network, to problems of supplying drinking water to cities, to electrification and public health.

The specialized PWA committees in this regard devoted several days to the study of these proposals.

The housing sector was, equally in this respect, the subject of proposals aimed at overcoming the delays in Wilaya projects in this field, delays which are linked to the problem of means of carrying out the projects, to supply difficulties and to the lack of semi-skilled labor.

These proposals will also be the central piece of work of the inter-ministerial committee of planning which will meet on 30 August in Tlemcen.

COUNTRY-WIDE JOINT MEETINGS OF KASMAS-APC

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 17 Aug 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by A. Belkhodja: "A Spirit of Responsibility and Commitment"]

[Text] In compliance with the recommendations of the extraordinary Congress of the FLN party, joint kasmas-APC meetings are succeeding one another throughout the entire country. The purpose of these meetings is to review the socio-economic problems which local communities are facing, problems inherent in the numerous changes they are undergoing.

The debate between militants and elected officials is always open and frank, prompted by a solicitude to bring about urgent solutions to the constraints and difficulties which crop us during the carrying out of programs decided upon. The forward march of the revolution and the confidence placed in elected officials by citizens call forth a spirit of responsibility and an absolute commitment, both of which find their full expression in the effort of edification and social progress.

Strengthening of Tiaret Distribution

The communal executive and the office of the FLN kasma of Tiaret have recently examined the entire range of points concerning the marketing sector during a coordination meeting held at kasma headquarters.

Housing and the distribution of building lots also figured on the agenda.

With regards to the latter, the committee charged with studying the dossiers devoted several night sessions at APC headquarters. A first allocation of 354 lots is about to be made available to citizens in the Sidi Khaled development.

In connection with this, the local responsibles have deplored the silence of certain national firms to whom the commune has assigned lots and who have not showed up to erect on them the projects and planned installations.

The kasma and communal executive members jointly agreed to undertake final steps to contact the companies involved in order to urge diligent utilization of the lots thus far assigned and abandoned. It must be concluded that such negligence scarcely favors the extension and consolidation of the public sector which deserves efforts as well as serious attention. In this context, it was decided to program a meeting with CASORAN responsibles for a definitive and precise assignment of lots and to thereby accelerate the start of the public health projects CASORAN has agreed to carry out.

The discussion about housing was restricted and concise, namely the application of texts in force which provide for the continuous functioning of the allocation commission with competency to investigate all dossiers.

The executives of the APC and the kasma held a second meeting to which the directors of public enterprises and offices were invited, such as SONACAT, ENC, ONALAIT, SN Sempac, SONIPEC, Souk El-Fellah, COFEL. Of the aforementioned companies, only ONALAIT and Souk El-Fellah answered the appeal of the local authorities... This intentional absence at the working sessions goes against presidential directives which insist strongly on the concentration of all responsibles for the purpose of arriving together at solutions which focus on the improvement of distribution not only during the month of Ramadhan but on a permanent basis.

The meeting which proposed to examine the situation of all the sectors then limited itself to only those present: ONALAIT and Souk El-Fellah which, it must be admitted, are regular when these current initiatives are involved. The situation of the ONALAIT distribution unit is sufficiently well known. The unit has available only rudimentary means which prevent it from supplying the totality of the seven dairas of the wilaya... An insignificant rolling fleet has gone beyong the threshold of reform. It continues nonetheless to 'roll' as best it can to satisfy distribution needs among several communes. Only in recent times has it proved to be inadequate for the needs expressed by the population... Of the 16,000 l, earmarked for the wilaya, delivery of only 6,000 l, was signed for. While waiting for the fleet to be increased, the Tiaret APC has promised to make available to the office a vehicle to supply the localities which are closest to the chief town of the wilaya. With the exception of milk, secondary products are not to be found on the market. Only very infrequently does the Tiaret unit receive secondary products from the regional unit which for its part depends on Sidi Bel Abbes and Tlemcen. It is thus on only rare occasions that Soul El-Fellah obtains supplies which the aforementioned units agree to deliver to it.

In closing it was agreed that urgent steps would have to be taken to meet the project goals of the ONALAIT production unit which was programmed several years ago but which has yet to come into existence.

This unit is obviously justified by a favorable geographic implantation since it will not be limited to supply a wilaya of 37 communes but will also provide for the needs of wilayas bordering on the South. In any case, what must not be forgotten is the feverish activity which predominates throughout the whole year in the small ONALAIT unit which with very meager resources struggles to meet the needs of a very large, spread out wilaya.

Souk El-Fellah, for its part, thanks to the premises which were handed over to it by the PAC, has managed to compensate for the empty space left unfinished for nearly five years by the SNNGA unit. The commune has just made available to the OFLA [Fruit and Vegetable Office] a piece of land which will accommodate appropriate installations from Souk El-Fellah. For presently the narrowness of the premises is such that the crowd daily runs the risk of suffocating. This crowd is justified by the very reasonable prices charged by Souk El-Fellah.

The retail market has decided for its part to no longer observe the fixed prices in force. An easy profit which is made at the expense of workers' pocketbooks has become the general rule. Only the state stores bring about a true price stabilization because supervision is ineffective. Sanctions are not proportionate to fraud, which is spreading. All one has to do is glance at ENC or SONACAT to become aware of this. These two agencies have practically become genuine beehives to which converge a colony of speculators, made up of merchants holding trade registers and phantom merchants who possess trade registers but no business, or even those uncovered by any criterion listed in regulations in force. It is to be hoped that the application of the new legislation will purge from this sector the parasites who indulge in a thousand and one practices which trouble the marketing circuit whose negation is felt directly by the consumer.

Price Rises and Speculation

The several formulae that have been applied have not really borne fruit; or at least they have perhaps partially reduced speculation. Indeed, one cannot deny the advantages of the "consumer producer" formula, which was adopted recently for refrigerators, stoves, and television sets. Another phenomenon has unfortunately burst upon the scene. This is the birth of a consumer corporation whose only consumption is the purchase, after which the product passes from hand to hand at prices which double.

There are also consumers who acquire a batch of products which they turn over to a merchant in exchange for a substantial commission for having agreed to put up their national identity card and for having undergone the fastidious chain effects. This phenomenon which does not contribute greatly to the harmony of the marketing sector deserves closer analysis. For when all is said and done, in such a confused state of affairs, how can the real consumer who uses the product for his own needs be distin-can the real consumer who uses the product for his own needs be distinguished from the one who speculates--his end concern--in order to feed the parallel market.

Concerning the SN SEMPAC [National Semolina Industry, Milling, Pasta, and Couscous Company], the local responsibles are to urge this company to build the industrial bakery whose need is making itself strongly felt. SNIC continues peddling goods with the same consignment vehicle in the absence of storage premises. SOGEDIA still relies on the Relizane unit, SONACAT pays out considerable amounts for premises it has been renting for several years. This is likewise the case with CASORAN.

The matter of investments seems to be neglected by several agencies while the municipality of Tiaret is urging them to build their exploration installations on available land. A high level approach must be made; this has been the conclusion of local responsibles who are determined to contribute effectively to the consolidation of the public sector, which constitutes and will constitute the people's gain.

WILAYA TRANSPORTATION ENTERPRISE SET UP

[Text] Mascara (APS)--The transportation sector plays a primordial role in the economic development of every region of the country. In the wilaya of Mascara, an agricultural region which numbers 450,000 inhabitants, this sector faces serious problems.

With respect to passenger transportation, the SNTV of Mascara has only 16 buses available for local transportation, of which several no longer meet current needs due to their antique vintage. To that must be added the failure to operate public passenger transportation lines assigned the moudjahidines [veteraus] and the weakness of private carriers who have available public transportation lines, but who do not satisfactorily discharge the mission which has devolved on them for lack of appropriate material means. There is also the crucial problem of school bus service which shows up the weakness of passenger transportation. In order to find a remedy to this situation, several proposals have been submitted by the wilaya services involved to competent central authorities. These suggestions relate to increasing the fleet and creating new lines within the wilaya and others which link the wilaya with certain other regions, as well as creating a wilaya-wide transportation enterprise.

In the field of private carriers, the wilaya numbers nine carriers who have available equipment which presents very real dnager to passengers.

The number of passenger transportation lines assigned to the moudjahidines totals 13. However, the different assignees, who are undergoing financial difficulties due to the lack of vehicle availability, have not been able to serve the assigned lines. Only one turn around, Oued Taria-Mascara, is presently in service.

With respect to taxi transportation, 248 vehicles are in service in the wilaya. Concerning driver training and driver licensing, the wilaya has 18 establishments. On the other hand, only one examiner presently administers tests for obtaining driver's licenses.

As for public cargo transportation, the number of vehicles under 5 1/2 tons engaged in it wilaya-wide comes to 70. These vehicles total about 136 tons overall tonnage.

Ghriss Airfield Remains Shut

The SNTR, which has available in the wilaya only one office used as a branch line, has no fleet at Mascara, which obliges the different operators to find an alternative solution.

The transport of perishable goods, especially fruit and vegetables, poses enormous problems, as does supplying other wilayas from Mascara, during peak production seasons, for potatoes and onions, for example. To that must be added the transport of merchandise of existing commercial and industrial units which number about 15 wilaya-wide. Taking into account the present situation and the importance of transporting merchandise, an SNTR presence is indispensable. A study has been undertaken of the possibility of creating an SNTR merchandise transport center in the chief town of the wilaya.

With respect to merchandise carriers working for their own account, their number has shown a decline for many reasons. Thus, out of 128 carriers who had 149 vehicles, there remain only 83 carriers who have 100 vehicles. On the other hand, public merchandise carriers with the help of vehicles of over 5 1/2 tons prossessing special temporary authorizations (STA) saw their number increase to reach six carriers who have eight (with a capacity of 8 to 12 tons) with new vehicle attributions by virtue of moudjahidine reclassification.

With respect to the wilaya's railway infrastructure, it consists of two main lines, namely Oran-Algiers, with service to Sig and Mohammadia on normal track, and Mohammadia-Bechar, with service to Hacine-Tizi-Ghriss on narrow track (120 km of track within the wilaya). The shortcomings of the rail network, the time required for car availability, accentuated by their transfer to narrow track, result in almost the total volume of merchandise in transit being shipped by truck, especially when perishable goods are involved, and this even though the wilaya has a large train station available for use at Mohammadia.

Three yards are planned in order to increase the number of cars, and a mini-train or "omnibus" will have to be placed in service between Mohammadia-Oued Taria, which will grant relief to the population centered around this axis. The link-up of Mascara's industrial zone with the Tizi station also proves to be necessary.

In short, the economic development of the Mascara wilaya requires, as far as transportation is concerned, the creation of a public passenger transportation enterprise, the setting up of an SNTR transportation center, the strengthening of the SNTV fleet and the aerial accommodation of the Ghriss airport. The fulfillment of these projects will make it possible for this wilaya to overcome the difficulties thus far encountered in the overall transportation picture.

EASING OF PROPERTY ACQUISITION REGULATIONS

[Article: "Laud Reserves: Easing of Property Acquisition Regulation"]

[Text] Algiers (APS)--Within the framework of the joint Ministry of the Interior and Ministry of Housing and Urban Development action program, and with an eye to giving decisive impetus to the concretization of the priorities drawn up by the Political Directorate in the vital field of housing, an important working session brought together, yesterday afternoon in the Government Palace, Boualem Benhamouda, member of the Politburo, minister of the interior and Ahmed Ali Ghazali, member of the Central Committee, minister of housing and urban development, in addition to representatives of the central administrations of the two ministries.

During this meeting, the following three large dockets were examined: land reserves, resorption of precarious housing, and rural housing. Important decisions were also drawn up.

With respect to land reserves and in order to encourage individual or collective housing, the streamlining of procedures heretofore employed was the first point tackled. Thus with an eye to speeding up the process of transferring lots to private individuals, the two ministers agreed on a certain number of provisions intended to improve on the procedures recently employed.

In addition to the easing of lot transfers, the government has released more than 30 million dinars which it has set apart for allotment studies which will be carried out by national (ECOTEC, CADAT...) and local planning departments.

The planning departments will be in charge, within the framework of special conventions with the wilayas, of carrying out studies of allotments intended for individual or collective housing, of furnishing, at the same time, and free of charge to buyers, housing plans which thus exempt the latter from the long and slow procedure of obtaining a building permit.

It is to be recalled that this operation involves close to 1,200 localities situated throughout the national territory and especially in the interior of the country where space and town planning constraints are less acute.

The planned streamlining is certain to beget progress in this action which has already, to date, chalked up valuable results.

The second point examined at this meeting concerned the resorption of shantytowns and the fight against illegal building.

It must be mentioned in this regards, that under the combined pressure od demographic growth and the housing crisis, regulation in respect to supervision of town planning has shown itself, put to the test of actual fact, to be inadequate and ineffectual and has been unable to avert the proliferation, in certain zones, of shantytowns and the multiplication of illegal and unauthorized uncivilized spontaneous, precarious housing.

In order to correct this situation, which seriously compromises the physiognomy of our cities, the two ministers examined the following possibilities:

--considerably streamlining the procedure for granting building permits in agglomerations of more than 2,000 inhabitants;

--submitting, on the other hand, to a meticulous procedure construction in zones of prime agricultural value whose preservation and valorization the Central Committee has, it is known, requested;

--increasing the civil and penal sanctions against infringers of town planning rules.

Concerning existing shantytowns, a joint program between the two ministries was decided upon. This program involves:

--an inventory of all insanitary and precarious housing through the registration of the identity of the occupants, the make-up of the families concerned, and the consistency of this housing;

--the obligation for local authorities to set aside a housing quota, in programs presently on-going or those to be carried out in the future, in order to progressively relodge shantytown occupants.

These measures remain nevertheless simple palliatives to the problem of insanitary housing, the real solution of which is to be found in the promotion of rural housing.

In the spirit of promoting rural housing, the two ministries decided, in agreement with the ministries of agriculture and agrarian revolution, and of planning and national development, a program of encouragement of rural housing.

This program, which fits into the policy of integrating work and housing, consists of equipping, free of charge, the fellaheen with developed lots, construction materials with a view to making it possible for them to build by themselves, with the aid of the People's Communal Assemblies and the technical branches of agriculture and town planning, individual lodgings adapted to rural environment and located close to their work.

The concretization of this program will make it possible to stop rural exodus in its tracks, and, thereby, to settle workers of the land.

In the last analysis, the range of measures adopted in this coordination meeting fits into an overall strategy which aims at rendering effective the complementarity between rural milieu and urban milieu, a preoccupation whose ultimate goal is the equitable and harmonious raising of living standards of city and country dwellers.

PLOT TO SEIZE SOVIET EMBASSY FOILED; ARMY, INTERNAL OPPOSITION DISCUSSED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 25 Jul 80 pp 33, 35

[Article by David Bishay: "In Preparation for Second Operation to Rescue Hostages, CIA Foiled Coup Attempt in Iran; Moscow Sent Commandos Disguised as Painters to Protect Its Embassy in Iran"]

[Text] On the morning of Monday, the 23rd of last June, the Soviet Embassy in Tehran contacted the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and notified the ministry's Protocol Section of the imminent arrival of 35 Soviet painters on a special Illyushin plane because the embassy building needed to be painted from the inside and the outside. The embassy asked for the necessary facilities for those painters upon their arrival in the international airport of the Iranian capital. The Protocol Section asked the embassy why it didn't use Iranian "painters" when Tehran is full of them and when they are known capable and skillful. The embassy said that for security reasons, it dediced to use Soviet workers and that it was necessary to permit them to enter the country.

The special Illyushin plane arrived on the following day. The Soviet "painters" disembarked, each carrying a big and heavy suitcase, and headed immediately for a column of black Zim cars belonging to the Soviet Embassy which took the painters to the embassy building in the center of the Iranian capital.

The Iranian Ministry of Foreign Affairs officials were not unaware that these painters had nothing to do with painting the embassy or with anything of the sort. More than a week did actually pass but the embassy made no efforts to do any painting and none of the 35 workers appeared outside its premises. The Iranian Ministry of Foreign Affairs contacted the Ministry of Defense to notify it of the matter and to inform it of its suspicions regarding the mission of these Soviet workers. Mostafa Shamran, the minister of defense and the chief official in charge of the state internal and external security, instructed his aides to watch the Soviet Embassy and the moves of the Soviet diplomats closely.

After 2 days of intensive watch, Shamran's aides informed their command that there was abnormal activity inside the embassy indicating the presence of a state of semi-emergency in it. The aides said that a large number of the Soviet guards were carrying varied weapons, including antitank weapons and gas bombs used for dispersing demonstrations. The aides also informed the command that the embassy employees were seen moving radio communication equipment to the embassy building vaults and that the residential wing of the embassy, used for the diplomats and their families, seemed to be completely empty which indicated the presence of the occupants in underground shelters.

On 28 June, Mostafa Shamran decided to make his move and his men staged a surprise raid on a special meeting of the leadership bureau of the Communist Tudeh Party and arrested most of those present, including--in addition to the party men--a number of the Iranian armed forces officers and Vladimir Golovanov, the first secretary of the Soviet Embassy.

Mostafa Shamran believed firmly that the meeting was held to stage an operation of sorts inside the Iranian capital. But interrogation of the arrested Iranians produced no material evidence and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs had to content itself with issuing an order for the deportation of Golovanov and all 35 members of the "painting" team, who had done absolutely no painting work even though more than a week passed since their arrival, within 24 hours. What is surprising is that Soviet Ambassador Aleksander Vinogradov raised no objection to the expulsion of the first secretary but objected strongly to the deportation of the housepainters. Vinogradov notified the Iranian officials that if the Iranian government insisted on deporting the Soviet workers, then all the Soviet Embassy staff, including Vinogradov himself, would leave on the same plane. When asked if this meant severance of the diplomatic relations between the two countries, the Soviet ambassador answered curtly: "Yes." The Iranian authorities then backed down on their demand for deportation of the Soviet workers and only diplomat Golovanov and his family were deported.

On the evening of Sunday, 6 July, Vinogradov contacted Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Gotbzadeh by telephone and requested an urgent meeting with him. The meeting took place only half an hour after the telephone call. During the meeting, Vinogradov delivered to Gotbzadeh the details of a scheme to seize the Soviet Embassy in an operation similar to that in which the U.S. Embassy was occupied. Vinogradov said that the plan was scheduled for implementation by midnight and that it was to be carried out by a number of armed persons led by Hojjatoleslam Mohammad Montazeri, the son of Ayatollah Montazeri. Vinogradov presented to Gotbzadeh a report on the gathering places of those armed men and a precise timetable of their movement and of their plan to attack the embassy and seize its main building. The timetable also included the names of the members involved in the scheme. The Soviet ambassador demanded that the Iranian Revolution Council adopt immediate measures to stop the operation. The minister of foreign affairs was warned that the Soviet Union is prepared to take all measures, including military force, to protect the embassy.

Less than half an hour after Vinogradov's departure from Gotbzadeh's office, the Revolution Council was holding an emergency meeting to discuss the Soviet ultimatum. The council then issued its instructions to the revolutionary guard to surround all the gathering places of Montazeri's militias and to prevent them from making any move even if the situation called for opening fire on them. After discussions lasting more than one hour with the leaders of these militias, Montazeri's forces abandoned the Soviet Embassy operation and dispersed quietly without firing a single bullet. The Iranians thought that the matter had ended at that but were then surprised by an official statement from the Soviet Government in the form of a warning against any move against the Soviet Embassy in Tehran. The official TASS news agency kept on repeating the statement for reason and for no reason despite the Iranian assurances to the Soviets that the planned move was destroyed in the cradle and that the embassy was completely safe.

However, the Iranians came to believe firmly that something was being plotted against them. An important meeting was held at the home of Ayatollah Khomeini and was attended by Ayatollah Beheshti, the leader of the Islamic Republican Party, by Ayatollah Seyyed 'Ali Khamene'i, Khomeini's personal representative in the armed forces, and by Minister of Defense Mostafa Shamran. Neither President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr nor Foreign Minister Gotbzadeh attended the meeting. They didn't even know a thing about its convocation, about what was discussed in it or about its resolutions.

Several reports gathered by Mostafa Shamran from his various intelligence sources were presented to Ayatollah Khomeini. The first report was on the increased Soviet activity inside the Iranian armed forces and on the suspicious activities of members of the Communist Tudeh Party among the army forces. The report said that there also was increased military activity in the Soviet army bases near the Caspian Sea which is adjacent to Iran's northern borders.

One of those attending the meeting asked Shamran about the source of his information on the Soviet moves north of the Iranian borders and Shamran said: "The source of the information is the U.S. intelligence and we have received the information through a third party."

Mostafa Shamran's second report was on the situation in the huge air base of (Nowcheh Howr), located near Hamadan in western Iran. This report said that a large number of the base officers and pilots were in contact with anti-revolution elements living outside the country, particularly with former Prime Minister Shahpor Bakhtiar.

In the third report, Mostafa Shamran presented his visualization of the situation in the Iranian oil area of Khuzestan and talked about the increasing popularity of Ahmad Madani, the area's former commander, among the population. Ahmad Madani lost the presidential battle to Bani-Sadr when Khomeini declared his support for the present president a few days before the elections. Madani did not forget this "intrigue" and started to agitate his supporters and followers against Khomeini's and to extend bridges of communication with the naval base in Abadan and with the army forces in the area. The report said that Madani was planning for a coup against the central government in Iran and for the secession of Khuzestan and its vast oil wealth.

Mostafa Shamran's fourth and final report was on the force opposing Ayatollah Khomeini "which has no contacts with foreign circles or with the Iranian opposition abroad." The report warned that this internal opposition is increasing, is beginning to take the form of organizations and that its popularity is rising because it is clear of any suspicious regarding its national intentions or its acting as an agent of the former regime or of any foreign countries.

The meeting lasted for hours and it was decided to carry out a quick purging operation to wipe out plots before they spread. Khomeini asked Mostafa Shamran and Ayatollah Khamene'i to prepare a list of those plotting against the regime and to present it to him.

Two days later, Shamran and Khamene'i arrived at Khomeini's residence with a list of 1,110 names including all or the overwhelming majority of the plotters in the armed forces. Shamran also brought with him a plan to destroy and liquidate the plotters by using the revolutionary guard forces that support the regime. Again, President Bani-Sadr was informed of neither the plan nor the time of its implementation.

On 9 July, Shamran started to move the forces supporting him to the army bases where opponents of the regime are concentrated. On the night of 10 July, the rapid offensive, arrests and liquidation operation started. Most of the action centered in the area around the capital, in the (Nowcheh Howr) air base and in some of the bases around the Caspian Sea. There was some resistance, especially in the Ahvaz and Mosaddaq air bases. The clashes continued until 12 July. A large number of those accused of plotting were killed, others fled and nearly 600 persons were arrested. Some of the escapees flew a helicopter and landed it in the Turkish province of (Aghri) and asked the Ankara government for political asylum.

The number of those arrested by 14 July amounted to 632 members of the armed forces, 27 of whom have already been executed. Most of those executed were high-ranking officers, including former Chief of Staff Gen Hushang Hatem and the commander of the armored corps in Khuzestan province. But it then became evident to Mostafa Shamran and his aides that a large number of the plotters were still at large and so he closed Iran's borders and its airports for 48 hours. Tehran airport was opened last Friday but the other exits have remained closed in an attempt to prevent the escapees from sneaking outside the country.

President Bani-Sadr was not informed of the move against the plotters, or of those accused of plotting, until a full day after the operation was carried out. He was then entrusted with the task of announcing the operation to the people.

By last weekend, Tehran's local radio was still urging the masses to be alert to plots and sedition, talking about the plotters' attempt to avoid arrest and to flee the country by various means and calling for cooperation with the revolution forces to make sure that they are found [arrested].

But what is more important was the repeated warnings that the authorities were broadcasting about sabotage acts against public installations and vital utilities and about the presence of a large number of agents in the country to stage operations against the Islamic revolution and Ayatollah Khomeini, its great leader.

The radio said that the agents are working for Israel, Egypt, Iraq and traitor Shahpor Bakhtiar. The radio also said that the agents are led by a group of "treasonous generals" who support the shah, live in Europe and receive their orders from the United States. The Islamic guard have intensified the guard around the U.S. Embassy where the hostages are held because of the suspicion of the presence of "cooperation" of the U.S. intelligence with the Iranian authorities in exposing the Soviet moves--suspicion that this cooperation is a mere screen for secret moves to make another attempt to rescue the hostages through exploiting the state of confusion that usually accompanies the uncovering of plots, the efforts to destroy them and the efforts to pursue and arrest escapees. All this is based on the view that the staging of a successful U.S. operation to release the hostages at this particular time would be the biggest coup that President Jimmy Carter could stage to guarantee his success in the elections which will take place in a few months.

INTERNAL STRUGGLE FOR POWER, BAKHTIAR'S CHANCES TO RETURN DISCUSSED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 1 Aug 80 pp 26-27

[Article: "Khomeyni Declares Revolution to Save Revolution; When Bakhtiar Presented His Program for Ruling Iran, Beheshti Decided to Try Him in Absentia"]

[Text] Tehran--While the Sandinista revolution in Nicaragua is celebrating the first anniversary of crushing Somoza's dictatorship and releasing the democratic liberties, the Iranian revolution, described as having come to change the face of the world, is still floundering in fearful and bloody chaos. The struggle for secular power between the civilians and the clergy has made the Iranian leaders forget thinking of the future of Iran, the homeland.

For 2 weeks now, reports of the executions carried out in Iran in the middle of the night have been increasing--the execution of army elements and of those who spread corruption on earth, who cross the borders between Iran and Iraq and who are relatives of Shahpor Bakhtiar, a former prime minister in the shah's era. Amidst the executions and the explosions, it seems that each leader is living in a state of contradiction and that each of them pretends to be indifferent, as if matters were proceeding normally, in order to bolster his leadership. Meanwhile, each of these leaders lives in a state of fear of the other leaders.

Amidst this sea of uncertainty, Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr stood before the Islamic Consultative Assembly the Tuesday before last to take the oath, under the supervision of Supreme Judiciary Council Chairman Ayatollah Beheshti, to become the first president of the Islamic Iranian Republic officially and legally. It was said that he would appoint a prime minister immediately for the awaited government. But, regrettably, Bani-Sadr has not known how to exploit his election popularity which amounted last January to 75 percent of the Iranian people, has turned a blind eye to many issues and has gone along with others at the expense of issues that he should have defended and not permitted to be destroyed. Perhaps Bani-Sadr has committed a mistake by relying too heavily on his conviction which he has declared repeatedly, namely "I am the spiritual son of Imam Khomeini," whereas it seems that the final positions taken by Khomeini is a course favoring President Bani-Sadr's main rival, namely Ayatollah Beheshti, the chairman of the Islamic Republican Party.

On Sunday, 20 July, and amidst the clamor created over foiling the coup attempt [presumably by army officers], Khomeini attacked in a statement (one that was more violent than his statement of 27 June 1980) the government, the army and the Iranian embassies abroad and urged the Islamic Consultative Assembly to reject any government formed by Bani-Sadr if its members are not 100 percent Islamic and revolutionary. This time, Bani-Sadr did not respond to Khomeini as he had done the previous time even though Khomeini dealt him a new harsh blow when Bani-Sadr announced the nomination of his son, Sayyed Ahmad Khomeini, to form the government. This rejection has been considered a blow because of its timing. A month ago, Bani-Sadr sent Khomeini a message including this suggestion [to nominate Khomeini's son for prime minister] and received the answer only after the attacks against him began to escalate. In any case, Ahmad Khomeini does not represent the personality that his father wants and does not have revolutionary political aspirations. Moreover, he is a pacifist who supports Bani-Sadr's refusal to execute "everybody." He has intervened repeatedly for the release of some of the American hostages. Moreover, he does not have the intimidating and awe-inspiring personality of his father. Observers say that he is not qualified to play any role in case of his father's death and that he will continue to be one of the thousands of clergymen in Iran, but a clergyman with a big name. In any case, Bani-Sadr failed to form a government before the parliamentary elections. After the elections, he has failed to reach a compromise on forming the government with the Islamic Republican Party. This is why many find it unlikely that he will now succeed in forming a government in which he believes, especially in the wake of Khomeini's announcement which has caused the names of technocrats and of civilians to be dropped all at once.

On the other hand, Ayatollah Beheshti, the Islamic Republican Party chairman, has nominated Jalaleddin Farsi, one of the party founders whose nomination for the presidency had been withdrawn because his mother is an Afghan. Farsi's religious fanaticism did him no good in eliminating this obstacle.

Farsi (who is very close to the Palestinians) continued to play strong roles, but behind the scenes, while waiting for another opportunity to appear. He knows that he and Beheshti represent the same line, especially since he is a clergyman in civilian clothes.

The opportunity came in the wake of the abortive attempt at Shahpor Bakhtiar's life in Paris when he "slapped" Sadeq Gotbzadeh, the Iranian minister of foreign affairs, who denounced the attempt on French television and said it was not the work of the [Iranian] government. Farsi responded to Gotbzadeh by saying that the attempt was real [sic], that it was the work of the "guards of Islam," that he --Farsi-- knows their leader personally and that he had encouraged this leader to send his men to kill the opponents of the Islamic revolution wherever they may exist in France, Germany, Britain or the United States. Farsi added: "The Guards of Islam Organization does not need offices abroad because the bullet declares this organization's presence."

Farsi's statement did not come as a result of his personal power, and this is what everybody has been aware of. It is said that he was given the green light by the imam [Khomeini] and by the Islamic Republican Party. This confused and perplexed Gotbzadeh. However, he did not issue any denial on his statement that the government had no knowledge of the issue [attempt at Bakhtiar's life] even though the imam declared that the government is useless, that things take place without its knowledge and that each of its members acts the way he likes. What worried Gotbzadeh is that the attack against him came in the wake of the attack which Khomeini had unleashed at the Iranian embassies abroad, accusing them of being "dens of licentiousness." Gotbzadeh's closeness to the imam does not mean that he is safe and this is why he did not appear in the session in which Bani-Sadr took the constitutional oath and why he declared that he will not take part in the next government. It is said that he has begun to feel that he will be the next victim, especially since the Muslim students have demanded that he be sued legally. Some people close to Gotbzadeh say that he is preparing to leave Iran to save his life, especially since the Guards of Islam have joined the Muslim students in the demand that he be brought to trial.

On the other hand, some observers have interpreted the current emergence of Jalaleddin Farsi by saying that Beheshti has made the first move in his plan for the fatal blow that he wants to deal Bani-Sadr. If Farsi were the president of the republic, Beheshti would not have created all these obstacles in his face. Moreover, Beheshti has known how to exploit Khomeini's statement on a "government whose members are 100 percent Muslim"--a statement which means a diminishing role for the people's civilian representatives in the Consultative Assembly and means the right of the assembly, which is dominated by the overwhelming majority of the Republican Party, to reject any candidate nominated by Bani-Sadr. In any case, some well-informed people say that if Beheshti succeeds in imposing Farsi as prime minister, Bani-Sadr will have no recourse but to resign. Despite his current isolation, Bani-Sadr refuses to be like the president of West Germany who stays in his residence and enjoys the title of "his excellency the president"--a situation which Beheshti wants.

Farsi's instatement can only take place with the approval of Khomeini, of course. If this should happen, Khomeini will have behaved with Bani-Sadr as he did with Mehdi Bazargan, the former prime minister. In August 1979, Khomeini stood in Qom to launch his attack on the government which lacked revolutionary faith and he accused at the time Bazargan, his government members, the army and the police of being unrevolutionary. Has Bani-Sadr now reached Bazargan's position and is Khomeini ready to declare his acceptance of the resignation which Bani-Sadr presented to him last month, especially since the price of the executions and of the arrests taking place in Iran at present is being paid by members of the National Front Party, the followers of Iranian leader Mosaddaq, who have fought the shah's regime for 25 years and most of whom are friends of Bani-Sadr who was a member of the front before joining Khomeini?

This small following of Bani-Sadr's says "the struggle between us and the clergy is already decided in their favor." However, they add: "Khomeini has not provided a definition of the Islam he wants. He also wants to be the Middle East's Mao Tse-tong and to maintain a constant revolution. Whenever we try to seek tranquillity, he rises to bring us back to a revolution that is anarchic in most of its aspects."

Bani-Sadr's group adds: "Khomeini's Islamic revolution is threatened by the Communist Tudeh Party--the only party that has exploited the chaos of the Iranian revolution to reorganize its cadres strongly and to assert that the first Mideastern communist party (Tudeh founded in 1919) has not ended and that its role in power is coming and imminent."

Some sources assert that the Muslim students who are holding the hostages in the American Embassy act on the instructions of Tudeh Party. These sources add that Beheshti is in ceaseless contact with Tudeh Party leaders. He has coordinated with these leaders from the time he was present in Germany and has continued to do so after the revolution's success. Beheshti, who is now stronger and cleverer, knows the strength of his influence on Khomeini and is preparing for the role which he will play in the post-Khomeini era.

The Iranian opposition says: Khomeini's Islam is not defined and clearcut and does not cover Iran alone. We no longer know if he wants to annihilate the traces of the Pahlavi era or the Persian heritage. He has issued his orders for the destruction of all the historical sites and for burning the books. The lion and the sun were not brought by the Pahlavi dynasty. They have been the sumbol of the Persian Iran for thousands of years. Firdaws, whose books Khomeini has ordered burnt, lived in Iran 2,000 years ago and not in Pahlavi's era." [sic]

The Iranian opposition circles add: "What is happening in Iran asserts that Khomeini and his group are on the path of decline and there is no means to stop this decline. Even if the Soviets and the Americans try the impossible, they will be able to save nothing."

The current question is: Are the tense internal struggle and the opposition abroad the only two dangers to the revolution? It seems from the course of the events that Khomeini himself is aware of the danger engulfing the revolution. He has personally issued execution orders for the first time whereas in the past he used to be notified and his approval taken [for such executions]. His successive statements diffuse the smell of his feeling that time is running short. The revolution has exhausted the people's enthusiasm while failing to realize their aspirations. Moreover, it has devoted its efforts to small issues and (has blown them up beyond all dimensions). It also seems that Khomeini has reached the stage of doubting everybody. He knows that the struggle among the Iranian leaderships is not for pleasing him but for realizing personal aspirations and this is why he has said: "If the next government looks like the present one, then we should mourn the Islamic Republic because we will have been defeated."

On top of all these revolutionary difficulties, there are the economic hardships. Inflation has reached 100 percent, in addition to 4 million unemployed workers and strikes in all areas.

Moreover, the demand [iqbal] for and the production of oil are so low that the Iranian minister of oil was compelled 2 weeks ago to reduce the price of Iranian oil by 2 dollars per barrel. Because of its problems, Iran is currently producing 800,000 barrels daily, half of which is for exportation and the other half for domestic needs. This is in addition to the shortages in all economic commodities and everyday needs.

Moreover, the minorities have started stirring again and the Baluchis, Arabs and Turkomans have joined the Kurds.

Can what Khomeini is doing at present be called an internal revolution to save the revolution? Can the execution of officers of the air force (which, along with the naval forces, Khomeini has not been able to control completely), the arrest of civilians, the accusation of Bakhtiar and others of daily coup attempts and the antagonization of Europe and of the world save the deteriorating domestic situation.

It seems that the revolution is in need of subjecting itself to self-criticism and that it has had enough domestic struggles in its name, especially since the approach of striking whoever thinks of opposition instead of devoting attention to the national interest and to building the state has enhanced the opportunities that help to destroy the revolution. This approach has also come to pose the threat of a terrible civil war.

It seems that the offhanded blows dealt by the Iranian leaders in the name of the revolution and the accusations that the world is behind the [Iranian] political and economic crises have raised Shahpor Bakhtiar's name in Iran for numerous reasons, the most important being the fact that Bakhtiar was the first to oppose Khomeini. Others, such as Hasan Nazih and other figures, joined Bakhtiar afterwards.

Second [sic], Bakhtiar predicted what would happen to Iran and to the Iranian people if the clergy assumed power.

Third, Bakhtiar was one of the few third world prime ministers who gave the press its freedom and preserved this freedom, despite the martial law existing at the time and despite the press and caricature campaigns launched against him (at present, the Iranian press, like the rest of the third world press, is being exposed to fatal blows).

AL-HAWADITH has learned from a well-informed source that contacts between Bakhtiar and the Iranian parties, such as Mojahedin-e Khalq, Cherikha-ye Feda'i-ye Khalq and the Democratic Front, have begun secretly.

Bakhtiar's circles say that Bakhtiar's program has been distributed in Iran and that this has helped to enhance his popularity. The program calls for abolishing the Revolutionary Council and forming a provisional government supported by a council in which all the workers, farmers, university professors, political and economic figures and the technocrats are represented.

Second [sic], restoring confiscated property to its owners.

Third, reinstating the retired officers in their positions.

Fourth, pardoning all political prisoners.

Fifth, resumption of the activities of the political parties.

Those close to Bakhtiar say that he accepts all the parties, with the exception of Tudeh, and add that he does not have normal relations with Moscow. So far, the Russians are not enthusiastic for him.

On the other hand, Bakhtiar's sources assert that "his relations with the United States are not good. The United States still supports Khomeini because of the hostages and is still wagering on Bani-Sadr. These sources add that Bakhtiar may not return to Iran before the U.S. presidential elections."

Regarding the coordination between Bakhtiar and the Iranian General (Ofisi), the sources close to Bakhtiar say that "Bakhtiar has his strong group in the army and this group is awaiting the 'real' opportunity to move. Moreover, Bakhtiar believes that the Pahlavi era has ended and that Khomeini's era is about to end."

In any case, it seems the Iranians have become obsessed with trials. Last Thursday, Beheshti stated that after completion of the trial of the officers and detainees (300 detainees), Bakhtiar will be tried in absentia and Iran will request his extradition by France.

If Bakhtiar returns, his program guarantees amnesty for whoever has applauded Khomeini but "Khomeini and his group will be turned over to the judiciary and will be given the right to defend themselves and to bring whomever they want from abroad to defend them. Their trial will be conducted openly."

DOWNFALL OF KHOMEYNI'S REGIME SAID TO BE IMMINENT, ALTERNATIVES DISCUSSED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 8 Aug 80 p 27

[Article: "Three Forces Lurking for Khomeyni's Regime: Army, Left and Bakhtiar: Two Traps into Which Iran Has Fallen: Hostages and Agreement on Prime Minister"]

[Text] Tehran--Last week, former Iranian Prime Minister Mehdi Bazargan was asked about the fate of the American hostages and he answered: "I don't know my own fate. So how can I predict the fate of the hostages?"

In a [telephone] contact with a friend in Tehran I asked him about his father and he said: "Thank God he is in jail. This is safer than being outside it."

A TRIBUNE DE GENEVE correspondent has said in a report from Iran: I was listening to the radio with an Iranian friend when I noticed the bitterness that painted his face. I understood the reason when he translated to me the appeal that was being broadcast from the radio by one of Ayatollah Khomeini's aides. The appeal said:

"Destroy, destroy more becuase you will [not] destroy much [presumably meaning enough] whatever you do."

The correspondent has added: Outside, the Iranian cities were drowning in dirt, chaos and the last moan.

Last Wednesday and while a 12-year old girl was being given 25 lashes because she had swum in an area of the Caspian Sea set aside for men, Ayatollah Hashemi Rafsanjani, the Iranian Consultative Assembly chairman, was speaking in the parliament about the hostages issue, promising that it would be discussed shortly. He then read a message sent by 180 members of the U.S. Congress calling for the release of their compatriots. Rafsanjani silenced the deputies who tried to make objections and comments.

When the shah died, nobody asked about the fate of the hostages because all know that their issue is not linked to the shah's life or death, especially since the United States has repeatedly declared that the seizure of the hostages has led to an international crisis.

Now that the Iranian parliament has agreed to read a message concerning the hostages, no new hope has emerged, especially since Rafsanjani himself has said to Marcus Kaiser, the Swiss charge d'affaires who delivered the message to Rafsanjani: "Tell the Americans that this issue will not be settled peacefully."

Tehran has been passing the time with rumors circulating among the people regarding the fate of the hostages. One of the rumors is to the effect that a decision has been actually taken to execute the hostages but that it has not been agreed on the timing yet. The rumor adds that Bani-Sadr is now fighting for the cancellation of this decision.

Another rumor says that in return for releasing the hostages, the Iranian leaders will demand restoration of the shah family's wealth without forgetting the more important part, namely release of the [frozen] billions of dollars.

On the other hand, Queen, the American hostage who was released due to illness, has said that the hostages themselves believe that they are closer to death than they are to life.

The trap of the hostages in which the Iranian leadership is thrashing about is countered [presumably meaning compounded] by another trap, namely agreement over the prime minister. So far, Iran is still facing a constitutional crisis which underlines the inability of all the parties concerned to agree on an "acceptable" candidate who can "shake the world," to put it in the words of one of the Iranian clergymen.

Nobody can yet imagine the uproar which will be created over whomever is chosen to become the prime minister. Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr experienced new failure last week when he succumbed to the radical Islamic group and withdrew his nomination of Mustafa Mir Salim to the post of prime minister. Bani-Sadr has thus confirmed that the Islamic Republican Party will continue to maneuver until it imposes Jalaleddin Farsi without any consideration for the impact of such a step on Bani-Sadr.

It seems that the end which Bani-Sadr and his group have reached has wiped out the charges directed against his enemies or against those who tried to plot a coup against him including, for example, Hasan Ayah, the Islamic Republican Party theoretician, who was behind the attempted coup against Bani-Sadr--an attempt called Ayah's Recordings [tasjilat ayah] (Ayah explained to students the plan to attack and oust Bani-Sadr). Ayah came out this week to say that the Iranian constitution contains numerous means to relieve the president of the republic and to elect another president.

The struggle among individuals is escalating while Iran is heading for the unknown. The seven-man committee that was scheduled to be formed and to which the Iranian people have attached big hopes has not been formed because of Ayatollah Khomeini's refusal to participate in it or to send his representative to it. So far, Khomeini is still squatting high above, watching the struggles taking place in the civil and religious institutions and being confident that this situation will tire the parties involved in the struggle and that he will remain the strongest. At the same time, Khomeini knows that release of the hostages would mean reducing the sphere of his strength and that the formation of an executive apparatus consisting of a government and legal members [sic] would also diminish his reputation though not his role.

But clinging to the principle of individual power does not eliminate Iran's domestic tragedy and does not eliminate what is being hatched around it. Internally, it is well known, all matters have come to a halt. Administrative departments are nonexistent and the decision makers are nonexistent. Even though the internal tragedy is big, it is not as important as what is happening abroad.

A well-informed source has assured AL-HAWADITH that on 2 July 1980, the western countries started to implement the resolutions they took in the Venice conference. In that conference, the west realized that it is impossible to reach an understanding with Khomeini's regime and that this regime had to be eliminated. On that day, the west agreed to go back to the Guadeloupe conference resolutions taken at the end of 1978--resolutions which adopted George Ball's theory that the solution to the Iranian problem can be based only on supporting Shahpor Bakhtiar who was the prime minister of Iran at the time.

The well-informed source added that this resolution became known to Iran and thus it decided to liquidate Bakhtiar in his capacity as the "ready alternative."

On the other hand, some western countries doubt Bakhtiar's leadership ability. However, the insistence of French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing on supporting Bakhtiar made these countries accept him. Moreover, Bakhtiar constitutes a compromise solution for all the Iranian opposition parties and for the Iranian people who do not at all welcome the return of the Pahlavi family, especially Princess Ashraf, or the return of Crown Prince Reza who is still too young to rule and who will continue to carry his father's curse with him.

This is why after the shah's death, the political observers started to project expectations indicating their certainty of the end of Khomeini's regime.

The political observers say that the opportunity is open for three forces to succeed Khomeini's regime:

1. The organized military units that are still loyal to the monarchy and that are small in number.

2. A consolidated left forming a ruling power [sic].

3. A new democratic state as projected by Shahpor Bakhtiar who has domestic and external civilian and military influence.

From these expectations, it has become certain to the observers that the accusation that Bakhtiar has tried to stage a coup attempt is nothing more than an excuse to weaken the Iranian armed forces. The Iranian leadership now has to find another charge to stick it to Bakhtiar in an attempt to liquidate him, especially since the shah's death will make the revolution unable to accuse him of being "an agent of the shah."

In any case, Bakhtiar's issue is not the only problem facing the Iranian clergymen. There is a more serious problem. The destruction of the forces that pose no real danger to Iran's future has opened the opportunity for communism to infiltrate, organize and train, especially since the resolution of the western countries to get rid of Khomeini's regime has motivated the Soviet Union to act quickly through Tudeh Party, claiming that it supports Khomeini despite the fact that everybody knows that the Soviets--though they don't want Khomeini--are against any attempt that could be staged by Bakhtiar or by General (Ofisi) who is now making the rounds in the U.S. State Department offices in Washington.

This is why there are "moderate pessimists" insofar as Iran's fate is concerned. These people expect a U.S. military move to be made shortly and say that even though the Americans did not succeed in their first attempt, their failure does not prevent them from repeating the attempt. There are also "radical pessimists" who say that those in power in Iran have not understood that fragmenting the state element will motivate those demanding self-rule to go further and demand secession. These pessimists add that the mere hint of a demand for the secession or actual independence of Azerbaidhzan or Kurdestan will make Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev enthusiastic for such a temptation, support his communist friends and instate them as rulers of Iranian provinces which were under Russia's control until 1946.

To put it briefly, the devil is gripping Iran's neck and the revolution in Tehran is still discussing the sex of the angels.

KDP CENTRAL COMMITTEE MEMBER ON FIGHTING IN KORDESTAN

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 1 Sep 80 pp 8-10

[Interview with unidentified KDP Central Committee Member]

[Text] The fighting in Kordestan has again intensified since last Wednesday. According to reports reaching Tehran, these battles have been in the vicinity of Tokab, Mehabad and Merivan, for the most part, with Kurdish rebel casualties amounting to 106 persons, while government forces lost only 39 persons. These figures ought to be taken with caution in the absence of an announcement from the rebel staff.

Owing to the ban on travel by foreign correspondents to Kordestan, actual reports concerning the forces in these areas are having a hard time reaching the outside world. LIBERATION held an interview with a member of the Central Committee of Kordestan Democratic Party of Iran who came to Europe last week.

Question: In April, President Bani-Sadr drafted a new plan of attack against Kordestan and announced at the time that Kurdish resistance would be broken. After the fall of the cities of Sanandaj, Saqqez and Baneh it has finally come out that military operations had decreased. What has happened in Kordestan over the last 2 months?

Answer: Large operations have not been undertaken but military actions have not decreased. Revolutionary guards and soldiers have launched attacks against the provinces of Kordestan, supported by helicopters. The hamlet of Ahmad Ava, for example, was completely wiped out. The greater part of the population has been successfully put to flight, but many (tens) were killed and were left behind.

There are other small villages in the Baneh region, many of whose inhabitants were immigrants, who had been brought there by the army, after the destruction of their cities to seek refuge. They have experienced severe hardships.

[Question] A year ago, no great excitement was visible in the Iranian Army about fighting the Kurds.

[Answer] This army has become more efficient and more deadly. Just as we saw in Sanandaj, Saqqez and Baneh, the army no longer hesitates to bomb the cities. Of course, the army has a big problem from the standpoint of equipment, especially spare-parts; to repair one helicopter, for example, it's necessary to take apart two others. The Shah's Army had such a wealth of reserve equipment that there are still large supplies in many areas. In recent weeks, we have seen toys in the mountains which detonated upon use. In this fashion, many children have been mutilated.

[Question] What is the role of the Revolutionary Guards?

[Answer] The disarming of "counterrevolutionaries." Since every armed Kurd, particularly a commando, is fundamentally counterrevolutionary. On this pretext, they go into the hamlets and make a general slaughter of ally and enemy alike. They even pillage. We resist whenever we can, or we strike with a direct attack. In Saqqez and Sanandaj, commandos attack guards daily and even in Kermanshah, our forces attack Revolutionary Guard headquarters, in order to wipe out any security remaining for them in a single area and to prove that there is virtually no control over occupied city centers.

We have undertaken more important actions in recent weeks. We have brought down two government helicopters at a bridgehead connecting Sardasht with the outside. Secondly, rebel artillery fire destroyed a government Army motorized headquarters at Urmia. Third, actions were accomplished at a hamlet between Naqadeh and Ashnevieh 15 days earlier. We took prisoner 70 of 300 revolutionary guards, destroyed two government tanks and took a third as spoil.

[Answer] Iran Radio-Television has practically never reported government losses, but has consistently reported innumerable deaths that are, for the most part, imaginary. Radio Iran recently announced that in an engagement we had killed 175. The engagement concerned was in fact so small that no one was wounded.

LIBERATION Comment: We have been able to confirm the reports of the Democratic Party of Kordestan on the spot--we have monitored Iran on the subject of their own losses and on that of their opponents. Last year, for example, a printed Iranian source mentioned that between 300 and 600 persons were killed in a battle prior to the fall of Mehabad; Kurdish sources counted 13 dead (6 from one side, 7 from the other). This close sort of figuring, give or take a few, more or less, is rare, a circumstance we should point out. Our radio tries daily to correct the lies broadcast by the government, but unfortunately its voice does not reach abroad.

[Question] Do you have radio equipment?

[Answer] The Voice of Kordestan in Iran broadcasts daily every hour and a half from Kuhestan, in Kurdish and in Persian.

[Question] A Paris correspondent has recently reported the assassination of "an important military figure" in Kordestan.

[Answer] An assassination attempt is always possible. To date, groups connected to General Oveysi, with the help of a few tribal chiefs from Iraqi territory, have tried on two occasions to engineer the death of Doctor Qasemlu (Secretary General of the Kordestan Democratic Party in Iran).

(LIBERATION: General Oveysi, Chief of Staff under the former Shah and known as the "Butcher of Tehran," directs irregular operations against Khomeyni from abroad, with the help of Iraq; the objectives of those operations have no connection with the objectives of the Kordestan Democratic Party of Iran. Nothing prevents General Oveysi from exploiting the leadership of the Kurdish resistance for the advancement of his own objectives, by calling for revolution in Kordestan.)

[Question] To what extent has the invasion of the major city of Mehabad, announced by Iran's leaders, been completed?

[Answer] All the cities are in the hands of the army. Between 1,000-15,000 soldiers were settled in the Mehabad garrison a year ago. The army had occupied the hills around the city with tanks and artillery. When this attack was announced for the first time, representatives of the people and political organizations held a conference with Army officials to tell them that this attack would cause harm without remedy. And to offer a proposal that the armed rebels evacuate the city on condition that the Revolutionary Guards take the same steps. For a year, soldiers had been drifting in and out of Mehabad, without arms and without business there. The Army accepted these proposals but did not keep its own promise. It seems as though the Army wants to occupy the city with tanks and turn the city into a power-base. From a military point of view, this would be useless. However, psychologically it would be a step towards intimidating people by saying "we took over Mehabad."

[Answer] Without being optimistic we can say that in a short period of time our military organization is better than it was last year, even in the occupied cities. The morale of the people is also better. People have experienced the fire of war and have understood that by fighting together something can be accomplished. As to the future, I must say that in months of parleys nothing has made me think that the enemy have any desire to negotiate. We know from reliable sources that the Ayatollah Khomeyni had ordered government representatives to put all our cities under siege before the parleys were held. And afterwards we prepared ourselves for a long war. We know no other choice."

[Question] Soon, 6 months will have elapsed since the date when Bani-Sadr said that you could not continue to resist another 72 hours....

[Answer] You, yourself see the result. The Army will take Mehabad. And what afterwards? Another month and the season will change. Then it will be our turn to launch an attack.

Battles At Mehabad

Yesterday Iranian authorities denied REUTER's report regarding severe fighting between soldiers and Kurdish irregulars in and around the city of Mehabad. Iranian authorities are saying that positions in and around Mehabad were quiet last night, but that scattered encounters have taken place in Kurdish-settled areas of west Azerbaijan.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT SEEN GAINING IN NEXT ELECTION

Tel Aviv HATZOFEH in Hebrew 7 Sep 80 p 1

[Article: "R. Ben Natan, General Secretary of Hapo'el Hamizrahi: Religious Judaism Will Come out of the Coming Elections Stronger"]

[Text] Refa'el Ben Natan, secretary general of Hapo'el Hamizrahi, in conversation with "Weekly Diary," said that as it turned out, not only would NRP not be weakened by the affair of the Ministry of Religious Affairs, but that it would come out of the coming elections strengthened.

He explained that many religious Jews had been hurt by the recent affair, and that they would at last understand that their natural place was in NRP. The speaker compared this phenomenon to persecutions of Jews in the Diaspora, which strengthened and united Jews, so that the more they were persecuted, the more they reacted with loyalty to Judaism.

Professor Yitzhaq Shamir, Judicial Advisor to the Government, told "Weekly Diary" that the reports that are being published about this affair in the news media are unnecessarily and unjustifiably harming persons whose names are involved in the affair. These reports also harm police work and impair the investigation, Professor Shamir added.

[Comment of Minister of Interior]

"At my age and as an experienced public servant I am not frightened by the arrows that are aimed at me; some arrows are weak and some are poisoned," said Dr Yosef Burg, minister of Interior, when he was asked to comment on the investigation of the Ministry of Religious Affairs. "I think these arrows are made of paper, spittle, and baseless defamation." When asked whether he wanted to continue to be considered Number One in NRP, Mr Burg said: "It is desirable that they should all continue to consider me Number One, and that's how it will be with the help of God and the voters." "Someone is stirring things up on the inside, and even so, there has never been such a period of internal peace in NRP as there is today."

"They simply picked a young Sephardic minister, and decided to gain control of him, as though saying, 'Let's get them,' in order to get rid of him," said Asher Lazimi, deputy secretary of NRP, to "Weekly Diary." The speaker defined the investigation of the Ministry of Religious Affairs and Minister Abu Hatzeirah as "a war of Ashkenazim against Sephardim."

"What answer could I give in this matter other than an ethnic one?" said Mr Lazimi, emphasizing that never before had there been an attack on a government ministry such as the present one on the Ministry of Religious Affairs. "We are suffering because the minister is Sephardic and has brought in many Sephardi assistants. So what could I say when they asked me if this is an ethnic matter? Let us hope that it may be proved false," he added.

POLL ON BEGIN--The public opinion poll quoted last night by Prime Minister Begin proudly at the "Moqed" program, where he said that the poll put him in second place in performance in the state of Israel, actually gives one of the lowest marks in the list of personalities. In the poll, which was conducted by Dr Mina Tzemah on behalf of the Van Leer Foundation, respondents were asked to grade various persons on the quality of their performance. Begin got seventh place, behind Shlomoh Lahat, mayor of Tel Aviv, and Minister Sharon. The poll was taken in March 1979. Top grade went to President Navon (92.8%), next to Weizman (81.6%) who was still serving as Minister of Defense; Teddy Kollek (80.2%), Chief of Staff Eytan (75.4%), Shlomoh Lahat (65.9%), Ariq Sharon (60.2%), and Begin (57.8%). Another question dealt with rating different persons according to their faithfulness to "Love thy neighbor as thyself." Here Begin got third place (62.9%), after Navon (84.4%), Kollek (63.5%), and ahead of Raful (62.4%). It should be noted that Rabin and Peres got lower marks than Begin in the two polls; Rabin was ahead of Peres. [Text] [Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 4 Sep 80 p 1] 9045

KIBBUTZ OPINION ON GOLAN--At yesterday's executive committee session of Kibbutz Artzi at Kibbutz Artzi House in Tel Aviv, Dov Peleg, secretary of Kibbutz Artzi (KA), read the KA resolutions on the proposal to impose Israeli law in Ramat Hagolan: "The Executive Committee of KA supports the MAPAM position that the final boundary of the Golan Heights shall be a vital component of any peace agreement with Syria. Nevertheless, KA opposes the creation of conditions that will prevent any negotiations. Therefore, we oppose the initiative that has just been taken, which is harmful and unnecessary, to impose Israeli law in the Golan Heights. There is danger that additional political legislation like the "Jerusalem law," which the MAPAM Knesset members voted against, will cause Israel additional political damage that will be hard to repair. KA reaffirms its stand behind the "Kibbutz Geshur" policy, which calls on all the settlers in the Golan Heights to declare that no settlements there will become an obstacle to peace. KA sees it as its duty to influence all elements that undertake peace negotiations on behalf of Israel with Syria, to achieve vital boundary adjustments for the sake of the security of the State of Israel. NATURAL GAS--Tests carried out yesterday at Drilling Site Notarah One, in the Huleh valley, indicate good prospects for finding natural gas in commercial quantities. Gas is flowing from the bore without difficulty. The opening was shut yesterday, until a decision is taken whether or not to continue drilling in this field. According to the program already announced, additional drilling was to be carried out in the 'Emeq Huleh district in October, but after yesterday's results, it is possible that the additional drilling may be started sooner. The drilling equipment that dug Notarah One was supposed to move on to another site, but in view of the finds the drilling programs may be changed. Only in the near future will details be available on the quantities of gas in 'Emeq Huleh. A person involved in the drilling said yesterday to a HA'ARETZ reporter that if the results at the other drilling sites will be like those already obtained, then there are good prospects for a substantial gas field in the 'Emeq Huleh district. 1979 PRODUCTIVITY RISE--At the session of the supreme commission on strengthening the productivity of labor and manufacturing, headed by the Minister of Labor and Social Betterment, Dr Israel Katz, with the participation of representatives of government, employers, and the Histadrut, Israel Medan, general manager of the institute of labor and manufacturing productivity, reported yesterday that in 1979 there was almost no increase in productivity, and that the increase in the business sector was only 1 percent. He pointed especially to the 2 percent increase in the industrial branch, which contrasts with decreases of 1 percent in agriculture and 8 percent in construction. He said that some of the moderate increase could be attributed to lack of exploitation of production resources and manpower, due to the economic slowdown at the end of 1979. Another reason is the unfulfilled expansion of manufacturing after many workers had been hired by industry and construction in hopes of such expansion. Dan Prufer, the employers' representative, reported that the public now recognizes the importance of the effort to raise labor productivity, and with properly integrated publicity it should be possible to promote this subject. He mentioned, among other things, an experiment at his firm in which the installation of air conditioning increased labor productivity substantially. Sha'ul Ben Simhon, Histadrut representative, emphasized the need to examine the recommendations of previous commissions, to learn which ones had been recommended for immediate implementation, and why they had not been implemented. Attorney Nahman 'Uri, of the Ministry of Labor, emphasized that there are legal arrangements in existing collective agreements that make increases in productivity possible, and the reasons why these have not been implemented should be investigated. In its coming sessions the commission will concentrate on prevention of absenteeism, problems of shift labor, work load and productivity, climate and productivity, and motivation of industrial workers. ISLAMIC COUNCIL CHAIRMAN INTERVIEWED ON VARIOUS ISSUES

Kuwait AL-HADAF in Arabic 10 Jul 80 p 15

[Interview With Shafiq al-Wazzan, Islamic Council Chairman and Islamic Grouping Member; "Islamic Council Chairman to AL-HADAF: Dialogue With Lebanese Front Has Its Conditions; South Is Wailing Wall and Extortion Card and Solution Is in Striking Zionism and U.S. Presence"]

[Text] Beirut--AL-QUDS PRESS-- AL-HADAF correspondent has carried the issues of detente, formation of the new government, the army, the situation in the Lebanese National Movement, the Islamic visualization of the solution for the security problems on the Lebanese arena, the south in the wake of the repeated Zionist attacks and of the occupation of part of its territories, the dialogue with the isolationist forces, the ceaseless contacts between the National Movement and the Islamic Grouping and other issues to Lawyer Shafiq al-Wazzan, the Islamic Council chairman and the Islamic Grouping member, for a comprehensive interview. Following is the text of the interview:

Talk of Detente

[Question] There has been increased talk about detente recently even though nothing new has developed in this regard. Does this mean an attempt on the part of the authority [government] to drug the citizens or are there practical steps heading toward implementation.

[Answer] This question, especially the second part, would be better answered by the government officials because they are the ones in possession of the facts and the plans that enable them to say whether there are such steps or not. As for the increased talk about detente, this is natural because what do we expect of a patient other than the talk about health, recovery and the means of treatment to attain such recovery. Perhaps it was the epitome in which the will of the Lebanese was reaffirmed when this will agreed to support the principles of detente declared by the president of the republic on 5 March 1980. These principles were supported again in the recent consultations urged by President Sarkis and Prime Minister al-Huss. As a result of these consultations, the two have gained new approval coupled, insofar as some people are concerned, with signing the exact minutes of the consultations.

Those Obstructing Legitimacy

[Question] In your view, which are the forces obstructing detente?

[Answer] I prefer to have the question ask: Which are the influential forces obstructing detente? This phrasing would include the political forces and the military forces. Essentially, detente means a return to legitimacy and acknowledgement of all the authorities of this legitimacy. If these forces declare their support for the principles of detente, then we expect them to be true to their word and to abstain, even abandon, any actions that oppose the legitimacy [legitimate government] or that are in conflict with it. Any side that fails to do so would be the side obstructing the legitimacy. I have previously said that we, the Muslims are used to taking off our shoes before we enter any holy place. Therefore, whoever wants to enter the "sanctity" of the legitimacy must shun whatever is not compatible with it. The obstructionists, in my view, are those who do not abide by this rule.

Continuous Plot

[Question] What is the Islamic Grouping's evaluation of the current situation on the Lebanese arena in the wake of the intensifying security incidents in the nationalist areas and what are the means to contain such incidents?

[Answer] First, I would like to make it clear that I am not talking in the name of the Islamic Grouping but that I am expressing my view as a member of this grouping. Our evaluation of what is happening in our area is derived from our unchanging view, namely that we are living under a continuous plot that serves neither the Lebanese interest nor the Arab interest, including the Palestinian interest.

(Al-Wazzan added) An image occurs to my mind here. It is as if the plotters have succeeded in taking Lebanon's page and tearing it into two parts and then tearing each part into two more parts and so on. They will continue in this course until the page is torn into shreds, until Lebanon disappears and until all the goals of the plot aimed against the Lebanese people and the Palestinian people are realized. Many may have been dragged into this game unwittingly and as a result of real patriotic enthusiasm. Others may be hirelings or agents who perform their role to serve the plot and the enemies. A flagarantly obvious example is Sa'd Haddad and the border militias.

Dialogue That Brings Us Closer

[Question] It is rumored that the bridges of dialogue have been extended between western and eastern Beirut but that the isolationist forces constantly claim that there isn't a legitimate Muslim side to hold the dialogue with. What is your opinion of this?

[Answer] When the turn of dialogue comes and when the Islamic Grouping becomes convinced of the inevitability of the dialogue, then this grouping will not hesitate and will not engage in the dialogue secretly. In fact, there is no contact between the grouping and the Lebanese Front. It is true that some members of the Lebanese Front declared at the outset of the events that the Muslims do not have those who speak in their name. This was during the period of feverish arrogance. But after the tempers cooled, we have heard more than one appeal inviting the "Islamic Grouping" as the side to hold the dialogue on the part of the Muslims to reach agreement. The Islamic Grouping has even been censured for allowing itself to sit with the Palestinian resistance leaders and not with the Lebanese Front members. The truth is that there are several reasons that have obstructed and that continue to obstruct such a dialogue whose time has not come yet because the Lebanese Front still has weapons in its hand whereas the Islamic Grouping has never resorted to arms. In the supreme interest and in the interest of those for whom the grouping speaks, the grouping doesn't find it appropriate that one of the two sides engaged in the dialogue be armed while the other is not, not to mention other matters that are very important to us and that require a frank position--meaning the dealings with the Zionist entity and the position that should be taken in this regard in the wake of Sa'd Haddad's and others' involvement in such dealings in an obvious manner with any condemnation or objection [by the Lebanese Front]. Add to this that at the present time, we all follow the path of agreeing on the legitimacy, represented in the government which has laid down certain rules for this agreement which we have all accepted. Beginning the implementation of this agreement will place us naturally on a path, which we hope will be long, serving Lebanon and its national causes. We believe that after all the events and lessons we have gone through we must turn a new leaf on the basis of the same principles on which Lebanon the homeland was established in 1943--meaning a homeland that is not the base nor the path for imperialism and a homeland in which all coexist in love and with constant aspiration for marching toward equality, fusion and faith in this affiliation with the Arab homeland surrounding us. These rules will lead us all toward a dialogue for which, we hope, the time will come through the way each of us conducts himself to bring that day closer.

Principles and Ideas

[Question] The governmental [cabinet] situation is attracting at present all the official and partisan attention. Is there a certain candidate for the Islamic Grouping or do you support Prime Minister al'Huss? What, in your opinion, is the solution: A national unity government or a government of political leaderships [fa'aliyat]?

Focusing on Principles and Ideas

[Answer] First, the governmental [cabinet] situation is undoubtedly the focus of everybody's attention. Insofar as the Islamic Grouping is concerned, what is of sole concern to me in the candidate for the premiership is that he possess the qualities that enable him--through ability, experience, integrity and moderation--to shoulder the responsibilities existing under the present conditions. The candidate should also be able to attract as many forces as possible in order to bolster legitimacy's march toward restoring all its powers and toward establishing these powers in all parts of the country. By virtue of the nature of its structure, it is natural for the Islamic Grouping not to follow the course of nominating a certain candidate and to focus its attention on the principles and ideas by which a candidate abides and through which he expresses the will of those he represents and through which he aspires to serve Lebanon sincerely and serve the issues that concern Lebanon at a level that preserves the good relationship with the Arab brothers and preserves the role that the Arab brothers expect Lebanon to play--a role which we have always described as a vanguard role and which we hope Lebanon will regain when it regains its health.

Army for All

[Question] The army crisis continues to be a basic obstacle in which there has been no change. The political Marunism is still sitting atop the army's throne and engaging in sectarian and factional practices in the army. What is your opinion regarding the army issue and how do you view the army's future?

[Answer] The way the question is phrased gives the impression that nothing at all has changed insofar as the issue of this establishment is concerned--an establishment to which we give the major importance in any new upsurge in Lebanon's life. The truth is that the new defense law has made an important stride in laying the basis for building the army on sound and safe foundations. We expected organizational decrees to be issued in a quick succession that provides the opportunity for building this establishment in a manner that pleases us all--a manner that pleases us not as Muslims nor as Christians but pleases us nationally because we aspire for the army to be the living model for how all the legitimate establishments should be. The soldier who pawns his blood does so for the sake of Lebanon and not for the sake of a certain sect. This is why our hopes have been attached to the structure of this army. We do not want any step in this structure to shock us. On the contrary, we want every step to bolster confidence in this army so that all may rally behind it and so that it may be acceptable to all as the state's military arm which protects the borders against the Zionist enemy and preserves the [state's] sovereignty.

South Is Extortion Card

[Question] How do you view the developments in the situation in the south after the intensified Zionist shelling and "nibbling" operations against the southern territories--operations whose effects have reached Sidon--at a time when Arab, international and official Lebanese silence prevails insofar as this situation is concerned?

[Answer] This poor south has turned into a wailing and moaning wall, as if dignity and sovereignty are realized only through wailing and moaning, even at the walls of the United Nations and of its poor Security Council. I do not at all agree with the word 'silence' contained in the question. It is unfair to forget the Lebanese, Islamic and friendly statements and moves made regarding whatever concerns us, whether in the south or elsewhere. As for the Palestinian issue which has collided with [irtatamat] with the issue of the south in one way or another, the word silence must be replaced by the word strangulation [khanq]. All the resolutions issued in the interest of the south or in the interest of the Palestinian brothers have been strangulated by a giant who turns dwarf in the face of Zionism and becomes an instrument in its hand, never hesitating to use the "veto" to strangle all resolutions--a giant that then turns again mighty in every form of aid it advances to the Zionist entity.

The south is an extortion card to which the Zionist enemy wants to cling through coordination and agreement with the United States. If we want to save the south, then we should stop weeping and wailing and should look for the means with which to strike the hand of the Zionist enemy and of the United States so that we may loosen its grip, make it abandon the card of the south and give the opportunity to right to prevail.

Grouping and National Movement

[Question] What is your view of the changes that have taken place in the Lebanese National Movement and do these changes mean the presence of differences inside the Central Political Council of the national and progressive parties and forces?

[Answer] These changes are an organizational matter that concerns the parties operating within this framework--matters in which we do not interfere and on which we express no opinion. All that we hope for is that we all agree on serving Lebanon and the other issues that concern us sincerely and selflessly.

[Question] Is there coordination between the Islamic Grouping and the Lebanese National Movement?

[Answer] Coordination in its organized sense does not exist at present even though I tried at the time of the late Kamal Junblatt to perform a role of the kind in my capacity as chairman of the Islamic Council. Were it not for some simple differences, we would find that we are essentially proceeding along the same national and pan-Arab line despite some actions that took place outside this framework [at times]. We used to draw attention to such actions in order to serve the supreme interest which we aspire for. Now we find that the conditions through which we have passed have narrowed the gap of difference in ideas and means [between us] and some prominent leaders of the National Movement, especially in the wake of the meetings that have taken place between Walid Junblatt, the Socialist Progressive Party chairman, the Islamic Grouping and the Front for Preservation of the South--meetings that have brought many of the views, visualizations and aspirations closer to each other.

LEBANESE FRONT'S TELEVISION DISCUSSED

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 4-10 Aug 80 p 13

[Article: "'Free Lebanon Television' Awaiting Right Circumstances"]

[Text] The Lebanese Front's television has started its tests on channel 12 which the authority has tried to use.

After Charles Rizq, the chairman of the board of directors of the Lebanese Television, submitted his resignation in the wake of the kidnapping to which he had been subjected 2 weeks ago and during which, it is said, he was told by the Lebanese Forces to stop operating channel 12 and to leave it free for the experimental transmission of the Free Lebanon Television, another issue emerged--an issue which all have thought to be a mere maneuver or a mere experiment which the Lebanese Front has wanted to carry out after the success of the Voice of Lebanon Radio and the subsequent emergence of the "Voice of the Free Lebanon" a few years later.

It is evident in this case that the front, in the wake of its success in the sphere of radio information, has sought to expand the sphere of its work by setting up a television company with a board of directors consisting of the front's partisans--a television company that propagates the front's policy and supports its positions. Numerous journalists have noticed that the important events and occasions have been recorded on videotapes by cameras bearing the symbol [words dropped], i.e. the symbol of the Free Lebanon Television and that most of these films and tapes have been recorded for storage and for the archives.

What is the truth of the preparations for this television?

It is certain that the Lebanese Forces have purchased 80 percent of the equipment from France, the FRG, Britain, the United States and Italy. The help of German experts has been employed to select the transmission site. The cost has reached nearly 2 million [Lebanese] pounds so far. It is said that three centers are already prepared: The Teachers Institute in Junyah where the Educational Television Center has been set aside for film making, a center in Adunis for management, editorial and production and one of Kasrawan's mountaintops for transmission.

But contrary to what has been said, the board of directors has not been formed yet because several proposals are still under discussion. The responsibilities have not been distributed either. As for the experimental transmission, it has been shifting from channel to channel for more than a year with the aim of selecting the most suitable wavelength. But on the other hand, the state has resorted to jamming this transmission, especially on the channels used for experimental transmission, with the aim of preventing the danger of the seizure of these channels. It is said that the technicians have been inclined toward channel 12 because it has remained unused for a long time and because the technical resources are suitable for it. This is why the disagreement took place with Rizq who, on the instructions of the higher authorities, had put into operation every channel likely to be selected by the Lebanese Forces.

The starting date for transmission has not been set yet because the start is awaiting three things: The decision to start operation which can be taken only with the unanimous approval of all the Lebanese Front's leaders, the opportune political circumstance and, especially, completion of the equipment. It must be pointed out that a number of technicians have been sent to attend training courses abroad and that it is not unlikely that technicians who had worked previously in the Lebanese Television and left it during the events because of their partisan affiliation will be used.

It seems that few people have viewed the experimental transmission which has never been announced. Few people have picked up the transmission accidentally and have found that it focuses at times on the slogan of the Lebanese Forces or shows one of the tapes recorded during an important occasion.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS SAID TO BE DETERIORATING

Paris AL-WATAN AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 11-17 Aug 80 p 36

[Article: "Economy: Maelstrom of Starting Anew"]

[Text] The security setbacks are almost timed to sabotage whatever remains of the seasons of the Lebanese economy which has been dragging its tragedies for 5 years.

Between the end of 1977 and the end of 1979, missed profits in the Lebanese exports sector as a result of security setbacks have been estimated at 2.5 billion pounds. The figure rises to nearly 5 billion Lebanese pounds for the entire Lebanese production, of which the exports constitute one half. The figure may even double if the other economic sectors, such as tourism, trade and public utilities, as well as the drop in the productivity of the fundamentally limited public sector, are taken into consideration.

This year's events have had no less effect than the events of the past 2 years. Perhaps this year's events have been even more serious and severe. Enduring these events--not to mention the anticipation of more such events and the accompanying fear and refrainment from the implementation of any long-range projects--is almost a miracle.

These events have caused the Lebanese economy to lose its components and have deprived it of the element of growth because they have covered the entire homeland and because they have (erupted simultaneously throughout the country at times and erupted in different parts at other times).

Perhaps the first negative aspect resulting from these setbacks is the undermining of any long-range plan. Economic planning is based on clear vision in the medium and long range to realize balance in production, to study costs and to assess transmitted profits. But the continued lack of security has turned the Lebanese economy into the pawn of circumstances, or rather this economy has become an impulsive economy. This pattern under which the Lebanese economy lives spurs the investor to produce by any means and at any cost to secure a quick profit capable of yielding the capital before the anticipated destruction hits his establishment.

Tourism is Victim

This pattern of pressure planning is evident in the industrial sector which is one of the most heavily damaged sectors and which faces difficulties in growth, in production, in marketing and in labor as a result of the weakened production structures causing productivity to drop to a level below that of 1977. These difficulties have caused the Lebanese commodity to be unable to compete with similar commodities in the Arab markets.

Perhaps the connection of the industrial sector with the facts of the security conditions and the ability of this sector to overcome to a degree the negative effects of these conditions and to adapt to the pattern imposed on it have made it possible for this sector to continue producing until now. But what is true to the industrial sector can [not] be true to the tourism sector, for example.

The tourism sector is the sector most heavily damaged so far, not as a result of the tourist installations that have been destroyed or damaged but primarily as a result of the change in the tourism conditions provided under a state of security. This is why the type of the clientele of hotels and tourist establishments has changed and has turned from foreign clientele, especially Arab clientele, into a local clientele, with the exception of foreign business men who stop over in Beirut and spend a few days in it. The Beirut hotels occupancy rate has dropped from 65 percent before 1975 to nearly 20 percent at present whereas the Mount Lebanon hotels, especially in the areas experiencing security setbacks [sic], have continued to operate beyond capacity as a result of those fleeing the events. What is said about these hotels can also be said about the summer resort towns which have been emptied by the war from their multinational tourists with their various fashions, dialects, customs and traditions and have been turned into a void aspiring for vitality and into resorts where terror, fear and escape take refuge. These are elements that have changed the features of the tourism map.

With the extension of the security setbacks to new areas, the modern tourist facilities on the coast and in the mountains have also been exposed to damage. What draws attention about these setbacks is that they assume at the outset of every summer a more violent character than in the winter, thus certain areas benefit from the monies of those who can even hardly secure their sustenance.

Loans to Outside World

One of the negative aspects of the security setbacks is that they have delayed the phase of reconstruction which requires nearly 20 billion pounds to restore all the sectors to their conditions before the events. Since the creation of the Development Board in March 1977, this board has not been able to carry out a single project to rebuild what has been destroyed, except for restoring the official administrations and independent establishments, enlarging the airport, restoring the port and controlling the loans concluded to implement projects on the Lebanese soil.

The halt of projects in Lebanon narrows, in addition to the employment market, the opportunity for the Lebanese banks to invest their assets. This has motivated these banks to invest these assets abroad instead of investing them in the national economy. This inclination became evident in 1979. In 1978, loans to the outside world rose by 282 million pounds compared to loans of 1,873,000,000 pounds advanced to the national economy whereas the increase in foreign loans amounted in 1979 to 3,327,000,000 pounds compared to 1,102,000,000 pounds in loans to the national economy. In January and February 1980, the foreign loans rose by 721 million pounds compared to a rise of 394 million pounds for the national economy. This explains the rise in the price of foreign currencies and the drop in the value of the Lebanese pound in the exchange market. All of this has intensified inflation and has created in the banks a surplus that has not flowed into the investment channel.

The public utilities have also suffered heavy damage, beginning with the ports--especially Beirut port which has suffered and continues to suffer heavily from any security setback in either of Beirut's two areas. There has been an obvious drop in the number of ships and in their load capacity since last May whereas ships had to wait for their turn at the piers in March and April. Moreover, work has been paralyzed in Sidon port and affected in Tripoli port. Even though work at Beirut airport stopped only during the recent strike, the events have had an effect on both aircraft and passenger traffic --and ending with the private sectors and the public utilities. There is also the effect of the events on the public sector and on paralyzing its administrative work as a result of the negligence and chaos caused by the events, especially in the ministries and departments performing public services.

Corrupt Administration

There remains the Lebanese administration which has become more paralyzed and corrupt under the impact of the events. The departments performing public services have reached the point where they no longer deal with the problems of the infrastructures with the same determination they used to display before the events. The only concern of all civil servants, both high-ranking and minor and officials and of officials in charge and subordinates, has become that of accumulating money either by demanding increased wages and allowances for extra responsibilities or through illicit means.

No department or agency is free of the greed for money--a greed that has turned into a common factor among all the administrations. In the real estate offices, no transaction is concluded before the "fees" for it are paid. In the financial departments, no fee or tax can be paid easily and no formality can be performed without waiting in desk drawers for days, if not lost. In the electricity and water agencies, the departments of the Ministry of Public Works, the State Employees Cooperative, the Ministry of Social Affairs and in all the other departments, there are middlemen and specialists who perform the formalities in return for extra wages, especially in the Vehicle Registration Agency. Matters have reached the point where the civil servants have turned into "honorary employees" attracted to their jobs by nothing other than their monthly wages and by their influence that has turned into a pipeline through which money flows into their pockets, as is the case in the Customs Department, the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Economy and Commerce.

As for the Lebanese citizen, he has turned into the sole victim that endures the consequences of all of this. This citizen perhaps pays the highest tip, not to say bribe, in the world in order to be able to pay his due taxes and fees. Meanwhile, the public services are in a constant state of chaos. Roads have turned into furrows. Electricity, despite the new equipment and the increase in its prices, is still subject to outages. Often, the capacity drops below 90 volts and paralyzes industrial production. Fuel crises are successive and only death is less difficult than getting medical care. Price control, drugs, [social] insurance formalities performed and other services have become impossible.

Whenever a complaint is voiced, the official in charge has one of two answers: It is either that "the number of employees is inadequate: or "what do you want us to do?" And each official has a partisan group backing him. We should keep in mind, though, that the number of civil servants in the Lebanese administration exceeds the required number by nearly 13,000 civil servants.

NEW HEAD OF MARONITE ORDER ELECTED

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 4-10 Aug 80 p 13

[Article: "Maronite Order Has Won 'Holy Spirit'"]

[Text] Politics Stayed out of the Maronite Order retreat during which the order's new head was elected. Will the new head do the same [stay out of politics]?

On 30 August, the Maronite Order concluded a retreat which it had convened on 28 August [date as given, see publication's date] to elect Father Bulus Nu'man as its general head for 6 years to replace Abbot Sharbil Qassis. The synod also elected the following four new directors: Ilyas Khalifah, director and general deputy; Athanasyus Jalakh, Antunyus al-Sayfi and Tuma Muhanna as general directors.

The election session was headed by Bishop George Abu-Sabir, the Bishop of Latakia, on assignment from the (eastern synod) in Rome. In a speech preceding the vote, the bishop stressed the church's spiritual and social responsibilities in compliance with the instructions of Pope Paul II.

But the preparations for the elections had actually started 15 days before convocation of the synod and numerous names were presented. However, serious competition was confined to Abbot Qassis and Father Nu'man. Eforts were exerted with Oassis to persuade him to withdraw and support a third name but those efforts failed, keeping in mind that Qassis needed two thirds the votes for his renewal to be legal whereas a new head requires only one half the votes plus one vote to be elected.

When Qassis stressed that he would continue the campaign, which remained calm and which was described as having been characterized by an "athletic and priestly spirit," all exerted efforts to keep the elections within the synod and to keep them remote from the charged atmosphere between the Marunites. There was also agreement between the candidates to reject any intervention by Marunite politicians to tip the balances in favor of a certain candidate so that such a candidate's loss may not be considered an act aimed against those supporting him and so that the Marunite divisions may not get deeper.

Positive Points for Qassis

Those supporting Qassis's return consider the positions he has taken during the Lebanese war, especially the two-year war, positions dictated by the circumstances. In Qassis's opinion, the Marunite sect has been in danger and the Marunite Order can do nothing but take a clear position and cannot claim to be neutral. In this particular sphere, Qassis has disagreed with the Marunite Patriarch more than once and their positions have been contrasting. Qassis's supporters also underline the flexibility and wisdom with which he has dealt with the inter-Marunite conflict that has caused the north to break away from the Lebanese Front. Qassis has maintained normal relations with all. It is also the opinion of Qassis's supporters that the country is undergoing at present conditions similar to those prevailing during the two-year war. Consequently, he must continue to be present.

But another current has risen to demand reconsideration of the order's role and to stress the need for focusing on its spiritual and social message and for continuing its equal relationship with all and without any discrimination. Abbot Butrus al-Qazzi, president of the Holy Spirit University, had visited the north a week earlier and had explored ex-President Sulayman Franjiyah's opinion on the election of Nu'man. The ex-president assured Abbot al-Qazzi his respect for the rule of nonintervention and the need for the new order head to serve all the Marunites and not to succumb to the logic of one of their factions.

The elections did take place and Nu'man won by a vote of 47 compared to 40 votes for Abbot Qassis. Two votes were cast for Father Basil Hashim who had withdrawn in favor of Nu'man. During the synod retreat, Qassis was careful to display his continuing good relations with Nu'man and to congratualte him immediately upon his success.

In the address he made following his election, Nu'man stressed: "We are not for one faction or area but for all factions and areas." It has been noticed that the competition between the areas was not sharp during the elections even though the monks of Byblos supported Qassis and those of al-Shuf supported Nu'man. However, the political inclinations were not evident.

It is known that Nu'man is a specialist in Marunite history and that he is preparing a plan for the order's future work. Politically, the question still raised is: Will he take part in the Lebanese Front meetings even though some know that he has no admiration for some of the traditional leaders?

It seems that the Holy Spirit University has emerged triumphant in these elections. Father Tuma Muhanna is dean of the university's School of Philosophy, father Iiyas Khalifah is the dean of its School of Theology and Abbot Nu-man is the dean of the university's History School.

THEORY BEHIND REVOLUTIONARY COMMITTEES EXPLAINED

Tripoli AL-ZAHAF AL-AKHDAR in Arabic 21 Jul 80 pp 8-9, 2

[Article by Ahmad Ibrahim: "Why the Revolutionary Committees?"]

[Text] The revolutionary man will not be able to bring about revolutionary change, exercise force, or deal with the circumstances of society in general unless there is a definite program to which this revolutionary and other revolutionaries are committed so that their action will be productive.

So that the revolutionary's action will not be suicidal and hopeless, he resorts to establishing a program of action which unites him with his fellow revolutionaries. By so doing, they define their methods of action and the goals they are endeavoring to achieve, and they establish a precise timetable for these tasks based on exhaustive study conducted by the revolutionaries in the light of their understanding of revolutionary theory.

The uniting of a group of revolutionaries around a daily and weekly program of action which they derive from revolutionary theory is manifested in the emergence of the revolutionary group or the formation of the revolutionary committee.

The formation of the revolutionary committee is not prompted by a feeling of danger or threat which intimidates the adherent of the mass revolutionary ideology, nor is it motivated by a feeling of isolation. Its goal is not to create a degree of isolation from society by creating a conditional and inverted social entity with the aim of producing a human type who will not hesitate to carry out the tasks assigned to him because of the subconscious sway which the idea of membership in this new group and the principles of the group have gained over his thinking. Such is the case in the various party organizations and in all political and social groups and organizations that evolve with the goal of creating a substitute for the social entity of the people.

Such groups and organizatons carry out their tasks and win their honors on the pretext of the inability of the people as a whole to carry out tasks, which are thus entrusted to party or other organizations. This is used to provide a justification for requiring the people to respect the traditions of such organizations and to believe blindly in their laws and ceremonies. (For they are, in any case, the people's means of obtaining their rights and the people's avenue to freedom!)

Therefore, the political organizations exploit the traditional loyalty of the people and the society for their benefit, designating the right to act on this loyalty as their own. Until these political organizations come to power, it is wrong to confer respect and loyalty on other groups, including even the society itself. Each organization claims to have emerged for the benefit of society, maintaining that the society is caught in a bad and unsuitable stage from which the organization wishes to save it. Thus, it is right and necessary that this political organization should take the place of the society, and consequently, that its laws and ceremonies should take the place of those of society.

This is nothing other than a type of heresy, the results of which can be seen in all parties: the creation of an impotent and fanatical human type who does not believe in the people and strives to seize power on the strength of his suppressed feeling. This feeling makes him believe that he is a member of the vanguard and the elite, and that he is not like the masses and the simple-minded rabble who do not understand anything. However, duty calls him to think for the masses and lead them where he wishes.

His people, brothers and friends are not the members of his nation but rather the members of his party--those who are like him and agree with him! Stated very briefly, this organization is a new tribe, preparing its members to seize power and feeding them with ideas which enjoin them to isolate themselves from society by creating a new group that is different from it and a substitute for it.

This dilemma is rejected by the revolutionary committees.

The member of the revolutionary committee is nothing more than a herald or a teacher. He uncovers the unjust principles and rouses the people to destroy them. Moreover, he takes part in the destruction of these principles as a member of the masses.

He urges the masses to establish the revolutionary laws, which are the principles of justice, and he performs his part in establishing them as a member of the masses. For all of these reasons, he does not feel that he is isolated or separated from society. Rather, the welfare of this people--members of his nation--motivates him to arouse them and encourage them and lead them to remedy their problems. He does not think for them or belong to a group which is a substitute for society.

On the contrary, the revolutionary committees are themselves established because of a belief in the people and their ability to liberate themselves and out of a sense of belonging to the people.

The basic motive for the emergence of the revolutionary committees is a desire to attain the lofty goals of society in order to achieve happiness for man. What is it that motivates the sacrifice made by the members of the revolutionary committees if not a belief in the legitimate rights of the masses, including the personal rights of each of these members as an individual member of the masses?

When revolutionaries form a revolutionary committee, it is their means of teaching the best way for the masses to overcome oppression so that others will not be prompted to form a group to take the place of the people.

They provide their countrymen with the model and the example of the sound way to bring about the revolution, namely, by creating people's conferences, which are an objective that the revolutionary committees strive to achieve.

How the Revolutionary Committees Work

There are no differences among the members of the revolutionary committees, and there is no pyramidal or other type of organizational arrangement in these committees.

The revolutionary committee meets as a whole whenever possible, or some members are commissioned to carry out an action when it is impossible for the committee to undertake it as a group. The revolutionary committees have no form of official leadership, that is, a leadership which requires order, obedience and subordination. This is the customary type of leadership in the traditional political organizations, whose purposes have now become obsolete.

The leadership which the revolutionary committees are working to develop is the revolutionary leadership alluded to earlier. This leadership does not arise out of a need for order or obedience, or from a desire for subordination, or in order to garner individual or group benefits and gains of whatever sort. It develops out of a desire to arrive at the truth, and it develops naturally without any decision to establish it from any source.

Thus, the work of the revolutionary committees is organized in accordance with the comprehensive and scientific revolutionary theory embodied in the Green Book. Their first duty is to establish the power of the people by creating a system of government by the people through the popular conferences which make decisions, and the popular committees which carry out these decisions. A second duty of the revolutionary committees is to defend the potentials of the people by inciting them to perfect the wealth and weapons which are the means by which they wield power, and by fighting and destroying any deviation which hinders or blocks the complete realization of the power of the people. The latter will be accomplished through the revolutionary committees' fulfillment of the duty of revolutionary supervision. This duty is performed by the revolutionary committees because of the consciousness and knowledge they have gained through the study of revolutionary theory and through their continuous work among the masses to incite them to revolution and the use of force against the symbols of backwardness and the manifestations of oppression that distort the life of the masses and undermine their future.

Do the Committees Exercise Revolutionary Force?

The revolutionary committees are the revolutionary leadership of the popular masses and they lead the masses in the phase of revolution. This includes guiding the exercise of force through the popular masses so that the force will be productive, humane and effective on the psychological and cultural level.

As was explained earlier, no one--whoever he may be--has the right to act in the place of the people. This is a sound principle which will prevent the revolutionary committees from ever becoming capable of acting on their own apart from the ocean of the masses surging through the new life which the revolutionary committees are struggling to create in this new age--the age of the masses. From this role entrusted to the revolutionary committees, we realize that they must employ force. However, this will not be the traditional kind of force, such as that which political groups have used in the past, first against others who used it and then against the people themselves. Such groups are captivated by the love of power and sense their separation from the masses. This is a calamitous phenomenon from which the majority of political organizations still suffer. I would like to call this the "antithesis," by which I mean the political organization's carrying out of the function and role of the political forces which it was fighting.

Thus, a political organization criticizes despotic forces, saying that they oppress and subjugate the people, and find justification to use force against these forces until they overturn them in some way. Then it becomes apparent that the demands of the masses have not been met. An inconsistency develops, and the political organization which has gained control can find no other way--according to its arguments--to defend the revolution and the revolutionary accomplishments, than to use force against the masses to prevent them from destroying the marvelous accomplishments achieved by the political organization!

There is no way to escape from this maelstrom of political action except by eliminating the mission of the violent political organizations, which is to attain power, and by obliterating the old mobilizational and ideological methods which set the political activists and revolutionaries apart from the masses by separating their group from that of the society.

This means that the function of political action is to bring the popular masses to power by organizing them into people's conferences. This is the only democratic and progressive method that a revolutionary can possibly employ, respect and strive to put into effect.

Past and contemporary experiences have taught us the reasons for the failure of political activity and the collapse of the great ideas in the life of our oppressed mankind. With this, all theories have become mere clichés without any spirit and without anything to attract us, like paper dolls or pretty articifical flowers.

We no longer wish to experience additional failures, and we do not have time to waste on futile struggles.

Organization of the Revolutionary Committees

The revolutionary committee begins as a political and practical framework, sometimes with only one individual who then calls on others with similar characteristics to join him. As mentioned earlier, these are individuals who have attained [word illegible] of the political, economic a[illegible] social systems prevailing in their communities through study of the Gr[illegible] Book. This study of the Green Book has also provided them with an alt[illegible]ative to these corrupt systems. Their presence together constituted [illegible]ompact guaranteeing the destruction of the society of exploitation, op[illegible]ssion and backwardness and the building of the new socialist society [illegible]elded by the Green Book.

The appeal--whether by an individual or by a group--was made to [illegible]ll others about the values of the era of the masses. And whether the appe[illegible] was open or secret, by direct personal contact or through indirect means, it was the method by which the revolutionary committees organized themselves.

The model and example of skill and method is one means of heralding the new thinking.

This review of the characteristics of the revolutionary committee member demonstrates the characteristics which we consider a model of skill and method. The revolutionary group's organization of itself into a revolutionary committee means in principle its willingness to carry out the duties arising from its existence as a revolutionary group. The first of these duties is the organization of the popular masses into secret people's conferences.

The revolutionary committee organizes the masses surrounding it into a secret people's conference. This conference may begin with one individual, but it grows steadily to contain all the popular masses in its environment at the earliest opportunity.

Another function of the revolutionary committee is to form additional revolutionary committees in other areas to fulfill the same role in the organization of the masses, so that within a certain period, all or most of the people will become affiliated with the people's conferences and will be ready to exercise power by means of them--or actually, they will be ready to seize power through them by the appropriate means prior to exercising power.

The revolutionary committee in any given place begins by formulating a concept of this place from the standpoint of the importance and consciousness of the people and their willingness to bear their responsibility in seizing their right to power. Next it formulates a specific conception of the people's conference, whose establishment it insures by secretly calling on the masses to join it. The committee envisions the conference structurally in terms of its number of participants and the existence of its administrative secretariat. Thus, we find that no people are incorporated into the structure up until the hour it is conceived. The means which are employed are to attract the people into the structure individually and in groups from the outside environment. In this way, the new structure is filled with people and the old structure they occupied previously is emptied completely--or nearly so.

The revolutionary committees thus create holes in this structure through which people leak into a new and sound structure free from oppression and the principles of exploitation.

These holes are simply the methods of appeal and attraction which the revolutionary committee employs in order to bring consciousness to an advanced stage of action and to channel this consciousness toward the popular revolution in order to achieve the society of the Jamahiriyah.

The individuals who formed the old structure are the very ones whom the revolutionary committees attract in order to form a new structure of life.

We can describe these channels of nourishment opened in the body of society as roots which draw in the necessary nutrients for plants in the growth stage from a suitable environment.

The methods of appeal in the revolutionary committees are like tiny capillaries whose function is to enable the popular conferences to grow and continue to survive until they reach maturity with the seizure of the power, wealth and weapons by the masses.

How Do the Masses Seize Power?

I touched on this matter earlier during our discussion of the function of the revolutionary committees and the question of the revolution and violence. However, what I am trying to explain here is the purely practical side of this complex process, which begins with an ideological change and matures with a complete and radical transformation of the elements of life in human society.

The conditions for the seizure of power by the masses can be summarized as follows:

1. The formation of people's conferences in which the masses organize themselves and which they prepare as an instrument of government to take the place of all the traditional instruments of government.

2. The fall of the traditional machinery of government through its elimination or destruction.

These are the two necessary conditions for the seizure of power by the masses. Unless they are met, this will not be attainable under any circumstances. For this reason, it is understood that the people's conferences are to carry out the destruction and elimination of the traditional government and establish the rule of the masses in the people's conferences in its place.

This is the fact on the basis of which the revolutionary committees call the people to the people's conferences. It is on this basis, as well, that the revolutionary committees mobilize the revolutionary committees to enable them to carry out this function in the best manner.

Many of the popular uprisings which have occurred in many different parts of the world would have succeeded if they had been led by people's conferences. In Egypt, for example, the popular masses revolted, rejected obedience and recognition of the official authorities as illegitimate, and poured forth toward the capital and the major cities from everywhere. But then the dictatorial government was able to smash these masses, wound them and drive them back into their holes like rats, as if nothing had happened. But if this has been done a different way, with well-defined and radical tactics, the people's conferences would have come into the open and proclaimed the overthrow of the dictatorial government. Each people's conference would have been responsible for its geographical area and would have defended it and eliminated the power of the dictatorial government within it. In this way, the organization of the [word illegible] masses takes place, and they are incited to carry out the same task throughout the region. They easily gain control over the country without encountering any [word illegible] actions from the dictatorial authorities. They finally tighten their grip on these illegal powers, which are left without any presence except in the capital, which is itself [in rebellion?]. The government is then eliminated in the capital by an advance from the outside and by internal disruption. But this is done without abandoning the basic principles followed by all the people's conferences which march on the capital from the different areas.

This is the method of popular revolution, and it is a method which cannot be resisted for several reasons:

1. It makes the masses organized and gives them definite goals which are unfailing and cannot be haggled over under any circumstances.

2. It permits the dissolution of the power of the dictatorial government without allowing it to settle the matter anywhere at a time when it needs to concentrate its power. This also affords time for the conferences to make themselves public and organize themselves thoroughly--even in the capital--so that the people's blow against the dictatorial regime will be fatal and decisive.

3. There is no chance for the struggle of the masses to be coopted, led astray or outsmarted. It is the masses which carry out the revolution directly, lead it in the field and know where to stop it.

4. The fact that the people carry out the revolution and organize themselves thoroughly in the popular committees attracts the forces which the dictatorial government is able to exploit into the ranks of the people, because these forces are from the people and because those carrying out the revolution have a direct relationship with these forces and have the power to influence them. This puts the dictatorial regime at a loss and denies it the prerogative of using these forces, which it considers a club that is always at the ready. Thus, it is not able to prolong its time in power.

5. By organizing themselves in the people's conferences, the popular masses will be an instrument of government which will not permit the chaos and social and political breakdown that usually accompany revolutions and acts of violence and destruction. In fact, acts of economic or social sabotage may not occur at all, because the masses will find themselves in control of their land, owning the spots where they plant their feet. The reactionary government, on the other hand, will find that it has no power and does not possess anything which merits destruction. Thus, the traditional regime will fall naturally without any complications in the areas of security or order.

After this, the masses will have only to establish the general conferences in which the leaders of the people's conferences, the people's committees, the trade unions, the leagues and the federations will come together to put the people's decisions into final form and establish the system of people's government forever, thus achieving their final victory.

VIOLATION OF HARATINE'S CIVIL RIGHTS ALLEGED

Paris LE MONDE in French 7-8 Sep 80 p 4

> [Text] Some Haratine having been arrested recently in Mauritania (LE MONDE, 4 April), a reader, Mrs Claude Cenison, writes to us to clarify the living conditions of this social category.

Any man in the servile category in a Moorish milieu is called Hartani (pl.: Haratine). The distinction between the slaves and the emancipated is very difficult to make, most of those called "emancipated" being so "de facto" (escape, independent activity) but not "de jure" (legal act). Of the black race, descendants of the prisoners taken during the rezzous carried out in black territory, they have lived for several generations in the Moorish milieu, that is, nomadic and desert-dwelling. They have adopted certain of its practices, language and clothing among others.

The linguistic question takes on a special importance insofar as it has constituted and continues to constitute an essential claim of the Negro-African populations. Hassanophones like the Moors, the Haratine are often assimilated with the Arabo-Berber population whose life and culture they have shared for years.

But can one speak of an identical culture for all that? Can one compare the "master" who, in the tent, ceremonially serves the traditional mint tea, and the "captive" who hauled the water and wood necessary for its preparation? If the abductions appear to have ceased since the country's independence (1960), it seems that some selling of slaves has still taken place since that date.

At present the Haratine make up the majority of the unskilled laborers and the unemployed who have flocked to the cities after the drought of the seventies. As tent slaves, they attend to domestic duties; as bush slaves, they watch the master's flocks or insure the grain supply of the encampments during the winter. The conflicts which take place regularly in the country's interior seem to show, despite a poor circulation of information, that certain Haratine want to put an end to their status, which does not violate the most elementary human rights any less because it is traditional... Demonstrating recently at Nouakchott, some Haratine demanded improvement of their condition and distributed tracts to sensitize national public opinion.

It seems that these latter events were the determining factor in the Mauritanian authorities' decision to proceed, at the beginning of March, with arrests among those Haratine who, thanks to unusual educational opportunities, have been able to rise to positions of responsibility. We should be alarmed by the repression which is being launched against these men who are only asking for a little dignity and their place at the heart of Mauritanian society.

THREAT TO USFP SEEN AS EXEMPLIFYING OFFICIAL ATTITUDE

Casablanca LIBERATION in French 4 Jul 80 p 16

[Editorial: "How Far Will Exclusion Extend?"]

[Text] During the last parliamentary session of the year, the minister of the interior threatened the USFP point-blank with reprisals if it did not keep quiet. It might be thought that such an attitude is part of the administration's daily routine, and that after all there is nothing particularly scandalous about it. It is a fact that, Morocco being what it is, one can see no reason why the USFP would be excluded from the general coercive measures suffered daily by every citizen. Especially since there exist, between the USFP and the overwhelming majority of the Moroccan population, over and above mere affinity, a shared situation and a shared destiny. This explanation will do for understanding the event that has scandalized the whole of Morocco. Have we not seen the dignity of a whole nation derided by having its will set at naught through ballot-box manipulation? Have we not heard officials asserting that there is no economic crisis in Morocco, while the people are martyrized more every day? Have we not seen disgraceful school and university results wrecking the hopes of thousands of families, while officials hold forth about the generalization of education? So it is one system that prevails, one practice. Cynicism is pressed to the extreme. So it is not a matter of concern if the accused changes into the prosecutor.

The administrative machinery that gave free rein to its excesses at the time of the May election, that falsified the returns and tailored them to its own needs no longer brothers about any moral considerations. It is in the heart of an institution intended to embody the end of the era of exceptions that the minister of the interior expresses his animosity toward the USPF. That is the height of scorn for democracy. And that is how they expect to convince us of the credibility of the present assembly.

Threats are used to explain that the elections were free and have always been free. Pressure is expected to create consensus around an experience distorted and caricaturized on 30 May 1980. It might be said that a new Morocco has been born. It is the Morocco of the consecration of high-handedness. For it is with the blessing of the "majority" that the new face of Morocco is discovered day by day: one of exaction, impoverishment, and obscurantism. All that was missing from "democracy" Moroccan-style was direct threat, as policy, from the government. We have gotten it! And we are proud of being its victims, because it proves once again our good faith and the bad faith of those who contradict us. It adds a new item to the heavy file on the lack of any political will among officials to get Morocco on the road to democracy and respect for human rights.

But let the minister of the interior be assured that his threat will merely give the USPF greater strength for fighting the choices and methods of government that have no consideration for the Moroccan. The USFP has its carapace. Its faith in and dedication to the ideal of democracy have been strengthened by precisely what it has endured for over 20 years. You are not dealing with an inexperienced political organization. It is a political organization rooted in the historical traditions of struggle and hope that you, and that others, have just threatened with reprisals. The hisotry of this organization is the story of the struggle for democracy in our country. It is a story punctuated by sacrifices, which, contrary to the hopes of our oppressors, have only rooted the USFP more deeply in the daily life and consciousness of the masses. The USFP has accumulated capital in militants over 21 years, counted in terms of death sentences and hundreds of years of imprisonment in secret places, and thousands of acts of physical cruelty, countless measures of extortion and pressure. So this threat is not one that will stop us in our struggle for a political system in which, among other things, all governmental or administrative authority would have limits to its power. Limits set first and foremost by respect for the will of the people.

"Troublemakers, you will be punished," they hurl at us. But then, you are likely to take a whole people for disruptive elements! A worker on strike is an agitator, a peasant protesting the devastation of his land is attacking the security of the state, a student who disagrees is a dangerous element, a protesting shopkeeper is dabbling in politics (and so is liable to sanctions)...how far will exclusion go? Do you want the new Morocco to be only for the boss who fires workers, the feudalist who steals land, the speculators who harry little middlemen, for an arbitrary policy?

There is every reason to believe that the minister of the interior was not particularly taking aim at the USFP. This threat is one intended for any protest movement, whether it is political, social, or cultural. It is proof that the policy followed recently has been carefully thought out. Arbitrary measures and falsification of votes are not in fact mere over-zealousness. Because the administrative system has been adopted, in the name of the government, and its arbitrariness has even had repercussions within the assembly. The few impressions of democracy are thus purely and simply wiped out.

But let those pressing for a return to the era of exceptions be reassured. Times have changed. They have brought greater strength to our combativity and armed the masses better against coercion. Democracy is no longer just a claim. It is a necessity now. Tomorrow it will be an imperative. The people around us have realized that. Democracy is spreading on an international scale. Morocco will never be able to backtrack again. It could not possibly live in isolation. Even if it wanted to, it could not do it. No black spots are wanted in international society any more. So, really, minister of the interior, you seem very behind the times.

AUTO, NAVAL SHIPYARD STRIKES CONTINUE

Auto Workers

Casablanca AL-BAYANE in French 9 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] One thousand workers are continuing the strike movement they started on 2 June 1980. We remind readers that metal workers in Casablanca held a sympathy strike on behalf of their SOMACA [Moroccan Automobile Construction Company] brothers on 18 June.

The present movement was started, as is common knowledge, in support of the claims presented to management by the workers. Management rejected all the claims wholesale, and chose to have recourse to unspeakable behavior to break the strike, sow discord among the workers, and in the end make no concessions at all. Even elementary rights. Management obstinacy is more or less implicitly encouraged by the indifference of local authorities to the paralyzing of so important a sector as that of SOMACA automobiles.

We recall that the causes of the worsening situation of SOMACA workers are of long standing. So the present strike is the second of its kind during 1980. Last 6 May, management provoked workers' displeasure by firing some of their number. Hence a strike, which led to negotiations. Last year, too, workers held a general strike that lasted a month (21 February to 22 March 1979).

The strike is continuing at present despite all management's reprehensible maneuvers.

Management sent workers notices that they had abandoned their work stations and that punitive action would be taken against them. It decided to fire the nine trades union bureau members. It withheld May wages even though the workers were not on strike then.

Some "strikers" were arrested, then released. After undergoing interrogations, and establishing that there was nothing in their records, of course. They were innocent, as were in fact all their comrades, who were only claiming elementary rights, flouted by a very harsh administration. In fact, the ineptitude and ill-will of the SOMACA administration are not just an example of poor management in an establishment of industrial and commercial nature, but also, and especially, an illustration of employer arrogance and its anti-worker choices.

In the face of this revival of employer "strike-breaking" policy, the SOMACA workers have at their disposal one big trump for taking possession of their rights: namely, unity in their ranks.

For our part, we unconditionally support their legitimate struggle until their definitive victory.

Naval Shipyard Workers

Casablanca L'AVANT-GARDE in French 5 Jul 80 p 6

[Excerpt] From the Moroccan Naval Shipyards: strike since 6 June 1980. The workers of the New Moroccan Naval Shipyards are still determined to continue the strike.

The arguments put forward by the employer, and fully agreed with by the authorities, are far from convincing enough to repress the wage-earning workforce.

The latter again denounces the prefecture's taking sides with the employer. If the employer alleges "economic reasons" for proceeding with the firing of the 59 workers, the same reasons must be used by the authorities to prevent this arbitrary act. And with good reason! In an almost new branch of economic activity in which a lot of effort needs to be made, management prefers to turn to an easy solution, namely, dismissals and keeping administration static.

These very economic reasons explain employee motives for continuing the strike until all their dismissed comrades are rehired.

FUEL PRICE INCREASES CONDEMNED BY UMT

Casablanca L'AVANT-GARDE in French 5 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[Statement by UMT National Secretariat]

[Text] The measures the government has just taken concerning the increase in fuel prices are another blow to working class purchasing power.

This increase, which will inevitably have major repercussions on all staple products, is sure, coming just before Ramadan, to encourage speculators, lead to price flare-ups, and adversely affect the already shaky living conditions of the masses.

The measures demonstrate once again that the policy in force, trapped in its own unpopular initial choices and in its day to day inconsistencies, cannot help but force the poor to pay more.

They are occurring at a time when the inclination for a campaign against fiscal fraud has been forgotten. They prove that except for sedatives, expedients, and soothing speeches, no consistent social policy is to be expected within the current framework of choices.

Deep legitimate social discontentment is constantly increasing, totally at odds with the ostentatious agitation of the protagonists of democracy of pure form.

The discontentment reaches beyond workers and the underprivileged to affect broad strata of society.

In parallel with the discontentment we are witnessing a systematic offensive by the employer class against worker achievements, trades union rights and freedoms, in total violation of the laws.

Employer arbitrariness is exercised with complete impunity, having the advantage of the cooperation or abdication of the officials.

In the face of this situation, the National Secretariat of the UMT [Moroccan Labor Federation]:

Protests against renewed escalation of the policy of impoverishment of the working classes;

Energetically denounces the actions of the employer class which is trying to take advantage of the situation to strike at the achievements and rights of workers;

Declares infamous employer provocation, the more or less generalized rule of refusal to accede to workers' requests, and quibbling by officials and their refusal to honor their commitments toward workers in several sectors;

Denounces the policy of domestication and division using the vilest means to damage the trades union unity of workers;

Condemns violations of trades union freedoms, unfair dismissals and persecution of union officials;

Salutes struggling workers and the daily sacrifices they accept for the defense of their rights and achievement of their goals;

Calls upon all militants and workers as a whole to strengthen their unity, redouble their vigilance, and check any attempts to subjugate workers or make use of them to achieve dishonorable aims.

The UMT national secretariat reaffirms the deep conviction of workers that there is no solution except through radical change, which implies abandoning the unpopular choices now in force and the adoption of an orientation guided by well-defined, consistent, liberating choices.

EXPORT FIGURES SHOW SATISFYING INCREASE

Casablanca LA VIE ECONOMIQUE in French 4 Jul 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] It is with obvious satisfaction that the minister of commerce has just announced the initial figures reported by the foreign trade of Morocco this year.

Statistics established last 30 April show that very substantial progress in exports was reported, on the order of 52 percent over the figures reached in 1979. This is a really exceptional rate of progress that had not been seen since 1974-1975.

The increase is essentially due to exportation of phosphates of which we recently pointed out the development in terms of quantity as well as price. If lead export development is included, ore exports in the first 4 months are up by 63 percent over the results achieved during the same period in 1979.

Phosphoric acid exports continue to increase at a lively pace; they have more than doubled since last year (+ 135 percent).

These are some of the principal results achieved:

1. Agricultural products: citrus fruits: up 26 percent in value; young vegetables: up 58 percent in value; olive oil: vigorous resumption of exports, of which there were none in 1979; paper pulp: sales development is continuing at a spectacular rate.

2. Mining products: Overall increase of 63 percent.

3. Partly processed products: fertilizers: + 89 percent; phosphoric acid: + 135 percent.

4. Finished products: overall increase of 37 percent: ready-to-wear clothing: increase of 69 percent; footwear: + 144 percent.

Imports also showed an increase, but not so broad in scope: the rise is only 32 percent. Consequently the balance of trade deficit is declining and the import-export covering rate which was only 49.8 percent in Aoril 1979 has increased this year to 57.3 percent.

KING VISITS SAFI PHOSPHATES, URANIUM EXTRACTION PLANTS

Casablanca MAROC SOIR in French 1 Jul 80 pp 1, 2

[Excerpt] Safi, 1 July (MAP)--Beginning his official visit to the Safi provinces, Essaouira and el-Jadida, his majesty King Hassan II arrived in Safi at 1350 hours from Marrakesh via Tleta Bouguedra.

Tens of thousands of citizens received his majesty the king and his highness Crown Prince Sidi Mohammed who accompanied him with a welcome indicative of the bonds of affection linking the people to the unifier of the kingdom.

During the afternoon, his majesty the king visited the chemical complex of "Morrocco Phosphate 2." This complex, built to put the Benguerir phosphate into production, was inaugurated by his majesty the king on 15 November 1975.

The phosphate is processed then converted into phosphoric acid from which sulphuric acid is then extracted by combustion of the sulphur, thus producing SO2 gas and finally SO3.

Sulphuric acid then gives off heat, which is converted into electrical energy in quantities sufficient for the running of the complex. The surplus energy is intended for the National Electricity Office (ONE). Mixing sulphuric acid with phosphate produces phosphoric acid in a 54 percent concentration from which P 205 (phosphoric oxide) is extracted.

The P 205 is intended for export. The capacity of each of the three units at "Morocco Phosphates 2" is 1,750 tons of sulphuric acid a day. They also produce a total of 1,500 tons of phosphoric acid a day. The complex thus consumes 5,500 tons of phosphate a day.

His majesty the king was then to proceed to the laying of the foundation stone of the uranium extraction unit. The sovereign was first given an explanation of this unit by the director of chemical industries, Mr M'hamdi. [No further details given]

GOVERNMENT WELCOMES ALMOST HALF MILLION REFUGEES

Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Jul 80 p 4

[Article by special correspondent Jean-Pierre Langellier]

[Text] Towawa--"The idea of going home never leaves us. But when? We fled Ethiopia because we were being oppressed. We shall not go back again until the regime in office has been overturned. Meanwhile, we lead a passive existence, uprooted." Johannes Desta does not conceal the unhappiness of his existence, like the majority of the 500 occupants of the Towawa camp. He is from the Tigre Province in the north of Ethiopia. He was a primary school teacher until the military in power threw him into prison. Relatively privileged, he was there only 2 months. Afterwards he took the long road into exile. He is barely 25 years old, and frankly admits that he belongs to the Tigre Liberation Front, an armed combat movement against the "military dictatorship."

The "semi-urban community" of Towawa came into existence only a month ago. An hour's drive by Land Rover from Khartoum, and 2 hours from Kassala--on the Ethiopian border--it shelters "old refugees" settled until recently in the nearby town of Gedaref. Rising abruptly out of the bush, Towawa came into existence through one of the refugee resettlement pilot projects implemented by the Sudanese government with the support of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR). Each of the 1,300 families in Towawa has received the materials necessary for building its own "oukal," the traditional round thatch-roofed hut.

For 6 months, the world food program will supply the occupants of Towawa, free of charge, with the powdered milk and sorghum with which the women will make "Joura," a cooked flat cake which is the basic food of northern Ethiopians. After that, they will have to be self-sufficient. A primary school and a little clinic will open soon.

Among the host countries harboring the 5 million African refugees--one out of every two in the world--the Sudan is somewhat of a model. Having faced the drama of exile itself in the past--half a million of its nationals having found asylum until 1972 in neighboring countries, as a result of the civil war--the Sudan has managed to pursue a generous policy in the matter. For the past 15 years waves of refugees have continuously flooded across its borders: Zairians in 1965 and 1968, Ethiopians from Eritrea and elsewhere in 1967, 1974, and since 1979, Chadians from 1970 to 1974 and in 1979, Ugandans in 1972 and 1979. Not one of the refugees has ever been turned away. On 1 January 1980--the latest known statistic--there was 441,000 of them, made up of the following groups: 390,000 Ethiopians (including 360,000 Eriteans), 39,000 Ugandans, 7,000 Chadians, and 5,000 Zairians.

Here refugees have been considered second class people to a lesser extent than elsewhere. A government department was set up to take care of them. From 1967 to 1979, the UNHCR devoted $17 million to refugees in the Sudan. However, for this country which is one of the poorest in the world, the refugee burden has become intolerable with the passing of years. A partisan of voluntary repatriation of exiles, the Sudan has continued to be a reception country in accordance with humanitarian conventions. But it has decided to make the public aware of its efforts and to start a fundraising campaign on behalf of the exiles who have wound up on its soil.

The Sudanese Government has set itself the task of putting an end to the spontaneous settling of refugees by grouping them in permanent resettlement areas equipped with infrastructures enabling them to become self-supporting quickly. The UNHCR, which considers the Sudanese policy realistic and courageous, increased its financial contribution to this project sixfold in 1980. Several European and Scandinavian countries, the EEC itself, United Nations agencies and the Islamic Development Bank have announced or given hopes of aid programs. But it is far less than is needed. "There is a limit to what our government can manage," we were told by Sayed Abel Alier, vice president of the Sudanese Republic, "We do not want to find ourselves in the same situation as some south east Asian countries.

Avoiding Friction

To prevent the development of ghettos, the Sudanese Government is planning to integrate refugee communities into the development programs of neighboring districts. The emergence of areas of friction between refugees and the local population must be avoided, thus the inhabitants of Towawa were still living in an area of Gedaref a short time ago [as published]. It was partly burned down last October after a quarrel broke out between Ethiopians and Sudanese. So the authorities decided to move the refugees out of the town. Whether in connection with job-hunting, admission to hospital, or admission to education, refugees are perceived as intruders, usurpers even, and sometimes privileged as well when they receive free food for several months. At Gedaref, Port-Sudan, or Khartoum, the influx of refugees has caused an increase in rents and made the shortage of transportation worse.

Most of the refugees were peasants in their native countries. Many hope to return to agriculture. As a result of international aid, the government has provided for allocation of land to them. Ten kilometers outside Gedaref, the village of Um Gargur shelters 6,000 refugees. This year each family will receive one hectare, and a second one in 1981. These lands were bought from neighboring farmers. The HCR hopes that the refugees will soon become self-supporting as far as food is concerned. In the meantime, the adults are to a large extent inactive. According to a survey, admittedly conducted in the off-season, over 6 out of 10 were unemployed. The others work an average of 7 months a year. Only a real program of rural development will enable the refugees to restore the economic and social balance of the village community that they lost when they set out on the road to exile.

PRESIDENT OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLY GIVES DINNER IN HONOR OF SIMONE VEIL

Remarks by Mokaddem

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 7 Sep 80 p 4

[Article: "The President of the National Assembly Gives a Dinner In Honor of Mme Simone Veil"]

> Dr Sadok Mokaddem, president of the National Assembly, gave a dinner on Friday night, at the "Baie des Singes" hotel in Gammarth, in honor of Madame Simone Veil, president of the European Parliament and of the members of the delegation who accompanied her in her official visit in Tunisia.
> Among the persons of distinction invited to this dinner, the presence of the following was noted: Mme Fethia Mzali, member of the Political Bureau, and president of UNFT [National Union of Tunisian Women], Larbi Abderrazak, member of the Political Bureau, Abdelmajid Karoui, director of protocol, Taleb Sahbani, secretary general, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ahmed Ben Arta, ambassador director general of international cooperation, Noureddine Mejdoub, chief of the European division of the same ministry, Abdelaziz Hamzaoui, tunisian ambassador to the EEC, and Pierre Hunt, French ambassador in Tunis, as well as some members of the National Assembly.

First to speak during the exchange of toasts, Dr Sadok Mokaddem welcomed Simone Veil, whose visit in Tunisia, he underlined, constitutes the development of the cooperative relations between the institutions of the European Economic Community and the Tunisian Republic.

"Your auspicious visit, he added, addressing the president of the European Parliament will serve to implement the provisions of Article 47 of the EEC-- Mokaddem continued "the discussions we had this afternoon soon after your arrival and the work session which took place in the office of the National Assembly marked the beginning of this projection. We can say that they were useful and constructive. I do not feel that it is necessary to re-examine the particulars of our exchange of viewpoints.

Tunisian convention of cooperation dated 25 April 1976. These provisions foresee the establishment of a joint parliamentary commission, a European Parliamentary Assembly-Tunisian National Assembly, in charge of insuring the uninterrupted proper execution of the stipulations of the EEC Tunisia agreement of cooperation.

I would like to stress again the particular interest that we attach to the proper implementation of the provisions of the cooperation agreement and to state again the hope that the deepening and broadening of the scope of the application of this agreement can become a reality.

We ardently wish to see that the differences which are in conflict with this prolongation could be solved by a show of willingness and understanding on the part of all the parties concerned.

The president of the National Assembly then recalled that Tunisia was one of the first mediterranean countries to proclaim officially and solemnly, through the voice of its president, Habib Bourgiba, its wish to join and cooperate with the European Economic Community as soon as the first agents of its Community were established during the fifties. This political desire proclaimed by the most authoritative voice in the country must be taken into consideration during discussions, exchange of viewpoints or negotiations between the Community and Tunisia.

I hope and trust, he said, to see our eminent colleagues in the European Parliamentary Assembly, share our concerns and preoccupations, and combine their efforts with ours with the view to fully insure cooperation between the Community and Tunisia.

"In this uncertain and menacing world in which we live, real cooperation between the European Community and Tunisia can create a zone of stability and safety and contribute to the cooperation, understanding and the reinforcement of peace in our regions", concluded the President of the National Assembly.

Remarks by Veil

[Article: "Madame Simone Veil: We are paying careful attention to the questions which are the focal point of your preoccupations--European Parliament keenly desirous of establishing without delay a permanent structural dialog with the National Assembly"]

[Text] Following Mokaddem, Simone Veil underlined that her visit in Tunisia marks the starting-point of cooperative relations between the National Assembly of the Republic of Tunisia and the European Parliament, whose establishment was foreseen in the agreement dated 25 April 1976.

Soon after the signatute of the agreement, she stated, our assembly had made an appeal for the implementation of this cooperation and this appeal had been heard, since the following year the modalities of a collaboration between our two institutions had been defined by common accord and approved by the expanded bureau of the European Parliament, but unfortunately circumstances made it impossible for this cooperation to take effect before the installation of the first European Parliament elected by direct universal suffrage. But today nothing prohibits us from attempting together to make up for lost time. My visit in Tunis, at the time when our Parliament is entering into its second year of existence, bears witness, at any rate as regards the Assembly, of its intention to go forward without delay.

Veil underlined that the European Parliament had welcomed with satisfaction the signing of the cooperation agreement between the Tunisian Republic and the European Community. Qualifying this agreement as "global and exemplary."

Global, she said, as it is underlined in the first article of the agreement which assigns to itself as an objective "to promote global cooperation between the contracting parties with the view to contributing to the economic and social development of Tunisia and to assist in the strengthening of their relations." Exemplary, because as is indicated in the preamble of the agreement, it is propounded as a "model for relations between developed states and developing states, compatible with the provisions of the international community for a fairer and better balanced economic order."

Tunisia's Adherence To the Dialog Under All its Forms Has Never Been Refuted

The president of the European Parliament continues: "Also remarkable, as regards the members of the European Parliament, was the fact that these cooperation agreements, and not simply of associations, involved the European Community in certain directions and policies while they were still being outlined: Mediterranean policy as a whole; opening policy in the direction of the Arab world, global policy of aid to development, definition of a new worldwide economic order, characterized by new relations between developed countries and countries under development, between producers of raw materials and industrial nations, between exporters and importers of energy.

More than anyone else, Tunisia had found itself over a period of 25 years at the cross-road of these policies for achievement, under the enlightened guidance of the valorous founder of the Tunisian Republic, President Habib Bourguiba, whose clearsightedness and resoluteness had made it possible for Tunisians to become, in a quarter of a century, a strong country, respected by all.

Tunisia-EEC: the Dialog Was Never Broken Off

Speaking of Tunisian-EEC relations, Veil considers that the dialog between the Tunisian Government and the European Community was never broken off and that an equal realization of the difficulties by each has always ended in arriving at an understanding on both sides, and the most serious obstacles in the application of the agreement are in the process of being settled.

As to your country's fears in regard to the future expansion of the European Community, she added, they are being studied attentively by the authorities in Brussels and the governments of the member states. The members of the commission and the representatives of the governments of the Nine who have succeeded one another in Tunis since the beginning of this year have proved it to you. The solutions are not really easy to define but it is of fundamental importance for the balance of the Mediterranean space and the protection of the legitimate interests of all the parties in the debate, that the dialog between them should be fruitful.

Your country has pursued this dialog very closely for many years with the commission of the Communities and the governments of the member states."

Moreover, Veil emphasized the wish of the European Parliament to come into contact with the representatives of the Tunisian people in order to have a better understanding of its problems and to help in their solution. My presence among you, she stated, should shortly precede the first meeting with the delegations of our two assemblies."

The president of the European Parliament continued in this connection:

"The subjects which are likely to be entered in the agenda of this meeting and of those which will follow, are not lacking. As, beyond the contents of the agreement which binds your country with the European Economic Community, and the present and future problems which its application engenders, the European Parliament is paying careful attention to the questions which we know are also the focal point of the Tunisian Republic's preoccupations.

In addition, Veil made it clear that the European Parliament is following attentively the evolution of the Euro-Arab dialog, of which Tunisia, she underlines, is cut out to be one of its most ardent defenders and which the member states of the Community who had formulated its pattern in Venice last June, particularly wish to develop in its political dimension.

After recalling that in its October session the European assembly still plans to debate the problems of the impending conference on security and cooperation in Europe, which Tunisia is following closely in its Mediterranean viewpoint, Simone Veil stressed the strong desire of the European Parliament to establish a permanent dialog structure with the National Assembly as soon as possible.

Because, she said, it seems to me essential that in the uncertain and difficult times in which we are living, where the peace of the world finds itself every day at the mercy of a brutal aggravation of the tensions which affect too many areas of the globe, and, alas, which do not spare the periphery of the mediterranean, and our solidarities assert themselves much more than our differences, far be it from me to invoke the ascending perils in order to brush aside the necessary and frank explanations called for by the difficulties encountered in establishing our cooperation."

The Community, she declared in concluding, has not evaded and will not evade this degate, and the Parliament plans to take part in it. But, at the same time, it wishes that a dialog be established which would emphasize the unity of our views on the problems whose solution conditions our survival and our common future."

COMMITTEES MEET TO FORMULATE SIXTH PLAN

[Report of the meeting of the planning committee: "Sixth Plan Preparation Meeting of Committees for Small and Heavy Industry and for National Education"]

[Text] The national committee for the small and heavy industry sector held its first plenary session, as part of the Sixth Plan preparation activities, at the National Economy Ministry, under the chairmanship of Mr Abdelaziz Lasram, minister for national economy.

Industrialists and representatives of various ministries, from industrial enterprises and national organizations participated.

The minister indicated that in order to maximally increase employment, to promote export, to improve industrial integration and to satisfy consumers needs, industry will be a priority in the next plan.

Accordingly, the committee must seek fast and concrete solutions which will eliminate any bottleneck which may develop; it must particularly resolve the structural problems (tax and banking systems, administrative requirements, price fixing mechanisms, state support). This will make it possible to back-up industrialists, to promote their responsibilities and to motivate them, as they are the backbone of the country economic development.

In addition, careful consideration is warranted by the following areas:

a) Promotion of industrial cooperation between Tunisia and Arab world

b) Improvement of working conditions and workers' training to match job requirements

c) Identification of projects which could be carried out during the Sixth Plan.

The minister reminded the committee that the government has decided the creation of three new banks to finance large projects.

d) Maximum utilization of production capacity

e) Technology and engineering

To achieve these objectives, eleven subcommittees have been created, divided into task forces. It should be noted that the minister has made sure that each subcommittee does represent a specific industrial sector:

1) metallurgy, mechanical and electrical industries

2) heavy chemical industry

3) chemical specialties industry

4) building materials

5) agriculture and food industries

6) textiles

7) miscellaneous industries

8) small enterprises

9) leather

10) general problems (industrial environment)

11) industrial cooperation.

REMARKS BY MOKADDEM IN EAST BERLIN

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 18 Sep 80 p 4

[Report on speech by Dr Sadok Mokaddem: "Dr Mokkadem at the 67th Inter-Parliamentary Union Assembly: "Let Us Combine Our Energies To Save Humanity From Disaster"]

[Text] In an address, given yesterday in East Berlin, Dr Sadok Mokaddem, president of the Tunisian National Assembly, heading a delegation of deputies representing Tunisia at the 67th Inter-Parliamentary Union assembly, evoked the major problems of our time and gave a broad picture of situation currently existing in certain world regions.

In opening his statement, Dr Mokkadem reviewed the major questions which are on everyone's mind and which, by their intensity, do endanger the international peace and security. They consist notably of the progressive deterioration of international situation, of the accelerating course toward armaments, of the reactivated tension focal points in various parts of the world, of subversive activities, of destabilization efforts and international terrorism, and of the increase in the disparity, the socioeconomic distortions, between North and South.

Speaking of the situation in Africa, first Dr Mokaddem expressed his satisfaction at Zimbabwe accession to full sovereignty, before stigmatizing the "shameful" and degrading practices of apartheid and racial discrimination toward native populations in South Africa. On this point, he called upon the international community to take energetic measures and "if need be, effective sanctions" with the objective of bringing this country to its senses, as its current behavior "constitute an unacceptable insult to the whole of mankind."

In the same order of ideas, the president of the National Assembly noted that only Israel continues to maintain close relations and an intense cooperation with South Africa.

Again in connection with Africa, Dr Mokaddem has evoked the drama which is engulfing the Eritrean people, victim of a "veritable genocide."

As far as the Western Sahara conflict is concerned, "which constitutes a major obstacle to cooperation between countries of the Maghreb region," the speaker did express a wish that OAU "could find a pacific and permanent solution for this painful affair."

Dr Mokaddem was lead to speak of Middle East situation where the Palestinian problem has reached "a paroxysm of tension, as a result of systematic expansionism by Israel, in the West Bank, in the holy city of El Qods, and in South Lebanon and Golan Heights."

In this context, he recalled President Bourguiba's position "who has never ceased for the last 30 years to proclaim that the solution of the Middle East conflict resides in the application of international legality, as spelled out in the successive relevant resolutions passed in the United Nations."

"Again in the Middle East, added Dr Mokaddem, Afghanistan is still under the yoke of Soviet army occupation.

The Afghan people are putting up an heroic resistance to this occupation and proclaims, arms in hand, its will to conduct its own affairs without any outside intervention. Pressing appeals from the international community, directed to the Soviet Union, have remained without effect."

"True, he added, any settlement of these conflicts would reduce international tensions and they would strengthen international peace and security; but there will be real protection for peace only when more justice, and fair and effective solidarity is introduced in economic relations between peoples. This underlines the vital importance of elaborating a radically and deeply reorganized economic order. It is our duty, as partners, to combine our energies and to bring out our influence on our governments to save mankind from this menacing disaster" said Dr Mokaddem in his conclusion.

BOURGUIBA'S SERVICE TO ISLAM PRAISED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 5 Aug 80 p 5

[Article: "Closing of the Seminar on Bourguibian Conceptions; Kooli: No Regime Has Served Islam As Well As the Bourguibian Regime"]

[Text] Mongi Kooli, delegate minister to the office of the prime minister, and director of the party, presided on Saturday, at the closing of the seminar on Bourguibian conceptions which had been meeting since 27 July at Dar Ayad in Ksar Hellal.

In the first place, in his address, the director of the party affirmed that "sincerely and without chauvinism the only person of mark and the only leader who has rendered such service to this country, is Bourguiba. Without his willpower, sincerety, patience and resistance, none of the concrete results which at the present time have been so advantageous to the Tunisian people, would have been realized."

In this context Mongi Kooli recalled the conditions under which President Bourguiba had been excluded from the old-Destour, underlining in this connection young Bourguiba's determination in having all the people participate in the battle for liberation, contrary to what the Archeans thought.

Basing himself on this principle, Bourguiba engaged in a sincere and loyal dialog and a direct contact policy with the people, said Kooli. After recalling the various episodes in the national struggle and the feats accomplished by Bourguiba, even when he was in exile, Mongi Kooli analyzed the qualities a Destourian militant must exhibit. He should arm himself, as Bourguiba did, with a will of iron which engenders the faith from which confidence in himself is born. The militant must give an example of honesty, competence and dissemination.

Doubly so, he said, since responsibility also implies enthusiasm, and the spirit of sacrifice in the service of the best interest of the nation.

Kooli added: the true Destourian is the one who, through his adherence to the party, does not run after titles and positions, and underlined that the PSD [Destourian Socialist Party] is not founded on the criterion of quantity.

On the contrary it values the quality of its adherents as it considers that good quality would create the necessary quantity.

He continued that the party did not accede to power because of a parliamentary majority, a military coup d'etat, or through heredity, but rather through a legitimacy born from the long struggle conducted for the progress of the citizen after having achieved the independence of the country.

Speaking of the role of the party, Kooli said that the PSD is racing against time in order to realize the objectives of the nation, to consolidate the structures of the state in order to facilitate the fulfillment of the work started, insure the training of the masses and realize their aspirations.

Alluding to the youth sector, Kooli remarked that it is necessary to be aware of the sollicitude with which the Bourguibian regime supports youth. In fact, this regime considers man as most essential, especially young students.

The director of the party added: Assuming responsibilities represents a duty for the young which must be repaid vis-a-vis the country and the Supreme Combatant, whose 77th birthday is being celebrated today and for whom I pray God to grant him long life in order that he may carry out Tunisian's aspirations for progress."

Replying to a question relating to the conception of the party in connection with religion, Mongi Kooli recalled the fight led by Bourguiba against the naturalization campaign and his opposition to the Eucharistic Congress being held in Tunisia.

He added that there never was a regime which had served Islam as much as the Bourguibian regime which belongs to the true religion which is the Islam action, proposals and struggle.

The director of the party and the officials present then proceeded with the distribution of encouragement diplomas to the participants in the seminar.

A message of loyalty and best wishes was addressed to President Bourguiba on the occasion of his 77th birthday.

TUNISIAN YOUTH URGED TO ACQUIRE RESPONSIBILITIES

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 5 Aug 80 p 5

[Article: "Responsibilities Are Not Granted, But They Are Deserved"]

[Text] The elite of the final class representing the various governorates of the republic gathered in a frank and constructive debate on Friday night in Monastir with Mezri Chekir, directeur de cabinet in the office of the prime minister, in the presence of Abdessalem Dimassi, secretary general for youth organizations and Mohamed Ben Nasr, secretary general for the coordination committee.

Mezri Chekir immediately fell in the mood of his young audience who were particularly appreciative of the moderate and concise style of the lecturer, the clarity of his ideas, his constant reference to distinct examples and his willingness not to side-step any question and to reply frankly to all questioning.

Moreover the participants were anxious to warmly applaud the prime minister's closest collaborator and requested that he take a message of affection and support to President Bourguiba and Mohamed Mzali.

Opening the meeting with a brief preliminary expose, Mezri Chekir congratulated himself for the occasion offered to him to meet the young and and to discuss the problems of the present with them.

"The Bourguibian regime," he said, "is counting on youth. The interest which we bear for the young is not all on the surface with 'demagogic' and propangandist ends in view. We have the firm intention to see to it that they will be fully associated in the political, social and economic life of the nation.

"We are firmly convinced that this objective implies that the young should be informed of the options in our policy and events in public life. In fact, the duty of guiding Tunisia's future destiny will be incumbent on the young. It is therefore evident that the more the young are informed of the ins and outs of the management of national affairs, the more they will be able to bring by their enthusiasm, spontaneity and impetuous potentials, their invaluable contribution to the collective action for progress."

Then Mezri Chekir invited the participants to express their views and suggestions, and the directeur de cabinet in the office of the prime minister conducted the following dialog with the future students:

[Question] Mohamed Mzali, director of the "AL FIKR" publication published an editorial on the interference between education and development, how do you explain this interference?

[Answer] When we affirm that a Tunisian is the first priority in any development plan we think that by the same token helps to realize that development. Therefore, let us consider ourselves indispensable in guaranteeing a moral, intellectual and civic training to all citizens which could make them become productive, fully participating in the effort for development, that is to say the osmosis which must be achieved in the action for education on the one hand and the labor for development on the other.

To summarize let us say that development can only succeed on condition that it is based on citizens who are sound in mind and in body animated by a patriotic faith and imbued with a responsible behavior.

[Question] Don't you feel that changing the people in charge is a factor in administrative instability?

[Answer] Assigning responsibilities in Tunisia covers objective and serious criterions. The chief of state chooses the first responsible people who in turn appoint their collaborators to the national, regional and local level. It is logical and natural that in this framework the responsibilities and the responsible officials could be changed in the evolution of the conjuncture and the new data of national life. The conception that is made of the profile of the people in charge is dependent on the facts and the needs of the hour. The essential point is that the change of responsible officials should not entail in any manner a modification of development plans or call in again the question of options in the national effort for progress.

Furthermore, the exercise of the same responsibilities over a long period can affect rentability and it is always advantageous to bring in new blood capable of imprinting greater impulsion and dynamism.

[Question] Don't you think that the young should be more involved in the exercise of responsibilities?

[Answer] I want to answer you in one sentence. Responsibilities are not granted, they are deserved and conquered. The young must not wait for someone to come knocking at the door. They must be able to prove their maturity and competence, and through this proof they can accede through the big door to responsibilities, however important they might be.

I would like to recall to the young, in this connection, to ponder over Mohamed Mzali's example. I remember when we were children in Monastir, the young pupil, Mzali, distinguished himself by his vitality and his faith which stimulated from the very first our enthusiasm and our adherence. He never ceased originating cultural manifestations and round tables. In this context, he founded, by facing up to the colonial authorities, the Monastirian Student Association, where he displayed his full capacity in a militant action. At that time Mohamed Mzali was far from fancying that he would one day become the prime minister and secretary general of the party, he simply answered the call to duty and to his conscience. Once vested by Bourguiba in this high executive position he remained faithful to the principles which guided his life and his career. Working on an average of 12 hours per day, he has sacrificed his time and health in order to be equal to the confidence placed in him. He is, in my opinion, an example and a symbol for the youth of Tunisia.

How can democracy and the single party be reconciled?

Contrary to other countries who advocate a plurality of parties, in Tunisia we consider that the party cannot reflect the preoccupations of only a part of a class to the detriment of another, but it must embody the aspirations of all the people, and as such it is open to all social categories, all tendencies, and all potentialities. It progresses and renews itself in the conjunctural evolution in order to remain on the level of the preoccupations of the citizenry and the hopes of the young.

BRIEFS

CHICKEN FARM CONTRACT--A contract for a chicken farm was awarded to a Dutch company. The chicken farm, a joint Arab venture, will be built in al-Qasim region in Saudi Arabia under the supervision of the Arab Company for cattle development (with headquarters in Damascus), and part of the Council for Arab Economic Unity. The farm will cost 30 million dollars, or 10% of the capital of the Arab Company. Twenty international companies submitted bids for this farm. The first phase of this project will include building a slaughterhouse, a hatchery, a chicken feed factory, and a factory to produce 6 million eggs annually for the Arab markets. The first phase will be completed in two years. However, it is expected that other contracts will be required to build housing for the workers and an electric power station before the completion of phase one. The work on this project began later than anticipated by the Arab Company. The farm was to be built in 'Inshas' in Egypt, but it was later decided to move it to Saudi Arabia following the Camp David accords. Another delay occured when the Arab Company discovered that the tenders for the project were much higher than anticipated which led to a reviewal of the project's plans. Another animal feed factory presently exists in al-Qasim region in Saudi Arabia. The other projects of the Arab Company include raising sheep and chicken in Syria, and an animal feed factory which is presently being built in Sudan. The aforesaid Dutch company also manages vegetable farms in Oman. [Text] [Sharjah AL-KHALIJ in Arabic 5 Oct 80 p 10]

ARABS HAVE OFFERED AFRICA TWICE WHAT WEST HAS OFFERED

[Text] Arab aid to Africa is rarely mentioned, while the Arab political role in that continent is described most of the time as being religiously oriented. It has also been described as a financing of imaginary, unofficial authorities for the purpose of supporting one country or another. All numbers related to Arab aid to Africa have been ignored as they rank second after Arab aid to [other] Arab countries. On the other hand, [Arab] trade relations [with Africa] are only 2.3 percent of foreign Arab trade.

Unfortunately, trade exchange [between Arab and African countries] has not developed. But, despite the unstable Arab-African relations, Arab aid to Africa has continued and increased. It has several forms, among which are special organizational aid to Africa, bilateral aid through development funds in all Arab petroleum-producing nations and aid that has a bilateral political character, the latter representing a small percentage of the overall Arab loans and grants.

Contrary to the prevailing views, politics have not played a major role in defining loan specifications and conditions and choosing the borrowers. African countries were chosen according to the specifications which the United Nations has for the poor or developing African nations. As a result, most of these loans were given to the poorest 20 African countries. But the loans were not limited to those countries; 36 out of 40 African countries recevied various types of loans from Arab countries. Between the years 1973 and 1979, 86 such loans were offered, with 70 percent allotted to the poorest African countries.

During that same period, Arab loans amounted to $6 billion of which $4 billion financed major projects such as roads, dams, ports and housing. The joint Arab monetary funds gave $1.16 billion to Africa, which is equivalent to 82 percent of their aid to Arab countries.

The increase in Arab aid to Africa occurred during a period of international Palestinian movements. This inevitably resulted in African support of all the U.N. resolutions in favor of the Palestinian cause. Arab-African relations also resulted in African opposition to Israeli presence in their continent.

It was also necessary to protect Arab relations with Muslim African nations due to their historical ties. However, this aid was not characterized as control-oriented, because it was not accompanied by direct exploitation of the African economy. Arab countries could have participated in the establishment of joint venture companies in Africa to exploit mineral and agricultural resources there; but this did not take place.

Positivisms

One of the most important positivisms of the Arabs' opening up to Africa is going beyond bilateral aid and its complications. This helped them establish the Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa, which had a registered capital of $738 million in 1979. This bank is specialized in financing developmental projects. The volume of aid this bank has offered since it was established in 1975 has reached $331.68 million, financing 50 projects in 32 African nations. Its loans amounted to 12.5 percent of total project costs. A special Arab fund for aid to Africa was also established. During the past 5 years, this fund offered loans in the amount of $221.74 million, distributed to 36 African nations.

Those two organizations abided by the loan conditions set by the United Nation's fifth trade conference, where loans were offered at an interest rate of less than 4.6 percent, paid within 20 years beginning with the 5th year after the loan is offered.

Arab loans to Africa are not limited to those kinds of aid. Arab petroleum-producing nations paid 50 percent of the costs to establish the U.N. Development Fund. Arab nations also participated, together with international organizations, Arab banks, and other financial institutions, in the financing of developmental projects such as the $3 billion Senegal River dam project.

Within 5 years, Arab countries have practically offered twice what the West has offered to Africa in the name of the "continent's stability."

JERUSALEM COMMITTEE REACTS TO ISRAELI DECISION ON JERUSALEM AS CAPITAL

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 23 Aug 80 pp 28-29

[Interview with Secretary General of the Islamic Conference Organization al-Habib al-Shatti, by Faris Bazzi, in Casablanca; date not given]

[Text] "If we look at what Israel has done with the calm eye of the historian and the objective analyst, we see that the Israeli government's decision is the first shovel in digging the grave of the state of Israel. Israel may not have heard me make a statement like this before, but it should not forget that it has injured our hearts and our guts."

Observers did not view this statement by the Moroccan monarch, which was part of a speech winding up the activities of the emergency session of the Jerusalem Committee, as a mere political response to the Israeli decision pertaining to Jerusalem and its future. They also saw it as a change in Hasan II's position regarding the Camp David agreements, and an indirect reply to the Egyptian president's stand and his insistence on continuing his initiative and not backing out of it.

Informed circles in Casablanca also considered the Moroccan king's statement as an indication that he is now far from confident about his bet that al-Sadat will rejoin Arab and Islamic ranks. According to these circles, the king made this statement after receiving from al-Sadat, the same day the Jerusalem Committee sessions opened, a reply to the letter which the king had sent al-Sadat early this month. In this letter, the king had called for a firm stand towards the Israeli decision to make Jerusalem the permanent capital of the Zionist entity.

Even though the meetings of this emergency session of the Jerusalem Committee were accompanied by confusion, rumors and strict secrecy over the agenda, there is near-consensus among diplomatic circles that the content of the Moroccan king's speech, in addition to the committee's resolutions, constituted an obvious indication that the Arab and Islamic states were on their way to adopting a new, more radical line in confronting Israel and Camp David. The recent statements of Prince Fahd bin 'Abd-al-'Aziz about a holy war are seen as evidence of this development.

What gave exceptional weight to the meetings of the Jerusalem Committee and their results was the fact that PLO Chief Yasir 'Arafat headed the Palestinian delegation, and that the session did not start with an open meeting as usual. In this case, there was only an open final session held at the Casablanca Municipal Building on Tuesday. It was on the third day of the conference which had been scheduled to meet for only 2 days. Thirteen nations attended, including the Iranian Islamic Republic, represented by its charge d'affaires in Rabat. Libya was absent. Three working papers were presented to the meeting, one by Morocco, one by the PLO and one by Jordan, in addition to specific proposals submitted by the Syrian delegation not having the nature of a working paper. Reliable sources revealed to AL-MUSTAQBAL that the extension of the committee's meetings [from 2 to 3 days], was primarily due to disagreements aroused by the Syrian proposals and by a clause in the Palestinian working paper pertaining to the PLO's appeal to the Jerusalem Committee to adopt a resolution calling for Arab and Islamic volunteers to join the ranks of the Palestinian revolution.

Here are the Syrian proposals which stirred up the main debate in the committee's meetings. Some of them were passed, and others were not.

"There should be a political and economic boycott of:

"1. States which have embassies or representatives in Jerusalem.

"2. States which transfer or announce the transfer of their embassies or representatives to Jerusalem.

"3. States which recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel.

"4. States whose officials visit Israeli officials in Jerusalem.

"5. Inasmuch as the United States of America's participation in and adoption of the Camp David agreements and the Egyptian-Israeli pact is tantamount to a conspiracy against the Palestinian cause and the Arab nature of Jerusalem and the occupied Arab and Palestinian lands, the Jerusalem Committee calls on the Islamic states to boycott the United States economically, commercially and financially, according to a definite time table, and that they not provide any military facilities or bases to the United States in the land, air and territorial waters of the Islamic states."

The committee approved the first three proposals, and amended the fourth clause to read as follows: "Contact the states of the world to warn them that any visits by their officials to occupied Jerusalem would be considered encouragement and support for Israel's decision to annex Jerusalem, and to urge them not to make such visits."

The fifth clause of the Syrian proposal was also amended as follows: "Since it has become obvious that the Zionist entity's purpose is to consolidate its occupation and to continue its expansionist plots, as evidenced by its recent decision to incorporate Jerusalem and make it its permanent capital, and in response to the religious and racist act of war which Israel has launched against the Arab and Islamic states by annexing Jerusalem the committee advises the next Islamic summit conference to draw up effective economic, political, cultural and information plans to induce the states which support Israel to stop this support and work to end Israeli occupation of Arab and Palestinian territory, bearing in mind that their continued support for the Zionist entity in light of these facts would have a negative effect on their interests in the Islamic world."

As for the clause in the Palestinian working paper calling for an extraordinary summit meeting, it was agreed that instead of a summit conference, a conference of Islamic foreign ministers would be held on 18 September in Morocco, and that the Islamic summit conference to be held in Tayif would be adequate for the present time.

It has been observed that no resolution was adopted with respect to a holy war, except for the content of the final statement, prefacing the resolutions, which used the following formula, and did not add anything new regarding the earlier positions of the Islamic states on the Israeli Jerusalem decision: "The Arab and Islamic states, reviewing their response to the religious, racist war which Zionism is waging, confirm their determination to continue the holy war to liberate Jerusalem from Zionist occupation, because the holy war, in its sense of human liberation, is the right of everyone whose country has been occupied and whose holy places have been usurped, and is an inescapable obligation."

Right after the end of the activities of the Jerusalem Committee's emergency session, AL-MUSTAQBAL met with Secretary General of the Islamic Conference Organization al-Habib al-Shatti, and had the following interview with him.

[Question] Even though the present session was convened as an extraordinary session because of the Israeli decision about Jerusalem, Egypt is still considered the party directly concerned with this decision. Nevertheless, none of the session's resolutions dealt with Egypt at all, as if Egypt had no connection with the matter. Does that mean that you still hope that Egypt will return to the Islamic Conference Organization? And under what circumstances would that occur?

[Answer] No one disputes the fact that Egypt is a basic factor in the Middle East issue and especially the Palestinian and Jerusalem cause. This requires no explanation, since the history of the cause has shown that Egypt took part in three wars and in all the developments, as is recognized by the organization. But President al-Sadat chose a path which the other parties in the Arab and even the Islamic world cannot agree to, and therefore the Arabs and Moslems were forced, however unwillingly, to freeze Egypt's membership. From that time on, Egypt has followed a path different from that followed by the Arabs and Moslems together. This is the reason we did not refer to Egypt during this session.

As for Egypt's return to the organization, this depends on the desire of Egypt and its rulers first of all, for if Egypt abandoned the Camp David policy which no one doubts has been foiled, and if it returned to the Arab and Islamic ranks, there is no one there who would not welcome the return of a sister dear to everyone's heart. With the Israeli stand over the annexation of Jerusalem, Egypt had a unique opportunity to abandon the Camp David policy, for this stand confirmed Israel's true intentions. But Egypt issued nothing which would indicate that it intended to do so. The strange thing is that Begin's letter to President al-Sadat clearly indicated that Israel was imposing preconditions on Egypt for the resumption of negotiations: keeping Jerusalem as the permanent capital of Israel, and keeping the settlements and even continuing to build more settlements. Begin was unequivocal in his adoption of this stand. So how could it make any sense for negotiations with Israel to continue when its stand was so clear, as I have mentioned, without that constituting a tacit reversal of its stand?

[Question] In your last press conference you denied rumors that the Jerusalem Committee received a letter from President al-Sadat. You said that this was not true, because there was no contact between the committee and the Egyptian regime because Egypt's membership was suspended by ministerial decree and Egypt could not return to the organization without a ministerial decree. Therefore, how do you explain the letter which the Moroccan king recently sent to President al-Sadat in his capacity as president of the Jerusalem Committee?

[Answer] I don't think that in his letter to President al-Sadat King Hasan II mentioned that he was addressing him in his capacity as president of the Jerusalem Committee. As I see it, all there is to the matter is that the Moroccan king, because of his responsibility as an Arab and a Moslem leader, desires the unity of the Arab-Islamic ranks and the continuation of the struggles to liberate Jerusalem and Palestine through beneficial means. He feels that it is his duty to try to bring Egypt back into the Arab-Islamic fold. He believes that the conditions are right for convincing President al-Sadat to abandon the Camp David policy and come back. This explains his initiative in sending a letter to President al-Sadat.

As for the Jerusalem Committee, it knows nothing of this matter, and His Majesty King Hasan II did not inform it of his initiative, which proves that His Majesty did this spontaneously in his capacity as an Arab and Moslem official.

[Question] It is obvious that the committee did not pass any resolution about the holy war. You have defined the holy war as a serious, devoted act for the sake of a noble goal: defending the faith and the holy places.

You have said that war is the basic idea behind a holy war, and that the Islamic Conference Organization is operating according to circumstantial requirements. Does all this mean that Israel has not defiled the faith and the holy places, and that therefore the conditions are not right for calling a holy war, or is the talk about a holy war just for public consumption while waiting for a new strike against Israel?

[Answer] Israel has defiled the sacred places and has violated the honor of the Arabs and the Moslems. There has been a holy war against Israel ever since the 1930's, inasmuch as the Palestinian people's struggle against Israel, with the support of the Arabs and Moslems, has not stopped from then until now. Holy war in the sense I have mentioned is a continuation of the struggle in all fields and by all means, and is something which exists and is ongoing. Holy war has a number of manifestations, including war and economic, cultural and political boycott. All these means are being used as far as possible and under the appropriate circumstances so that the efforts can be crowned with success. If we have not declared a holy war, that is because we believe that a holy war is going on. If some of the aspects to which I have referred have not yet emerged, it is because they are impossible because of conditional or material reasons. To put it more clearly, the holy war's requirements must be met when the conditions are right for attaining the goal for the sake of which the holy war was declared. Holy war is not an end in itself, but is a means of attaining a specific purpose.

[Question] There have been reports that some of the states belonging to the Jerusalem Committee proposed the adoption of a decisive stand vis-a-vis the United States and an economic boycott of it, inasmuch as it is conspiring against the Arabs and Moslems through the Camp David agreements, but that the committee refused. Why was this stand taken?

[Answer] The committee felt that problems and difficulties of no benefit to our cause might arise from boycotting the states which support Israel. Boycott measures must be directed against all the states which support Israel, and if we do so we find ourselves all at once in disputes with a large number of states. For this reason we stated in Clause No 20 of the resolutions that we would try to get these states to give up their support for Israel, and that if they continued to do so, their relations with the Islamic states would meet with difficulties. This means that we will take measures such as boycotts in two stages, the first being an attempt to convince and the second being implementation of the measures.

[Question] It has been observed that the Arab and Islamic states always act defensively to Israel's actions. How can this be? Could these states possibly shift over to a position of practical initiative to confront the recent Israeli decision?

[Answer] At the press conference yesterday I mentioned that Israel, ever since its founding and even before, benefited from conditional circumstances which were right for it and which unfortunately were not right for the Arabs. If the initiative always came from Israel, that was because the conditions were always right for it. We might mention the establishment of Israel right after the hardships which devastated the world after the Second World War. Another circumstance we might mention is the Jewish lobby's control over American information media, which made America an ally of Israel supporting it automatically and unconditionally. In our time, the Arab and Islamic states have begun to acquire the right conditions, making them capable of reacting positively. In the near future, the Arabs and Moslems will become internationally more powerful, which will enable them to take the initiative themselves. What we are doing today is aimed at changing the conditions and making them suitable. This effort will continue in all fields and in all directions until we achieve victory and regain Palestine. Our dispute with Israel was not generated today, and our drubbings over these past few years, such as the annexation of Jerusalem and the population of Arab territory with Zionist settlements, were not the first blows. Our dispute with Israel is a significant, long-range one, because our road to victory is not scattered with flowers. As Churchill said in 1940, when Britain was alone in the field of battle with Germany, "All of it is blood, pain, sweat and tragedy." Will this dissuade us from continuing the struggle? The facts prove that the answer is in the negative. We have lost battles, but we have not lost the war. We shall continue the holy war in its true sense, i.e. using all methods, until we gain victory.

[Question] The Iranian-Arab dispute is no doubt weakening the front of those forces opposed to Israel and its protectors. Is the organization inclined to do something to freeze the Arab-Iranian disputes?

[Answer] Neither side will accept mediation.

[Question] Is it true that the last Security Council session, which would have discussed the Israeli decision, was postponed until the Jerusalem Committee finished its meetings?

[Answer] Yes, the Security Council sessions were suspended for this reason, and they will resume shortly.

Syria Supports a Full Boycott of Israel

Syrian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Faruq al-Shar', who heads the Syrian delegation to the Jerusalem Committee meetings, was the focus of attention of those in the know about what went on in the debates during the closed meetings, inasmuch as the proposals presented by the Syrian delegation were resolute to the point of calling for a boycott of the United States.

AL-MUSTAQBAL met with the Syrian minister of state, who explained that Syria attached a great deal of importance to any organization whose goal was resisting Zionist occupation or mobilizing public opinion against this occupation. Syrian concern for the Jerusalem Committee, and Syria's attempt to play a positive and effective role in it, arises from this consideration.

In response to a question about the general Arab situation, the Syrian minister said that the Arabs had not completely determined the correct way to regain their rights and Jerusalem, because they are at a loss. "What we have tried to do and are trying to do through the Jerusalem Committee meetings is to shed light on this aspect."

ARAB REPLY TO JERUSALEM RESOLUTION TERMED UNSATISFACTORY

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 29 Aug 80 p 17

[Text] Dr Muhammad al-Farra, personal representative of the secretary general of the Arab League, said that the Arab reaction to the Israeli resolution to take Jerusalem in was undesirable.

In a special discussion with AL-QABAS, Dr al-Farra said that Arab weakness tempts Israel to be more arrogant and antagonistic and to adhere to its settlement policy. He added: "The Arabs' continual falling back on the Security Council is no longer helpful since Israel is adopting the matter-of-fact policy without paying attention to international decisions."

Dr al-Farra also said: "The [Arab] reaction to the ominous resolution has not been desirable; it was just more speeches and emotionally-charged statements calling for the crushing of the Zionist racial measure."

Dr al-Farra expressed fear that the Arabs' falling back on international organizations may transform from means to realize peace into a basic goal through which the ideal method to realize just and total peace is forgotten.

He added that the plan to expel Israel from the United Nations is not the first of its kind; the late Palestinian leader, Ahmad al-Shuqayri, had presented such a request to the Security Council and General Assembly more than once when he was the Saudi Arabia representative at the Security Council. The result was always the same: Refusal as a result of a veto. Other attempts took place, where the plan was presented by friendly nations. But the U.S. veto canceled such plans. This leads us to conclude that the timing of the plan during this period of U.S. pre-election campaigns means that the result is as clear as daylight due to the U.S. veto.

Dr al-Farra said that the Security Council's call for the invalidity and illegality of the Israeli action is considered necessary. However, going to the Security Council is not enough in itself.

He added: "Our resorting to the Security Council has become a routine action and is not taken seriously. This has encouraged Israel to continue its expansion and aggression, since it firmly believes that the Security Council will not act as long as those who have the legal right [to complain] limit their reactions to the Zionist action, rejecting, crushing and objecting through antagonistic statements and speeches."

Annexation of the Golan to Israel

On the subject of the Israeli Knesset's intention to issue a decision to annex the occupied Syrian Golan Heights [to Israel] in the same manner like the annexation and Judaization of Jerusalem, Dr al-Farra said: "There is nothing to prevent Israel from taking any decisions related to the occupied lands because the balance of powers is an advantageous factor to the enemy. Moreover, the lack of Arab unity and solidarity, the existing conditions in the Arab area and the Arab weaknesses encourage Israel to be more adventurous within a clear strategy that is being implemented at stages dictated by international circumstances and meticulously chosen by Israel."

Dr al-Farra added that, after their June' July defeat, the Arabs filed a complaint with the Security Council against Israel's plans to change the features of the Arab Jerusalem. However, Israel then declared that it did not take in Jerusalem or take any action toward that, and that they were only providing it with electricity, water and administrative services. But here they are today announcing the taking and the Judaisation of the Holy City and considering it the permanent capital of Israel.

The Arab League's Effectiveness

Dr al-Farra pointed out that the league's effectiveness depends on the Arab nations' desire to support and strengthen it and amend its charter in accordance with the [current] circumstances. He said that he has great hopes that the next summit conference which will be held in Amman will result in action that is competitive with the challenges.

Dr al-Farra concluded his talks by calling for the awakening of the Arab will and the creation of a spirit of struggle that does not enjoy hearing resouding speeches but listens to logic and reasoning.

He also demanded serious action and quick movement within a common strategy to serve the Arab cause as well as freeze the Arab conflicts in the name of Jerusalem.

ISRAELI OFFICIAL CRITICAL OF OCCUPATION POLICY

[Article by Ghazi al-Sa'adi: "All Palestinians in Occupied Territory Want Israel Out"]

[Text] "The military administration of the occupied Arab territory lacks cabinet-level direction." This statement is attributed to Moshe Ma'uz, who has just completed 1 year of service as an adviser to the military administration. Joseph Gho'il, a political correspondent for the JERUSALEM POST, interviewed Ma'uz on this topic. The interview gives a picture of how the Palestinians are treated under the Zionist occupation.

According to the JERUSALEM POST, the former adviser to the Coordinator of the Occupied Territory, an officer attached to the military administration, chose his words extremely carefully, true to his rank as a colonel.

According to Ma'uz, the government simply does not give sufficient attention to finding alternate approaches to a settlement that could help to reduce tension in the occupied territory or to outside pressure for concessions that are unacceptable to Israel. When Ezer Weizman was in office, he knew at least how to tackle problems in a realistic manner. Since his resignation, realistic solutions have disappeared.

As colonel, and as professor of Middle Eastern studies at Hebrew University, Moshe Ma'uz cannot be shrugged off as a leftist academic dove; neither could his appointment to the military administration's office be viewed as an oversight by the rightist Likud Government of Menachem Begin.

Ma'uz, who headed the Truman Institute for Eastern Studies in Jerusalem before assuming his political-military office a little over a year ago, is strongly convinced that under no circumstances will Israel agree to a new arrangement in the occupied territory that could lead to the establishment of a PLO dominated Palestinian state. He is equally convinced that any future Palestinian state will be dominated by the PLO either immediately or soon after its establishment.

Ma'uz disclosed that he had labored hard on a study exploring circumstances under which the Israeli Government could conceivably agree to negotiate with the PLO. His conclusion: "Israel will never be able to find anything to negotiate about with the PLO."

According to him, the PLO, headquartered in Beirut, partly for ideological reasons, but also for self-serving ones, is dedicated to the elimination of the Zionist state. The leadership of the PLO, according to Ma'uz, consists of Palestinians who left the occupied territory in 1948. When these leaders speak about returning to Palestine, he continues, they do not mean the West Bank, but Haifa, Jaffa, Ramleh and Lydda.

Ma'uz adds that his contacts with West Bank and Gaza Strip Arabs have convinced him that the predominant majority of Palestinians are sympathetic to the PLO, and that this sympathy is not about to fade anytime soon, despite what some people believe. He blames the situation on the young, educated Palestinians who, according to him, not only keep this sympathy alive, but who themselves are totally in tune with the PLO and with its ultimate goal of eliminating Israel.

Ma'uz claims that there are some indications that the facade of unanimity put up by the Palestinians has some cracks, a development, according to him, worthy of Israel's attention. He urges Israel to exploit this opening by seeking alternate solutions. While he admits that this is not a top priority of Israel, he is of the view that efforts in this direction could lead to a reduction of tensions.

[Question] Are you referring to the reports which assert that there is a group of relatively moderate Palestinians?

[Answer] Yes, but of course, only to a limited extent. First, there are in the West Bank and Gaza Strip elements which either fear or oppose the PLO. This, of course, is not based on some report by an Israeli committee. Personally, I believe that all Palestinians in the occupied territory want Israel out of their land and their life. I might even add that they prefer a bad Arab government over a good Israeli one. Nevertheless, we cannot ignore the effects of the good environment created by the military administration in the occupied territory. Those who oppose the PLO do so for a variety of reasons: personal interests, competition over leadership, commercial interests, or fear that continued terrorism [by the PLO] could invite violent retaliation by anti-Palestinian Israelis. Another factor to be considered is the dispute between the PLO leadership [in Beirut] and local supporters in the occupied territory. Palestinians in the occupied territory are convinced that any attempt to impose a PLO-dominated Palestinian state on Israel could lead to war, one whose victims would be largely Palestinians.

Ma'uz believes that extremism on the part of certain Arab governments is another complicating factor. In Western diplomacy, according to him, there is always room for intermediate solutions. By contrast, he asserts, Arab diplomacy tends to be extremist, more often demanding victory and the silencing of the moderate voice. Based on this premise, Ma'uz believes that ordinary Arab citizens who would normally settle for what is possible and best for them in a given situation are deprived of the freedom to make their views known. As an example, he cites the PLO's determination to impose its way of thinking on its local leaders [in the occupied territory].

Ma'uz believes that there is an alternative to this trend, which, according to him, surfaced after the 1973 war, and became most acute during the 1976 municipal council elections in the occupied territory. At that time, he says, most mayoral offices went to a young generation of PLO supporters. These mayors, he adds, elected under Israeli supervision, make up the majority of the National Guidance Committee, which is the executive arm of the PLO in the occupied territory. This committee, in PLO plans, is to supply a good portion of the leadership of any future Palestinian state. Ma'uz thinks it is necessary to make contacts with other Arab parties--not Egypt--as a way out of this situation. The problem, according to Ma'uz, is that Weisman, who was receptive to the idea, made it clear to Ma'uz that Begin was absolutely opposed to this approach. Begin, Ma'uz continues, insists on his version of autonomy for the West Bank and Gaza, a version unacceptable to all Palestinians. On the other hand, according to Ma'uz, the autonomy blueprint proposed by the United States and Egypt would ultimately lead to the creation of a Palestinian state, something which Israel rejects categorically.

Ma'uz insists that Israel is the state most deeply concerned about finding a solution. Failure to find a solution, Ma'uz says, is bound to subject Israel to increasing international pressure. Based on this prediction, Ma'uz believes that Israel must explore every alternative to the present situation. Adherence to its version of autonomy, Ma'uz insists, will lead nowhere.

Ma'uz, who will soon return to his teaching position at Hebrew University after 1 year of service with the military administration, says he is concerned about this lack of initiative on the part of the Israeli government, and blames the "closed minds" within the military administration. "I do not know who will succeed me in this position, but it will not be easy to find one," Ma'uz concludes.

Before departing for Washington for a 2-month study tour, Ma'uz, still wearing his colonel's uniform, appeared perplexed about the government "which had begun to neglect its duties." By contrast, the former defense minister, Moshe Dayan, dedicated a good portion of his time to the administration of the occupied territory. According to some observers, that was the reason he neglected his other duties within the Israeli military establishment. By comparison, Peres paid less attention that Dayan to the occupied territory. The flamboyant Weisman, on the other hand, while paying the least amount of attention to the occupied territory, nevertheless possessed the ability to find correct solutions to complex problems.

"Now that Weisman is gone," according to Ma'uz, "the situation is becoming worse." To fill the vacuum, the chief of staff, General Rafa'el Eitan, and the coordinator of the occupied territory, Danny Matt [or Mott], are assuming the role of policy makers, an essentially political role. While these two may be excellent military men, they have no training in dealing with complex nonmilitary matters, especially at a time when the occupied territory is seething with tension.

Ma'uz believes that the administration of the occupied territory and the search for alternate solutions ought to be a ministerial level responsibility. Furthermore, anyone entrusted with this responsibility, according to him, must answer directly to the prime minister.

Ma'uz concludes: "I feel confident that such a person or group of persons can find a way to create disaffection between the Palestinians of the occupied territory and the PLO, and to convince the Palestinians to settle for autonomy as a prelude to the creation of a federal union" [with Jordan].

PLO OFFICIAL CLAIMS PALESTINIAN MEDIA SUCCESS IN JAPAN

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 24 Aug 80 p 17

[Report on interview with Fathi 'Abd al-Hamid, PLO Representative in Tokyo, by FALASTIN BILADI Magazine and Japanese journalists, in Tokyo; date not given]

[Text] When Mr Fathi 'Abd al-Hamid arrived in Tokyo to open the first PLO office in Japan he held a news conference at the Arab League's Tokyo office attended by 20 editors and political commentators representing Japan's major news-media. The question on the minds of those present then was: Where are the machineguns, the time bombs, the mines, the checkered Palestinian headgear? Today, 3 years later, press conferences given by Mr 'Abd al-Hamid have become an important means for dialogue with Japanese journalists. Mr 'Abd al-Hamid has demonstrated that he is a seasoned journalist, a media expert held in esteem by his Japanese colleagues. According to him: "Information, like water, falls in drops at first, before becoming a torrent." We asked him candid questions, and he responded candidly.

[Question] This is the third meeting organized by FALSTIN BILADI between you and Japanese journalists. How do you assess this experiment and what does the future hold?

[Answer] First, I want to make clear that meeting with Japanese journalists is not something new. We have been doing that since the [PLO] office opened. Our friends in the Japanese media have played a prominent role in explaining our struggle to the friendly Japanese people. I am proud to say that without their help we would not have been able to carry out our projects, beginning with 'Palestine Week,' which was held in Yokohama in June 1977, and terminating with the [publication] of FALASTIN BILADI. What is new is the manner in which we meet. Formerly, we met with them as committees. During those meetings we prepared our plans, and they helped us to assess the public mood in Japan. The present meeting includes all of our friends. As a first step, we now meet with anyone who wishes to engage with us in dialogue, to exchange views, to present a position, or to inquire about a topic of interest. Our meetings now are expanded, as you see, and include journalists from a variety of news establishments.

The positive response of Japanese journalists has encouraged us to hold monthly meetings and to add new topics to our discussions. Last month, for example, we used the monthly meeting to introduce our brother, the well-known storyteller al-Tayyib Salih. Today, our meeting is attended by the famed actress Haroko Mabutchi, who will tell us about her experience with Palestinians. Also, the author-journalist Mizukazu Shibo will show us some photographs taken during a visit to the West Bank and share with us his impressions. All these things enrich our meetings and bring us new friends.

You can get an idea of how successful future meetings will be by considering the fact that only 20 journalists were present when we first opened this office. All of them had been correspondents for news agencies operating in the Arab world. Today, more than 120 journalists are taking part in our activities, and new ones are being added at every meeting.

We look forward to adding new friends, not only from the community of political journalists, but from the ranks of economic, cultural, and social journalists. Our aim, as we emphasize at each meeting, is not to make propaganda and issue statements, but to exchange views candidly on matters of concern to both sides.

[Question] There has been a passing reference to this meeting in the Japanese press, but no mention of the last "Fath" conference or any of the discussions following that conference regarding the prominent role assumed by the PLO. These are important developments. Do you not think that ignoring them in the Japanese press is a discouraging sign?

[Answer] We do not presume that this meeting, which is not a press conference, to be featured in the newspapers our friends here work for. We have said that this meeting is for the purpose of exchanging views candidly on matters of vital concern to both sides. Our goal is to deepen our knowledge, with the hope that what we learn will be reflected in the press at large. The Japanese press has been both understanding and supportive. This is a gain for us. A journalist does not report what we say. He analyzes events logically and objectively and expresses his views in his own way. When he writes he makes his own judgments. In order to see how the press responds to what we say, you must see what the press reports on our press meetings. As an illustration, take the two press conferences held in July in connection with the visit of the Palestinian delegation to Japan. These conferences were featured on pages 1 and 2. Reports on our press conferences in Japanese newspapers is a better criterion for judging whether the Japanese press is responsive to us. Reports that our press conferences have been ignored or inadequately covered represent the opinions of some journalists.

[Question] Why have you selected member of parliament Tokoma Otsonomia to be the guest of honor for your monthly meeting?

[Answer] You must know, of course, that Mr Otsonomia is an independent member of parliament. He has his own views and is supported by a large constituency. He is also well respected in many political circles. In addition, he is the adviser of the Japanese-Palestinian Friendship Association of the Japanese parliament, which has more than 100 members belonging to a variety of political persuasions. His selection to be our guest of honor stems from our desire to remain independent and to avoid entanglement in Japanese political disputes. His selection confirms our neutrality and assures us of support from all political quarters.

[Question] Any reason for selecting the actress Mabutchi?

[Answer] Yes. Our efforts are not directed at one sector of Japanese society to the exclusion of others. In addition to politicians, members of parliament, jouralists, academicians, researchers and economists, we are trying to reach the entire educated class. We are trying to influence public opinion through leaders in every walk of life. In the past, we have not been able to influence public opinion because we did not know how to go about it. Wait for the response of the educated class to our November 29 program, now being prepared. We expect it to go very well with the Japanese people.

[Answer] The famous singer Tokiko Kato has agreed to sing a number of songs as a salute to our people on World Solidarity day. Our planning committee for the November 29 program boasts a number of prominent people: authors, artists, literary leaders, and professors. We are in the midst of a campaign to gather the views of some of Japan's most famous people. These views will be published and distributed during the coming celebration.

[Question] You spoke earlier of al-Tayyib Salih's visit to Japan. Are there any indications that the visit had any positive effects?

[Answer] His primary mission was to learn and discover. He met with Japanese authors and men of letters. They exchanged views, and both sides expressed a desire to learn more about each other's culture. Unfortunately, such exchanges in the past were carried out with the aid of third parties. The two sides recognized a need for direct discussions between the educated Japanese people and their Arab counterparts. Al-Tayyib Salih discovered that some Japanese people have read his recent publications. He was well received as an author. If anything, the meetings showed a need for beginning a dialogue between the Japanese and Arab people. That, in my view, was a positive accomplishment.

ARAB DEFENSE INDUSTRY ORGANIZATION--Preliminary discussions took place between Saudi Arabia, Iraq and the United Arab Emirates to establish a specialized Arab defense industry organization with a capital of $3 billion, similar to the previous defense industry organization headed by Ashraf Marwan, which the Gulf nations and Egypt established and later froze. This subject is said to have been the topic of discussion during Saddam Hussein's visit to al-Tayif last Ramadan. The concerned countries contacted Kuwait to include it in the project. However, the Kuwaitis had their reservations on the project, as they previously felt about the project with Egypt. They said that Arab countries will not be able to produce weapons at the desired level, in addition to buying weapons from other countries at a lesser price. But Iraq disagrees with Kuwait on this point and says that the time is right to cooperate with some European and Third World countries that are advanced in the defense industry, such as France, Italy, Yugoslavia, India and Sweden, to establish an advanced defense industry that makes the Arabs less dependent on foreign countries. KARMAL MEETS WITH 'FRONTIER GHANDI'

[News report: "Babrak Karmal Meets With Ghaffar Khan, the Frontier Gandhi; Ghaffar Khan To Launch Movement in Support of Karmal; Ajmal Khatak Appointed Leader of the Movement; Government Allots Big Sum to It"]

[Text] Kabul, August 16 (Radio Report)--Babrak Karmal head of the puppet government of Afghanistan, met in Kabul with Ghaffar Khan, the Frontier Gandhi, on the occasin of 'Id al-Fitr [post-Ramadan holiday]. A report of the meeting was broadcast over Radio Kabul.

The BBC correspondent in Delhi says that the report confirmed the news that Babrak Karmal wanted to use the influence of Ghaffar Khan to gain the support of Pathan tribes. The freedom-loving tribal bands settled on the Pakistan-Afghanistan border are at their strongest at this time.

The BBC, citing diplomatic sources, reports that Babrak Karmal has earmarked a large sum of money to gain the support of tribal leaders in these areas. The leader of this movement is Ajmal Khatak. It is said that he is trying to organize a guerrilla army in support of the present Afghan regime. According to plans drawn up, Frontier Gandhi will tour the frontier provinces [in behalf of the movement].

Diplomatic circles in Kabul are not very hopeful about the outcome of this movement. They are of the opinion that the frontier regions are not likely to accept the complete domination of the Karmal administration, and that Karmal supporters cannot effectively tour these areas.

RUSSIANS USE INCENDIARY BOMBS TO CRUSH AFGHAN REGIMENT'S REVOLT

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 17 Aug 80 pp 1, 6

[News report: "Russians Use Incendiary Weapons and Balls of Fire Against Revolting Afghan Army; Several Towns and Villages Reduced to Ashes; Many Army Men Burned Alive"]

[Text] Kabul, August 16 (JASARAT Report)--To crush rebellion within the 14th Division of the Afghan Army in Ghazni, the Russians mercilessly used fireballs on the Afghans and burned many soldiers alive. Two infantry regiments of the 14th Division were protesting the appointment of a junior officer, a member of the Parcham Party, as their commander. The Russian forces took stern measures against the protest, which caused a rebellion in the whole division. The Afghan soldiers began to fight the Russians. In spite of their latest weapons, helicopters and tanks, it took the Russians 10 days to crush the rebellion.

The Kabul correspondent of the London DAILY TELEGRAPH has given details of this rebellion. According to his report, the Russian Army used incendiary devices and fireballs to chase Afghan soldiers out of hiding places in army shelters and on the front. Many Afghan soldiers fled to hide in ditches in the countryside. They too became targets of incendiary weapons. Many Afghans were burned alive in their places of refuge. Those who came out to the open were bombed by Russian helicopters.

The correspondent's report also said that in the area of (Bala Hissar), the towns of (Shevai) and (Charkogar) have been burned to ashes. Many villages are simply no longer there. It would seem as if a big earthquake or inferno had swept through them and wiped them off the face of this earth. Most of the population of the area has been decimated. Survivors are in a state of shock. Those who managed to escape from this area and reached Kabul were arrested by workers of the Parcham Party and the police, and were taken away to various unknown destinations.

OIL DEPOT DESTROYED, RUSSIAN COMMANDER SUFFERS HEART ATTACK

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 16 Aug 80 pp 3, 6

[News report: "Mujahidin Destroy Largest Russian Oil Depot in Pul Khumri; 200 Afghans Shot Dead by the Russians; Taxi Drivers Arrested; Russian Commander Has Heart Attack"]

[Excerpts] London, 15 August (APP/AFP/Radio Report)--The Mujahidin have blown up the largest Russian oil depot in Afghanistan. The depot in Pul Khumri, in the northern part of the country, kept ablaze for 3 days and 3 nights. Its flames lit up the high ranges of the Hindu Kush mountains.

A DAILY TELEGRAPH report, based on local sources, said that when the storage facility was destroyed, there was rejoicing among the Muslim population of the region. Immediately after the depot was blown up, oil rationing began in Afghanistan, and a black market in oil sprang up. In Kabul, taxi drivers increased their fares 100 percent.

TIME magazine carried reports of fighting in the streets of Afghan cities. It said that in the last 3 weeks, the resistance movement of the Mujahidin has become stronger, and that Afghan troops are having a hard time crushing it. In Herat, the resistance is particularly strong, and it has become impossible for the Russian Army to enter the city. In fact, Afghan Army vanguards have advised the Russians to stay outside the limits of Herat. The Russians have, therefore, put a siege around the city. The purpose of the siege is to keep their supply lines intact.

Citing Radio Kabul, INA reports from Baghdad that Mujahidin resistance has intensified in the northern part of Afghanistan, and that the Mujahidin have destroyed many government buildings.

In the province of Kunduz the Mujahidin have carried out several big raids this month. This was revealed by Radio Kabul in its news commentaries. The commentaries also said that the Afghan Army has killed many insurgents and wounded many others, but the exact number of dead or wounded was not given.

AFP reports from Delhi that orders have been issued to crush resistance among Kabul taxi drivers, who are accused of cooperating with the Mujahidin. Each day, a number of taxi drivers are taken to the Ministry of the Interior, where their papers are examined.

Orders have been issued that tourists and visitors who want to go to Kabul should first get visas from the Afghan embassy in their country. Indian Airlines has announced that only passengers who have proper visas to travel to Afghanistan will be sold tickets.

The Ministry of Defense has told the paper KARVAN-I-AZADI that the government has confiscated the arms of over 200 Mujahidin captured on 1 1 July, and that most of them have been sentenced to death.

According to the DAILY TELEGRAPH, 120 T-72 tanks, 250 other vehicles and 9 helicopters have so far been destroyed in Afghanistan. The DAILY TELEGRAPH also reports that because of the destruction of the Pul Khumri oil depot and insurgence in two Arghan regiments, General (Mikhaelov?) commander-in-chief of the Russian forces in Afghanistan, had a heart attack.

AFP reports from Delhi that a high level military delegation from Russia has arrived in Kabul. The delegation has been accommodated in a guest house, and a powerful, sensitive antenna has been placed over it. Two incidents, the arrival of the delegation and the assassination of members of the ruling party, have taken place at the same time. A similar high level military delegation had visited Kabul in November 1979.

According to reports received in New Delhi from the Afghan capital, soldiers of the Pul Charkhi garrison who belong to the Khalq Party have been stripped of their weapons. The soldiers are anti-Karmal. The Pul Charkhi garrison has become a center of the Khalq Party. Supporters of the Khalq Party are said to comprise 80 to 90 percent of the total garrison.

AFP reports that three French convoys have arrived in Afghanistan with food and medicines; these supplies are contributed by the French people to the people of Afghanistan.

PORT SA'ID SUFFERS FROM RECESSION

Cairo AL-AHRAM AL-IQTISADI in Arabic 25 Aug 80 pp 28-29

[Article by Gamal Zayda: "Recession Invades Port Sa'id"]

[Text] Recession has begun to contract Port Said's economy, and visitors from Cairo and other cities have decreased. People bought more in Port Said following school examinations and at the beginning of summer but that was only a slight increase in economic activity and not comparable with the commercial revial of 1976-77.

Several recently decreed economic guidelines have had an effect on the level of economic activity, e.g., government regulation of importing into Port Said, implemented last March, new customs duties, and a new customs law, implemented the first of July.

Government Guidelines and Smuggling

Al-Sayid al-Kilani, president of the Port Said Chamber of Commerce, says, "The recession's orgins go back to new customs duties, which have decreased the price differential between Port Said and the rest of the country. The differential has become minimal, and in addition Port Said visitors endure discomfort owing to the nature of the customs system. However responsible officials say that treatment of these visitors has recently changed. New customs duties have also decreased taxes on many goods, which should lead to an increase in the numbers of persons visiting the city."

Guidelines

Government guidelines have been set up in order to counteract smuggling. Al-Kilani says that Port Said has changed from a consuming to a productive industrial town. The Port Said Free Zone's Board of Directors has issued an order limiting the importation of easily smuggled goods to a total of LE 70 million, affecting some 11 commodities as follows: watches--LE 2 million; cigarette lighers--LE 250,000; tires--LE 1 million; eyeglasses and medical lenses--LE 400,000; soda pop--LE 200,000; ready-to-wear clothing--LE 23 million; fabrics--LE 26 million; batteries--LE 350,000; cassette players--LE 4 million; cosmetics--LE 1.3 million; china and crystal--LE 1.5 million; new importers--LE 10 million.

Each importer's quantities, based on previous import volume, have also been limited by the chamber. As a result importers think twice before importing an item. This has led to the importation of better quality merchandise, mostly from Europe, since importers cannot exceed limited monetary sums.

Guidelines Loopholes

Although the Chamber of Commerce's president says that no problems have resulted from guideline implementation, a regional association of Port Said importers has another opinion. Mustafa Marwan, president of the association, says, "Implementation of the guidelines, which were issued by a committee of the Port Said Free Zone authority, has demonstrated that they have had many bad side effects. For example some importers have contracts for ready-to-wear clothes and fabrics, two commodities that have special marketing systems. Such contracts are made with factories 3 to 6 months before production, each summer and winter, and an importer who does not get a contract during that time loses his chance to import these goods. Also previous contracts and agreements concerning other commodities bind both parties to the contract."

Marwan says that problems will arise from prior 1979 contracts and agreements, which create obligations for both importers and exporters. There could be financial and commercial effects in cases of non-compliance. Hence the necessity to solve these problems in a manner agreeable to all parties; the authority that issued the guidelines should take part in settlements to protect the reputation of Egyptian merchants. Some merchants have contracts requiring that they pay for goods within 60 to 90 days from date of arrival.

Decision Benefits a Few

Some small importers say that they have been harmed by the guidelines, since they must limit imports according to their previous year's volume, i.e., if they imported a small amount last year they will be limited to that amount this year. As a result the import business is increasingly limited to a small number of persons, and small importers have to buy from big importers dominating the market. Egyptian importers with limited resources have turned to foreign importers, such as the Lebanese and Armenians who import and warehouse within the port so that their commodities do not enter Port Said itself as stipulated by the guidelines. Some Egyptian importers thus import from these foreign warehouses.

The guidelines also stipulate that used clothing worth LE 500,000 should be imported, which raises a question. For whose benefit was this tacked on? It is well-known that used clothing is not subject to customs duties and could cause skin diseases.

Customs Duties

Ramadan Mustafa, general director of Port Said customs, says that the new customs duties have had major benefits for Port Said visitors. The normal customs exemption for travelers arriving at Egyptian airports and ports is 40 percent, with 100 percent exemption for the first LE 100 worth of merchandise brought in. All other imported goods are subject to a uniform duty of 100 percent, irrespective of normal duties. However in Port Said normal duties are assessed regardless of a commodity's value. If a visitor to Port Said takes out a sewing machine he pays a 35 percent duty, or 50 percent duty if he selects a 12-inch black and white television. He would have paid 100 percent duty if these items were imported through an Egyptian airport.

A knitting machine costing LE 80 would be assessed 100 percent at Cairo airport, but only 2 percent coming through Port Said. In addition duties on clothing and fabrics have been reduced from 250 to 125 percent excepting silk, gablan, aubusson, and needlework, which each receives 150 percent duty. Mustafa adds, "The new duties encourage purchasing china at Port Said, because its duty has been reduced from 200 to 100 percent."

He says, "New customs legislation implemented the first of July will have a great effect in limiting smuggling, because it will punish persons selling goods who are unable to prove that they paid duties on those goods. The fine for this violation has been increased from LE 1,000 to LE 50,000, with a 5 year prison sentence; both penalities are applied simultaneously with no choice of one or the other as formerly. The old law allowed conciliation between merchants and customs officials, even after sentencing. The new law forbids conciliation after sentencing."

In spite of the new duties smuggling has not stopped. Port Said customs chiefs have uncovered many smuggling attempts. Some smugglers have stuffed car tires and concocted tanks within fuel tanks so as to have space in which to hide goods.

[Article: "Egyptian Workers Abroad Receive Lower Salaries than Foreign Workers; Labor Market Study Inside and Outside Egypt Needed to Establish a Balance"]

[Text] How can the flow of Egyptian workers abroad be controlled while, at the same time, the public, private and agricultural sectors are suffering a severe shortage of labor which leads to lower performance levels in these sectors? What is the best solution to this problem where several controversial opinions and policies exist among the concerned parties, especially since the constitution guarantees every citizen the right to travel, reside and move without restrictions whatsoever?

How can the labor problem be economically discussed as if labor was a commodity subject to supply and demand? What are the practical solutions to this problem which affects our economic, social and production progress?

A suggestion presented to the People's Assembly by its member 'Ali Hilali the beginning. Hilali demanded the reorganization and reconsideration of the policy of exporting Egyptian workers. Then the special parliamentary committee realized that no decisions could be issued on that subject because of the various aspects and responsibilities related to it, which require several hearings by the concerned ministers and representatives of workers syndicates.

'Ali Hilali said that it is necessary to temporarily stop issuing visas to agricultural, technical and general workers until the overall labor policy is reviewed and rules and regulations related to leave without pay are reconsidered.

'Sabri al-Qadi, chairman of the special parliamentary committee, said that Egypt enjoys a large population increase which is a national resource in itself. But, unfortunately, due to illiteracy, the lack of training and organized labor, this resource has become a burden on the government.

Sabri al-Qadi said: "I wonder how we could benefit from this resource and how we could achieve liaison between the state and the citizens who are abroad?

I see the need to establish a special government agency to carry out this task and research the method through which the increase in labor could be useful inside and outside Egypt, especially since the Egyptian workers' salaries are much lower than their coworkers of other nationalities, particularly in Arab countries."

Jamal 'Askar, head of the central organzation for mobilization and statistics, said that this temporary [worker] emigration is a big problem and, until now, they have been unable to determine how many Egyptians are working abroad although this task was assigned to our embassies. It became evident that Egyptians do not contact their consulates abroad and that the purpose of travel could not be determined. For example, those who travel for the purpose of pilgrimage to Mecca use this pilgrimage as a step to look for work. They have also tried to get officials in Arab countries to help them get reports on the number of Egyptian workers [in their countries], but they refused. Moreover, in preparing their statistics, these countries do not differentiate between Egyptians and [other] foreigners; they describe all non-national workers as expatriates, whether they were Egyptian or other.

Jamal 'Askar also said that the labor law has gaps which led to the flow of technical workers abroad. The law requires employers to agree that the wife must accompany her husband, or vice versa, when either has a job abroad. In addition to this, financial incentives [abroad] naturally attract qualified Egyptian workers.

The head of the central organization for mobilization and statistics added that the escape of qualified workers from government and the public sector affected performance levels. Even those sent on scholarships abroad do not return to Egypt, but prefer to remain in foreign countries after they acquire the certificates and degrees the government sent them for at its own expense, and after the government had given them experience and training.

He also said that the central bureau of organization and management must have an effective role in facing this crisis because employees who leave their jobs are those with experience and training.

The question here was: What are the proposed solutions to control this phenomenon?

Jamal 'Askar said that there must be law provisions preventing workers or those with government grants from leaving their jobs without [the government's] approval, and increasing penalties on violators.

He also suggested that one of the penalities should be to deny the [violating] employee his salary, bonus and workers' compensation. The law amendment must also control the flow of qualified people abroad before this flow causes work stoppage in government, the public and private sectors. He also finds it necessary to conclude international agreements specifying the type and number of labor each country needs. The ministries of foreign affairs and manpower and training are responsible for this task. The type and number of workers sent to Arab and African countries must also be restricted.

Dr Husayn Kazim, manager of the central bureau of organization and management, said that it is easy to prevent labor export. Some people call for this while others call for the freedom of travel. But what is the solution?

In fact, the labor market must be studied because labor, like any other commodity, is subject to the law of supply and demand. Thus, labor demand must be defined, at all levels, inside and outside Egypt. On the other hand, the [increasing] number of graduates presents an oversupply problem to the government. The problem is a matter of supply and demand and a balance must be established; this is the core of the problem.

Dr Kazim also said that a field study has been conducted which confirmed the existence of a shortage in certain specialties and a surplus in others. The study was presented by the ministry of manpower and training to the ministerial committee for public services. The minister of state for education and scientific research based his coordination efforts of various educational levels on the results of this study. We would like to provide workers from this great number of graduates. For example, members of the army could be sufficiently trained before their release. We have examples of such successful attempts in some countries, such as Korea and the United States. A census was made by government of job seekers and the ministerial committee approved our proposal to train 25 percent of them at the ministry of housing and land reclamation in metallurgy and other trades. We wrote to all the ministries seeking their opinion in utilizing these workers.

Member of the People's Assembly and committee member Sa'd Bashir wonders whether the government is aware of such a flow of specialities abroad. The passports administration must have a major role in solving this problem. Necessary controls and procedures to restrict workers' travel destinations could be included in the passport. Mr Bashir suggested that a file containing all the necessary documents be kept on every Egyptian citizen who leaves his country.

Relative to construction workers, Muhammad Fahmi Badr, president of the construction workers syndicate, said that this type of worker is available and that he was prepared to immediately provide any number required in this field. He also said that it would be difficult to control travel for the purpose of pilgrimage or tourism, which are the two major outlets used by a great number of those seeking work abroad.

NEW REGULATIONS NEEDED TO PREVENT CATASTROPHE IN HOUSING INDUSTRY

Cairo AKHBAR AL-YAWM in Arabic 26 Jul 80, pp 5, 15

[Article: "After Al-Sharrabiya Incident New Houses on Their Way Toward Collapsing."

[Text] The problem has become dangerous. The incidents of the collapse of houses has become a dangerous phenomena. Houses are collapsing without determining the responsibility--even if the responsibility is determined, the maximum punishment is 7 years' imprisonment. The victims get buried and the complaints cease. Another house collapses and a new incident occurs followed by complaints and stories; then suddenly everything quiets down. The officials begin relaesing meager compensation and not one resolution is made to put an end to the phenomena of houses' collapsing.

Planning engineers in Cairo and al-Jiza confirm that we are going to hear more about houses collapsing in the near future. This, they say, will be caused by the housing shortage which forces people to add vertically to their buildings disregarding the planning laws and regulations. The greediness of landlords forces them to build.... They also elude the law in order to acquire a building permit or they build without a permit. Even if the court rules to demolish the new addition, this order cannot be carried out since the tenants would have occupied the unit.

Housing experts feel that the problem is primarily the responsibility of the landlord and then the tenant.

The last incident occurred in al-Sharrabiya....

The tenants had their early morning meal and then went back to sleep.... No one realized that the breakfast they had was the last one for many of the tenants of a building located in al-Sharrabiya area. After everyone went to sleep, the whole building collapsed and became a heap of rubble and under this rubble there were 24 innocent people dead in addition to a number of injured tenants.

No One Does Anything About This Problem

Everyone forgets about the incident until another one occurs and tenants end up dead under the rubble of their apartments.

All that the officials do after every incident is to form committees and then dispense meager compensation for the victims. Not one decision is made to put an end to these reoccurring dangerous phenomena.

If we go back to the past 10 years, we find that the incidents reoccurred and not one decision was made.

Nothing Happened

After the reoccurance of this phenomena, without narrowing down the responsibility, the Ministry of Housing and Construction decided in June 1975 to form a committee of nine experts from the ministry, the universities and the Union of Engineers to amend building laws to end the discrepencies of the building laws and to implement strict punishment against the violators.... This committee presented several suggestions which included facilitations in acquiring permits, from the administrative point of view, restriction from the engineering point of view in addition to stricter punishment for those who violate the laws and regulations.

The committee was then dissolved without the execution of any of its suggestions and the phenomena of houses collapsing continued.

Non-preventive Laws

If a person is caught adding new floors to his building, the fine does not exceed 20 Egyptian pounds and the demolition of the new addition although it is impossible at times to execute the demolition of the new addition due to the fact that the tenants who have already occupied the unit refuse to be evicted.

If the building collapses and the person responsible is the owner, the punishment is 6 months' imprisonment and a fine of 200 Egyptian pounds according to engineer Sa'd Zaghlul 'Allam, general director of the engineering administration in the area North of al-Jiza. If the punishment is stiffer, the sentence will not be less than 1 year nor more than 7 years' imprisonment. When the responsibility is that of the Union Engineers who approved the construction, then the punishment is either 5 years' imprisonment and a fine of 500 Egyptian pounds or one of the two.

If the collapse of the building did not cause human loss, then the fine imposed on the landlord is minimum since he is the one that suffered the loss of a building and the engineer is brought before the civil court.

In spite of the fact that this punishment forces the landlord to check the condition of his building before any new addition is constructed, the 20 Egyptian pound fine for not acquiring a permit and the demolition order which does not take place, allow the landlord to take the laws and regulations very lightly and to start adding to his building without any permits for the purpose of additional income.

Planning Engineers Defend Themselves

Planning engineers in Cairo and al-Jiza defend themselves by denying their failure to inspect the cases of violations which occur in their areas and in other governorates on daily bases.

Engineer Sa'd Zaghlul said:

"The number of housing units has increased tremendously in Cairo and al-Jiza and the shortage of engineers make it impossible to cover all these areas. This in addition to the fact that the housing crisis forces many citizens to make vertical additions to their buildings with the acquisition of a permit in spite of their awareness that this will endanger their lives.

"The responsibility of a planning engineer is restricted to inspection after a complaint has been received. As for the permit, any landlord can acquire it by presenting a report from a consultative engineer stating that the foundations can bear the required addition."

Engineer Sami 'Imam, director of planning in the north area said: "The operation of inspection continues but our authority as planning engineers is restricted to issuing a report concerning any violation related to the lack of acquiring a permit and then to issue an order to stop the construction work according to Article 17 of the Law 106. If the violation continues then we issue an order for the elimination of all the work related to the construction operation. However, the landlord ignores the reports and the orders and continues the work after working hours or even in the evening."

The Tenants Are Responsible

Engineer Lutfi Muhammad Hasan in the southern section said: "The only guarantee against the occurance of such catastrophes are the tenants' reported complaints. The tenants can inform the officials about any violation committed by the landlord or about any attempt to add new floors without a permit.

"The responsibility of a planning engineer is to stop the construction work ever works nor does the landlord abide by it."

The Acquisition of a Permit Is Easy

The danger is not anymore the only result of the addition of new floors without a permit. To acquire a permit, from the engineering point of view, has become an easy task. As soon as the landlord acquires a report from a union engineer, that the foundation of the building can support the addition of new floors, the permit is granted.

Warning against this dangerous phenomena, Maj Gen 'Ali Yusri, head of the area north of al-Jiza said: "These reports have become a profitable operation for many engineers. The report is a piece of paper signed by an engineer and is used by the landlord to acquire a permit. With a permit, the landlord can do whatever he wishes since the housing administration does not run an inspection on the foundation which is in itself a dangerous issue.

"In fact the large sum of money, up to 3,000 Egyptian pounds for 2 new floors, forces the landlord to build without that permit. The permit, in this case, is a two-edged sword. On one hand it igves the government a good return and it emphasizes the seriousness of the landlord's intentim to build. On the other hand it forces people to avoid it due to the high cost.

"When the engineer discovers that there is a violation, he issues an order to stop the construction work and he notifies the police. In a very simple way, the landlord will resume the construction work in the evening.

"When an official report is concluded and is turned over to the courts, it will take 6 years before an order for demolishing the illegal addition is issued. Such a court order cannot be executed since the additional units would have been occupied and it becomes impossible to evict the tenants."

The head of the north area demands the facilitation of acquiring a permit from the financial point of view. He added that, after that, the punishment can be made stricter on those who build without a permit.

Maj Gen Sayid 'Othman, deputy minister of the Ministry of Housing and Construction, denies the responsibility of his ministry for what is happening by saying: "Although it is true that the cause of houses collapsing is the addition of new floors without permits, yet if we issue an official report on the violation, the court will find legal, national (due to the housing crisis) and emotional justifications which will prohibit the court from ruling not in favor of the landlord.

"The responsibility is primarily that of the landlord and secondly that of the tenant who should report immediately any attempt by the landlord to add new floors to the building without a permit.

"There is a shortage of engineers since many of them prefer to work abroad. Even if we have the engineer, we find it difficult to supply the adequate means of transportation."

Dr Yahya Qabil, dean of the Cairo School of Engineering said: "It is true that some union engineers sign reports about the strength of the foundations to support the building without inspecting. However it is impossible to meet the demand of some people to allow only the consultative engineering firms to do so mainly because these are small jobs and the consultative firms are not going to occupy themselves with that.

"For this reason, it is important that the responsible parties, at the Ministry of Housing and the governorates bear their responsibility by inspecting the building location before issuing the permit. If it is proven that the engineering report is false, the engineer will be severely punished. This alone does not solve the problem. An engineer should be appointed to supervise the construction work.

"Due to the current housing crisis many things are overlooked and no violations are dealt with and the fines are very insignificant. This encourages landlords to build. Because of this reason, punishments should be stricter."

Dr 'Abd al-Mun'im Ahmad Musa, professor of earth mechanics and foundations at the 'Ain Shams School of Engineering demands that the Union of Engineers formulates the basis and regulations which would control to work of those engineers who sign the reports. This will put an end to the violations which are being committed.

Consultative engineer, Dr Kamal 'Ism'il said: "The problem is basically the lack of nationalism and the desire for materialistic gains. Many engineers have ignored their honorable duty, have lost their devotion to their work and have given little consideration to human lives. Many of those engineers have graduated from engineering school but they did not contribute to their profession. They are people suffering from the lack of knowledge in their own field.

BUILDING ADDITIONS DISCUSSED AS PART OF HOUSING CRISIS

Cairo AKHBAR AL-YAWM in Arabic 26 Jul 80 p 5

[Article: "The Experts Disagreed...The Landlords Fought and the Tenants Lost"]

[Text] The condition of the building allows the addition of new floors. The condition of the building does not allow the addition. These are the opinions of two consultants. The first opinion is that of the landlord and the second opinion is that of the tenants; the housing administration is lost between the two. The parties go to court, which in its turn calls upon a judicial expert. The court's decision takes years and years during which the price of construction materials rise and people lose the opportunity to rent a house. This often occurs when the landlords and the tenants disagree about increasing the height of buildings.

Building 32 on Abu al-Mahasin Street: The owner of this building requested a license to raise his building by two floors. He attached to his application a report from a consultant stating that the condition of the building allows the additional floors. The Ministry of Housing granted him a license for the new addition. One of the building's tenants presented a report from another expert emphasizing the fact that the building's condition does not allow the addition of the two new floors. The license was suspended and the whole case turned over to the courts.

Building 21 on University Street has eight floors. Its owner was granted a license allowing him to add two new floors then the tenants presented a report from another expert objecting to the addition of the two new floors. The mayor suspended the license and everyone wondered while waiting.

Mr 'Ali Yusri, president of the northern neighborhood of al-Jizah said: "We have requested from the housing legal advisor that he advise us on this subject.... Some people feel that licensing additional floors should be postponed and that it should be suspended if the license were already issued until the differences, arising from contradictory engineering reports, are solved. This should be accomplished by a ruling based upon a final report by a judiciary expert. The housing administration would then execute the ruling of the court."

Who Is Right?

This issue raises many questions such as, why would two reports given by consultants be contradictory?

The Union of Engineers has its opinion concerning this issue.

The secretary general of the Union of Engineers, Mr 'Ahmad Mazin said:

"When there are two contradictory opinions, the matter should be presented to the union for a professional ruling. If the union discovers a misrepresentation in one of the reports, then strict professional measures ranging from a warning to expulsion or even a suspension, will be taken against the expert who issued that false report."

Engineer 'Ahmad Mazin presented a logical solution by saying: "In the construction of new buildings, the engineer who designed the building should write on the license blueprints the specific number of floors the foundation and the pillars were made to support. The housing administration, which issues the licenses will then acquire from the contractor a similar report stating that the construction was executed according to the blueprints. This way, there will be no need for the report required for adding new floors.

"As for old buildings, there is a great difficulty in deciding whether to add new floors since checking the foundation, reviewing the blueprints and matching them with the actual execution would be either impossible or would require great expense on the part of the landlord.

"The engineer of the Ministry of Housing should also bear the responsibility of allowing the addition of new floors to existing buildings and should not rely on consultative engineers or others."

Fees Are Like Fire

Consultative engineers are being criticized for their very high fees.

Some reports could cost from 3,000 to 20,000 Egyptian pounds. These high fees force landlords to seek the assistance of any engineer for low fees ranging between 300 and 500 Egyptian pounds. What is the response to this situation.?

Dr 'Ali Ra'fat, an engineer and a professor at the school of Engineering in Cairo University, said: "Addition of new floors to existing buildings is a complicated operation which is based on scientific bases. There are certain required specifications and safety regulations for any building. This includes research to test the ground to see if it can bear 10 floors. According to Egyptian specifications and safety regulations, more than half of the allowable number of floors are not allowed. There are those who permit the addition of floors without a scientific study which leads to ignoring the legally required safety regulations. Such people are not concerned and they would accept any fee. They also do not scientifically study the soil and the nature of the building. It is only natural that they would offer the kind of consultation which pleases those who pay their fees."

Dr 'Abd al-Fattah Abu-al-'Id, a professor at the School of Engineering in Cairo said: "The consultative offices are approved by the union of engineers and that a report will not be issued unless it meets special conditions which will make it of equal importance with the consultative office. Many engineers give themselves the right that they are consultants and for this reason, their reports are usually unsatisfactory from the technical point of view. But, in most cases these reports satisfy the customer and secure gain for the engineer."

The minister of housing and construction, Mr Hasaballa al-Kufrawi, had a different opinion. He said: "I am against the addition of new floors to old buildings especially when these buildings are in old, highly-populated neighborhoods. "Under other circumstances the addition of new floors is certainly cheaper if compared to a regular housing unit.

"Adding new floors to an existing building requires many conditions most important of which would be water, sewer and electricity. For this reason it is important that all the factors are agreed upon. It is also necessary to acquire the permission of the People's Council as well as that of the Committee of High Buildings at the Ministry of Housing.

"The Ministry of Housing can solve this problem by forming a committee of engineers."

Mr Kamal Ibrahim, the under secretary of the Ministry of Housing said: "It is necessary for the ministry to make a special arrangement with the Union of Engineers concerning the issue of adding new floors to existing buildings. In this manner, those who are interested in adding new floors to their buildings will find it easier to deal with the consultative engineers according to a list of requirements prepared by the Ministry of Housing in collaboration with the union.

"The rights of the landlord and the tenant were dealt with in Article 32 of Bill 49 of 1977. The article said: 'The landlord has the right to increase the number of housing units in the rented building by a horizontal or vertical addition even if the lease does not allow that. This does not wave the right of the tenant in decreasing the rent if the lease stated that. A court ruling could also permit the eviction of tenants and the demolition of non-residential sections which could prevent either the horizontal or the vertical addition on condition that a compensation would be paid for anyone involved."

Engineer Hasan Hassuni said: "The solution is in forming a consultative office, in association with the governorate, which would include the most qualified professors of civil engineering at the universities of that particular governorate and even if fees would be required to cover the expenses of such an office. The opinions given by this office should be accepted by both the landlord and the tenant. Any application for additional housing units to existing buildings will have to obtain the approval of the governorate's consultative office instead of having the landlord and the tenant present two separate reports.

PHOSPHATE EXPLOITATION IN ASWAN--Geologic studies and research of the al-Siba'iyyah area east of Adfu in the governorate of Aswan resulted in the discovery of a hugh reserve of the best quality of raw phosphates, especially in al-Qurayyat area. The reserve is estimated at over 25 million tons of pure raw material. This was announced by Engineer Ibrahim Kamil, president of al-Nasr Phosphate Company in al-Siba'iyyah. He also said that the recently discovered raw material covers an area of 250 square kilometers. He added that work has begun to construct the first [phosphate] plant in the area to exploit the raw phosphates. This plant will be constructed in cooperation with a Swedish firm and will cost 18 million pounds. It will be operational within the next 2 years. Studies show that the raw materials available in the area are enough to operate the plant for 20 years, at an annual production rate of 1.1 million tons. Dr Muhammad Sabri Zaki, governor of Aswan, had visited the phosphate mines in Adfu and met with their 1,500 workers. He requested that an incentive bonus equivalent to 1 week's salary be given to each worker in return for their efforts to increase production and material extraction from this remote area. The governor also decided to offer 500 pounds to the only youth center in the area. [Text] [Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 30 Aug 80 p 9] 9455

'U. S.', IRAQI WAR AIMS EXPOSED

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 27 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] Tehran (Paris)--The morning daily Jomhouri-e Eslami (The Islamic Republic) devoted its recent front page to the recent Irano-Iraqi broder clashes in the west of the country. The article entitled "Wide Repercussions of Irano-U. S. War' said:

"In the name of God, the Beneficient, tho Merciful,

"The war between Iran and the United States in the western borders of the country is becoming more serious. The wrong impression should not seize our mind that this is simply a war, an event or a spark which has suddenly appeared and which we must in some way put out.

The fact is completely different. Aerial, naval and ground invasions of Iraq against Iran are launched according to a subtle political and propaganda plan drawn up against the Islamic Revolution of Iran. It is quite obvious that Iraq, or in other words the United States, by waging war against Iran does not have certain military objectives. Rather, they are precisely after achieving certain psychological objectives.

Having learned the fact that the Army officers leading the Iraqi forces stationed in the border areas are Americans and that even one of the pilots of Iraq killed in the crash of his aircraft in Ilam (west of Iran) was an Israeli, reveals how filthy this satanic plan is! Here we disclose in short some parts of the plots engineered by the United States:

1) The purpose of Iraq from its recent attacks against Iran is to damage the morale of our revolutionary people and to expand the psychological war against the Islamic Revolution of Iran.

2) Their objective is to concentrate our Armed Forces, particularly the Revolutionary Guards in the Border region so that they could carry out their plans inside the country more easily.

3) The counter-revolutionaries, SAVAK agents and mercenaries of the past regime will create artifical kerosene, gasoline and primary materials shortages to intensify the psychological war.

4) Armed mercenary groups who are allied with the blasphemous forces may stage military operations. These operations will possibly be carried out a few days after the Iraqi attacks on Iran are aggravated.

5) Rumor-monging networks will increase their activities most of which will be aimed at the Islamic Republican Party (IRP), the revolutionary institutions and the clergy. These people might even strongly support some certain individuals or groups in order to exonerate themselves.

6) Two different courses will be established in the Army, namely a short-term and a long-term. The short-term will be in the form of slogans against Army commanders accusing them of being traitors and that they should be arrested. This is to destroy the morale of the Army personnel in a bid to hinder their serving their country and Islam.

The long-term course will appear following infiltrations into the Army and utilizing it to bring to power a self-rule martial law government.

7) Other parts of the U. S. plot will be revealed in details in future. However, the following points should be considered:

A) Keep clam.

B) Identify and expose all rumor-spreading networks.

C) Be aware of any plots. The counter-revolution is more active nowadays.

D) The United States is trying to weaken the role of our great leader, Imam Khomeini and move him away from the political scene of the country and the region. The final victory will be achieved only by obeying the Imam.

E) The United States is launching a covert plot against Iran.

F) Do your best to fortify the spirit of Islamic fraternity.

G) If you have got extra medicine in your homes put them at the disposal of the Revolutionary Guards and National Mobilization Organization for the treatment of the injured.

H) Await the order of the Imam.

I) Be sure that the dawn of the victory of the oppressed has appeared.

DOWNED IRAQI PILOT PRAISES IRANIAN PILOTS

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 1 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] TEHRAN - The Iraqi pilot, Ha'an Sabri Hussein who has been captured by the Iranian militants after his MiG was shot over Dezful said Monday that he had been instructed by the Ba'athist regime of Iraq to bomb the Shahrokhi Air Base in Dezful in Khuzistan Province, "in order to prevent the reaction of the Iranian Air Force."

"If I did not undertake the mission, I would have been tried by a military tribunal."

Asked why Saddam Hussein did not send his forces to fight the usurper regime of Qadhafi, the captive pilot said, "All the military personnel of Iraq are ready to sacrifice their lives for the sake of Palestine."

He added, Saddam seems to have made a mistake in this respect."

"I was told that the objective of this war is to take back some Iraqi territory," said the Pilot.

He was also kept away from his family for psychological training before invading Iran.

When he was asked if he thought Saddam is being used by the U.S. he replied, "It is a possibility."

The Iraqi pilot also expressed surprise over the good performance of Iranian pilots and said Iraq has suffered unrepairable damages on its Iranian pilots and said Iraq has suffered unrepairable damages on its oil installations and military equipments which will take years to be replaced.

The interviews with two other Iraqi pilots identified as Abbas Khalil and Hashim, Pass[illegible] were telecast on TV.

CLERGYMAN CALLS FOR BICYCLES TO REPLACE CARS

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 30 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] TEHRAN – A call to use other means of transportation than private cars has been issued by the city's Mobilization Organization for the Deprived, which has been put in charge of traffic plans.

In an interview with the TEHRAN TIMES Hojjatoleslam Majd said that cars were a luxury and not a necessity and recommended the use of bicycles as a means to solve the transportation problems of the country.

The head of the Moutazafin Organization said other countries in the world were using bicycles as a means to solve their essential transportation problems and "we should do the same." He said transportation problems were especially acute in the capital and bicycles would be an ideal solution.

He said that the Mobilization Organization under a traffic mobilization wing had been given the responsibility for solving the present traffic problems. "Formal steps in terms of certain recommendations have been taken to make provision for alternative means of transport," Majd said.

In more detail Majd said that the Ministry of Commerce had been asked to purchase the "maximum number of bicycles possible to meet local needs."

He admitted there was a considerable shortage of public transportation but added that a proposal was under active consideration for buses and minibuses owned by the ministries and government organizations to be utilized for the use of the general public. This, he said, would be done when the vehicles were not being used by these departments.

Traffic mobilization plans will be further explored but he did not exactly specify what the proposed plans would be like.

CENTRAL BANK DISCOURAGES WITHDRAWALS

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 30 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] TEHRAN – Bank Markazi (Central Bank of Iran-CBI) called on the people not to withdraw their deposits from the bank branches.

In an announcement the bank said, "Due to the recent war imposed upon Iran by Iraq, disturbances have been observed in internal flights and the distribution of gasoline which in turn have affected the banking procedures in the country.

Limitations on the distribution of gasoline has made the distribution of money difficult in the city. Some branches of bank have been faced with a shortage of cash-on-hand even for regular use. This matter has made a number of clients anxious, and they have rushed to the banks to withdraw their money, in excess of what they really need.

Unfortunately such problems have forced a number of bank branches to deliver less money than requested by clients.

The CBI apologized for the difficulties confronting clients and emphasized that although "these shortcomings are temporary, their resolution needs the comprehensive cooperation of the people."

"People should not withdraw their deposits unless they really are needed and should recommend others also to refrain from this.

They should also advise others to deposit their savings in banks here to help the economy of the country, to strengthen the Islamic Republic in Iran and to guarantee the security of their savings in the best possible way, the announcement added.

It also recommended that people should not change their 200 rial bank-notes at present since the deadline has been extended with the end of the current Iranian month, October 22.

NEWSPAPER EXPOSES IRAQI SECURITY APPARATUS

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 30 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] TEHRAN (PARS) - The morning daily Sobhe Azadegan in an interview recently gave an outline of the resistance movement against the tyrannical rule of Saddam Hussein in Iraq and his numerous security organizations used to combat the freedom fighters in Iraq. The article said:

Saddam' Takriti has set up six different intelligence and security organizations like the Iranian SAVAK in order to suppress all the freedom lovers and revolutionaries. These organizations which are run like the disbanded Iranian security police, SAVAK, have already killed many Iraqi militant youth. They are as follows:

1. Al Amen which is suppressing the revolutionaries, under the pretext of preserving the country.

2. Al Mokhabarat (similar to SAVAK's Second Bureau) which operates for the so-called revolutionary Parliament of Iraq, escorting the servile Iraqi deputies to and from the Parliament.

3. Al Istekhbar which operates inside the Iraqi Army institutions to control any anti-Ba'athist movement. This organization has already killed or imprisoned many revolutionary officers and men. It has the authority to arrest or execute anybody any time.

4. A party-organ called "Tanzimi" which has branch offices in all the cities and villages of the country, its main function is to identify all ordinary citizens who may be against the regime.

5. The so-called "national army" consisting of a number of government agents, their job is to supervise and train some individuals for other security organizations.

6. Al Manzumat-al-Shomali, the security complex of north Iraq to suppress and control the Iraqi Kurds. Presently, a great number of the Kurdish clergy and militants who have discovered the true nature of the ba'ath, and under torture.

The above-mentioned groups have branches throughout Iraq and have been instructed by foreign experts. Under the supervision of Europeans, they are torturing revolutionaries by electric current, chemical agents and brainwashing.

The Ba'athist regime is so afraid of the revelation of its savage acts that burned with acid some 300 of its Army officers whom it had used to massacre the Kurds in war time.

Of course, the so-called revolutionary parliament of Iraq announced that the officers had disappeared. Due to the blows that the Ba'athist regime had received from the Kurds, it set up certain regulations for the Kurdish people. For instance, it announced that if an Arab took a Kurdish girl by force or in some way, he would be given 500 dinars as a reward. This measure by the Ba'athist government was taken to destroy the generation of the Kurdish nation.

In Iraq's Kurdistan also the people were under several pressures. For example, 5,800 Kurdish villages were demolished by the Ba'athists and their inhabitants became homeless. After that many Kurdish militants took refuge in mountain areas and started their fight against the Ba'athist regime in a different way.

Nonetheless, some of them were arrested again and the Kurdish women were raped in the prisons of the bloodthirsty regime of Iraq.

The documents of these crimes are all available but international organizations do not pay the least attention to these documents.

Statistics show that every day in Iraq 4 to 5 Kurds are martyred. The origin of the hostility that the Ba'athist regime has with the Kurds is that the latter have always tried to fight against British imperialism and the Ba'athists. The Kurdish people of Iran also should understand that the nature of the mercenaries and must thwart their plots.

PROPOSED AGENDA FOR LABOR PARTY--MAPAM NEGOTIATIONS

[Article by Naftali Ben-Moshe: "Negotiating Points With The Labor Party"]

[Text] The negotiations with the Labor Party must be focused on the most essential points in which there is a gap in the viewpoints between the two parties and must not attempt to cover a broad area so that the essence not be lost.

The purpose of the negotiations is not exactly the formulation of the joint program for the election. The election platform will naturally have to use a simpler and less direct and detailed language so that we can go with it to the public and win a decisive majority. This decisive majority is the best platform in that it will give MAPAM the power to tip the scale in the next government and not the NRP, for example.

We are speaking, then, of a penetrating and friendly discussion of the controversial issues which are the most critical issues between the two parties with the objective of influencing, advancing, and creating points of contact which will permit us to live and stand together without having to violate our conscience and our basic viewpoint. This was the case in the previous election when MAPAM succeeded, among other things, in obtaining the Labor Party's agreement on the political formulation "territorial compromise," a formulation which in the course of time became the political banner of the Alignment.

Such was not the case in 1973, on the eve of the Yom Kippur War, when MAPAM was dragged (albeit moaning and groaning) after the dictate of the famous fence-sitter Moshe Dayan and surrendered (together with the entire Labor Party with its doves and moderates) to a policy which was completely contrary to its world viewpoint. Whoever wants to locate the place of the earthquake which led to the collapse of 1977 can look for it here on this issue.

Maximum Effort For Agreement

The objective of the negotiations must be a maximum effort in order to reach an agreement--and not the opposite. In accordance with this, the minimum condition must be set, and for this purpose help must come from allies in the Labor Party in every area--and there are such people--while allies in one area are not obligated to identify with allies in another area.

There is clearly a red line, and a period of time must be left between the summation of the negotiations and the date of the election which would give the MAPAM an option of an independent appearance. Even if this option, in my opinion, is only theoretical and for an emergency situation only, it must be in the atmosphere of the negotiations. Otherwise, the substance of the negotiations will be limited to the infiniterimal.

The authorized institutions of the party must decide in the summation of the negotiations the results of the negotiations and the progress achieved. To this accounting must be added the importance of the freedoms which we will obtain regarding those issues on which no agreement was reached. In contrast to the impression created at the convention, the purpose is to reach an agreement and not attain freedoms.

Those in MAPAM who grasp at every issue and every reason to push MAPAM outside toward SHELI are unaware of the primary aims of this period and MAPAM's mission. These are emotional reactions which should not cause excitement. It would be a tragedy of the movement to split apart just now on the objective and at the most crucial time facing the Labor Movement. At times there is no escape from tragedy. But to aspire to it?

In my opinion, the political subjects on which we should concentrate are:

(1) The Palestinian problem. The Labor Party proposes as a political alternative the Jordanian option. Without going into the seriousness of this option at this time, it is clear that without a readiness for far-reaching territorial concessions and without integrating an acceptable solution to the Palestinian problem in this framework, the orientation on Jordan is neither an option nor an alternative but a castle in the air, the contribution of which to the advancement of peace will be equivalent to that of the autonomy. There will be no one to talk to and nothing to talk about.

MAPAM talks about a Jordanian-Palestinian state which would include most of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, however it ultimately leaves the democratic decision on sovereignty of the territories in the hands of the Jordanians and the Palestinians. The Jordanians do not need Israeli recognition of their right of self-determination. The new feature then is that which involves the Palestinians and the territories administered by Israel.

The Shem Tov-Yariv version, concerning which even Dr Burg has already made a slip of the tongue, can open an option to the Palestinians--a version (incomplete) which together with the "territorial compromise" (also incomplete) is likely to provide a compromise between the Labor Party and us on the Palestinian issue.

2) We are divided on the subject of the settlements on the other side of the green line. The Labor Party advocates settlements in a defined area (unofficially) such as the Allon Plan and in the Golan Heights. MAPAM is against settlements on the other side of the green line including the Golan Heights despite the permit which Hakibbutz Ha'artzi [National Kibbutz, the kibbutz movement of the MAPAM] has given itself there. How does the Golan Heights differ from the Jordan Valley? What is the sense of interfering in a place the future sovereignty of which is unclear? Does Hakibbutz Ha'artzi have such an abundance of pioneering reserves that it is lacking challenges within the green line?

Peace talks accompanied by these settlements are two contradictory things which do not go together. Whoever dreams about settlements must not talk about peace. Israel, which argues for the principle of negotiations without preconditions, cannot at the same time create facts in a territory without convicting itself of a double standard and an injustice. The period of the British Mandate has ended. We are a sovereign state, and we must decide what determines what: the settlements, the boundaries or the boundaries, the settlements.

In planning its actions and policies, the Alignment government will have to take into serious consideration the heartbreak and the enormous waste of resources involved in the dismantling of settlements.

The compromise which we must strive for in this critical and controversial subject is the suspension of all additional settlements in the sector which is the subject of the peace negotiations and during the period of the negotiations.

3) The readiness for territorial concession has been the concession version for which MAPAM has struggled as the version of the Alignment, and it is not the MAPAM version. MAPAM advocates "border changes necessary for the security of Israel," and there is a difference between the two versions.

I do not believe that the Labor Party can be coerced into accepting MAPAM's version which expresses the need for far-reaching territorial concessions. However, it is possible to prevent a commitment to the Allon Plan and other "immutable" versions acceptable to the leaders of the Labor Party in everything related to Israel's future borders. If we use "territorial concession," it should remain open and flexible without closing options and without blocking territorial concessions as the situation requires.

4) The time has come for the Alignment to make a clear statement regarding the autonomy plan and not be satisfied with ridicule or criticism on the side. No good will come from the adventurous autonomy plan, and I will not add much to all that I have written and spoke about on this subject. The Alignment's attitude on the subject of autonomy is fatalistic. Let's let matters run their course or become complicated, and we will see how they develop or fail--all of this concerning the key issue of the Arab-Jewish conflict on which peace will rise or fall even with Egypt.

FORMER MINISTER OF JUSTICE FAVORS CHANGE IN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 8 Aug 80 p 20

[Interview with Former Minister of Justice MK Shmuel Tamir by Dov Goldstein]

[Text] Where is Shmuel Tamir going? After his resignation from the cabinet, what are the "plots" being woven in this fertile mind? What kinds of political tricks will he now be engaging in?

Even his political rivals praise his wisdom. However, even one who regards the old claims with restraint, that he is divisive, a schemer, and a conniver, will find it difficult to believe that Shmuel Tamir left the cabinet only because his pangs of conscience would not allow him to be one of three ministers representing a movement with three members of Knesset. Even less understandable is the fact that his excellent abilities and enormous pretensions will find a subsistence area and prospects for realization in the constricted, shaky, and hopeless framework of the Democratic Movement.

The departed minister has two good reasons to shroud his future intentions in secrecy--one being tactics and the other being personal image. As long as he has not spelled out his political path, he holds all the cards and several roads are open to him. In the matter of image, since his name has been previously connected with several movements and his antagonists are waiting for an opportunity to ridicule his shifting from one political structure to another, it is now convenient for him to stick to the statement that he will continue to work within the Democratic Movement.

"The Lost Son" Will Return To The Mother Party

I assume that when the time comes he will not be particular about the name of the movement or the party in whose name he will seek the public trust provided that it is a broad-based entity, one with future prospects, and not a splinter party. Another assumption is that under certain conditions, hinted at by Tamir in this interview, it is possible that "the lost son" will return to his mother party, Herut, to compete for the most senior positions.

However, until the trends become clear, Tamir derived considerable satisfaction this week. Not only was he in the center of the news--a phenomenon which no politician detests--but many greeted him, praised him, and complimented him to his face. He served in Menahem Begin's cabinet for almost 3 years. If he was bothered by the doubt that perhaps the prime minister was holding a grudge for past struggles, he felt this week that the "historical tear" has been mended. For 3 years Tamir demonstrated loyalty and statesmanship in the positive sense. He did not publicly utter even one word of criticism of the government. He was scrupulous in showing respect for the prime minister and the ministers. He developed a broad network of amicable relations with all the elements in the judicial system and served as the minister of justice with outstanding success.

[Question] Last week you asked angrily: "Is someone prohibited from resigning from the cabinet?" It is permitted, of course, however, since no one appoints himself as a minister and instead serves as his movement's or party's representative after being selected in its institutions, why is it less reasonable to insist that even if he wants to resign he should notify the institutions of his movement beforehand and give it reasonable opportunity to persuade him to change his mind?

[Answer] Even the selection of a candidate to serve as minister is not made only by a decision of the institutions. It is preceded by the man's personal decision to be the nominee of his movement and to want to be selected for the position. At times there is also his readiness to fight for his selection. Public service is based on free will. When it became absolutely clear to me that my decision to resign was final, any previous discussion in the movement's institutions would have been damaging. When the number of members of the Democratic faction was reduced to four, I said to Yigael Yadin: "Yigael, I am under no circumstances prepared to reconcile myself to this reality, that we will have three ministers in the cabinet. Although the prime minister and even the other factions are not exerting pressure on us to reduce the number of ministers, I feel strongly that with all the compromises that a political figure is forced to make in political life, this is one which I cannot accept."

"I Will Be Against That," I Said To Yadin

Yadin answered me that the labor and social betterment portfolio was just as important to him as that of justice and that if there would be a reduction in the number of our ministers, he, Yadin, would himself resign from the cabinet. I answered "It is not reasonable for you to resign. You must remain in the cabinet." I added that it was clear to all of us that if the question was which minister should resign and it came to a discussion and competition within the institutions of the movement, the overwhelming majority of the members would vote that the two of us, Yadin and I, should remain in the cabinet whereas Minister Katz would be forced to resign. I said: "I will be against that!"

I could not accept that we would have three ministers in the cabinet. Moreover, what is involved is representation in the cabinet, several positions of which I have had reservations about. However, to cause the forced removal of a member of the cabinet in accordance with a proposal within the institutions of the movement--that I did not want. In order to prevent undesirable processes in the movement and since what is ultimately involved is a clearly personal step, I decided to carry out my decision without leaving a long period of time for anyone to dissuade me from my intention or try to delay its realization.

[Question] Did the prime minister urge you not to resign?

[Answer] The prime minister asked me three times not to resign or at least to defer my resignation. The first time was when I informed him of my intention Thursday night of last week in a telephone conversation. The second time was when we met before the cabinet meeting this Sunday in his office. The last time was also at a cabinet meeting. The three conversations were friendly, marked by unusual expressions of respect and mutual understanding. Unfortunately, I was not ready to change my mind and my conclusion which I had reached after extensive and thorough soul searching.

[Question] Do you believe that you acted properly when you announced your resignation on a television broadcast before you met with the prime minister? He may have had cogent reasons for you not to resign and you had created a fait accompli which you could not undo.

[Answer] I have already said that I was sorry about the short time available to me and I expressed my regret also to the prime minister. I did not submit my resignation before meeting with the prime minister. I submitted it without harshness, protest, or demands. I was happy to hear from the other party that the entire process of my resignation was respectful, regular, and smooth.

[Question] After almost 3 years of serving in Menahem Begin's cabinet, what has changed in your opinion and estimate of him? For example, did he surprise you with his moderation, tendency to compromise, perhaps also his forgivingness?

[Answer] I have known the prime minister since he came to Israel. We first met in the house of Abba Ahime'ir, of blessed memory. Begin was still wearing the Polish Army uniform. We have come a long way since then, almost 40 years, with each other and against each other. At cabinet meetings, my neighbor to the left of me, Dr Burg, would occasionally ask me: "You know Begin better than all of us. What is his intention at this moment?"

So, essentially I was not surprised. I knew that Menahem Begin was a very strong man with a special leadership quality and rare charisma. His ability to navigate through the internal political processes was somewhat surprising to some people who have not worked with him and did not know him from close up. I was not surprised. The only area in which I encountered something new and surprising was the ability of a statesman, who was no longer a young man, at this stage of his life to make his foreign policy positions flexible even when it did not agree with the platform but was required by the changing reality and the opportunism of the time--I am referring to the peace process which the prime minister initiated and in which he played the key role. I saw something very positive in this and if you will permit me, also a certain satisfaction. At the time, when I was still in the Likud, I maintained ever since the Yom Kippur War that there was no alternative to flexibility. I encountered a profound lack of understanding on the part of various members and we finally parted company. The prime minister's readiness for political flexibility greatly facilitated our joint work in the cabinet.

[Question] Strange...a government headed by a man of such excellent qualities, why has it reached such a low state that everyone is predicting a decisive defeat?

[Answer] I have pointed out the prime minister's qualities which no fair person could deny. This does not mean that I am very unaware of the deficiencies of the government of which I was a member and which I continue to support. I have criticized the deficiencies even in public when my position required it, such as my view regarding the leaks from the cabinet meetings which are a severe blow to the functioning of the State.

However, you are certainly aware that in the difficult atmosphere in which the Israeli public finds itself, especially since the Yom Kippur War, I am among those who prefer to criticize their collaborators directly in personal conversations with those involved. This is how I conducted myself for the 3 years when I was a member of the cabinet. In our friendly conversation in his office this Sunday, I heard the prime minister say the same things that I have recently told others from time to time. Their essence: we are a small people (numerically), surrounded by great dangers, subject to threats, from various sides, and with so few friends. This obligates us not only to overcome past deep-seated feelings, even if they are hard, but also to seek the common denominator and that which unites us.

I have not hesitated in the past and I will not hesitate in the future to hold discussions and even a penetrating and thorough debate on the main issues: foreign affairs, structure of the administration, and the functioning of the government. However, we must conduct this debate as free as possible from personal tensions.

[Question] In a response to my question you once said that you have the requisite qualifications to fill senior positions in the political life of Israel. Many will support this assumption, however do you sincerely believe that the broken reed called the Democratic Movement is the political structure which will lead you to key positions in the State?

[Answer] For better or for worse, I have never sought the easy...

[Answer] I will be completely frank with you. I do not know if in the continuation of my political career I will have the opportunity to give myself maximum public expression. However, with full awareness and with open eyes, I prefer even today to take far-reaching risks than to follow a path with which I disagree. Despite the sophistication which some people attribute to my resignation, I have no doubt that it entails political risks. Nevertheless, I took this action.

As to the concrete course I will follow, I will add one sentence: What appears at times to be a short way is likely to turn out to be a long one just as what appears to be a long way, at times proves to be exactly the correct and purposeful one.

[Question] Have you planned additional actions?

[Answer] I have thought about the future, however this was not the determining factor in the decision to resign.

[Question] Simply stated, in the next election will you be a candidate for the Knesset from the Democratic Movement?

[Answer] I will do everything in order to continue to go with my friends, the Democratic Movement people, in the next elections, however this does not mean that I will go with them alone. I have always believed in the formation of major political alignments to the extent possible, provided that they have an agreed upon platform. I am also not now against efforts to form such a power.

[Question] What did you answer Yigael Yadin when he asked you if he should leave the cabinet or remain there?

[Answer] I told him: "Yigael, you must remain in the cabinet!"

In Theory, There is No Need For A Centrist Entity

[Question] Why? You can leave and he must remain?

[Answer] Because we continue to be partners in the coalition and it is only right that we have a voice in the government. Even the harshest critics of Yadin acknowledge that, for example, in the month when he served as a substitute prime minister and minister of defense, he conducted the affairs with excellence, responsibility, considerable ability, and exemplary friendliness to all the ministers. We must be represented in the government, of course in a more or less appropriate ratio to our strength in the Knesset.

[Answer] Good, I get your point...

[Answer] Yadin must not resign...

[Question] You describe the possibility of the Alignment's return to power as a danger to Israel. You have already publicly expressed your opinion about Herut ("May God have mercy on the State of Israel if Herut comes to power"). What then is the solution? Should there be another attempt to establish a party of the center in spite of the complete failure of the DMC?

[Answer] The quote which you attribute to me regarding Herut is not precise. I will not go into details. I was an active partner in the establishment of GAHAL [acronym for the Herut-Liberal Bloc] in which Herut was the senior partner. We intended to establish a liberal centrist bloc. This was the objective also in the establishment of the Likud. It became clear in time that there was a need for establishing an entity between the Alignment and the Likud. If the statistics were different, it is possible that there would have been no need to establish the DMS. Theoretically, these two entities, the Alignment and the Likud, in addition to a religious bloc, are sufficient for the political arena. If the Alignment and the Likud would be sufficiently flexible, multi-faceted to the extent necessary, broad, and open, there would be no need for a centrist political entity besides them. If they will not be so, the need to establish a political force to fill the vacuum in the center of the political picture will be recreated. The Democratic Movement will consider its course in accordance with these circumstances.

[Question] If the need arises for another political force, will you be among its founders and leaders?

[Answer] It is too early to answer that question. Everything depends upon the circumstances. However, if you are talking about a new political alignment, I hope and I will work to the best of my ability that we will change our system of government from the present one to a presidential system. The history of 30 years of governments in Israel, including the lessons derived from a study of the present government, shows that a change in the electoral system is not enough. On the basis of my experience in the opposition and in the government, I have become convinced beyond any doubt that it is necessary to strengthen the executive arm and provide it with a more solid decision-making power while maintaining the balances by a strong Knesset.

The current situation is fraught with danger and it must not continue. We have a coalition of parties in the government and coalitions within the parties which paralyze the alignments, hinder action, and encumber the decision-making process. Another result is that the most qualified, the most suitable, and the best cannot always attain executive positions and express their abilities in the most important positions. The presidential system, be it the American or the French type, has proven itself to be much more effective. France, during the Fourth Republic before World War II, was in a process of fragmentation and disintegration. Since the days of de Gaulle, France has recovered and has achieved economic prosperity and political power under the presidential system.

[Question] Do you believe that you will find support for your far-reaching proposal in the Israeli parties? Isn't one of the outstanding characteristics of the presidential system the reduction of the power of the parties and the status of their various types of activists?

[Answer] It is very doubtful if it will be possible to bring about the change in the next election. However, I have been greatly encouraged from conversations with key people in various parties who have shown much sympathy and at times even enthusiasm for the idea.

The presidential system is not a technical reform, but rather a political necessity for the people who are plagued with numerous troubles. The more concerned we are about democracy the more we are obliged to prevent its degeneration, lest, God forbid, there be stirred among us desires for an autocratic system as a result of the failure and disappointments of the cabinet system.

The Danger: Rise of Extremist-Fringe Elements

I will not relax my efforts in this matter and I will work incessantly to persuade the parties to choose the presidential system.

[Question] Will perhaps work for the change in the system within the framework of the Likud to which you will now return?

[Answer] I will work for the idea regardless of the party reality. This is a subject which goes beyond party affiliation. There is no alternative to this profound reform. The coalition system of government, which also has advantages, entails too many blind alley situations. We must prevent negative upheavals which are likely to be lurking in the coming years along the difficult road expected for the State.

[Question] What kind of negative upheaval, for example, are you afraid of?

[Answer] A democratic society which shows signs of the disintegration of alignments, which is suffering from economic inflation, and which finds it difficult to reach decisions and solutions is likely to be dragged into the situations in which extremist fringe elements can be pushed to the center of events and bring dangers upon us which I prefer not to describe. There is no such immediate danger at the moment. The rule of law is an established principle among us, however we must not ignore what has happened to other peoples and it is better to take preventive action. However, even without these serious dangers, we must cure the severe ailments of Israeli society completely and at a much faster rate. We can only do this under a democratic presidential system of government.

PROSPECTING FOR MINERAL RESOURCES YIELDING SOME PROMISING RESULTS

Amman AL-DUSTER in Arabic 26 Jul 80 p 7

[Article: "Engineer Ahmad Tuqan Speaks About the Accomplishments of the Authority of Natural Resources During a Period of 6 Months: Studies on Oil, Brass, Oil Shale Rock, Radioactive Substances and Minerals"]

[Text] The planning committee at the Authority of Natural Resources held a meeting, at the authority's headquarters headed by engineer Ahmad Dukhqan, deputy chairman of the authority, for the purpose of evaluating the authority's accomplishments, during the past 6 months, according to its program and within the framework of the 5-year plan.

Engineer Dukhqan said: "The authority has realized several accomplishments within the framework of the work of different departments and sections and mainly in that which is realted to studies, research prospecting work, irrigation projects, artesian wells, building dams, fixing springs and protecting them from polution, prospecting for additional natural resources, executing the projects of geophysical aerial surveying, magnetic surveying, siesmic surveying, geochemical surveying, geoelectrical surveying and additional studies by the geological laboratory and other studies which we will discuss briefly.

The Department of Minerals and Geological Research

Talking about the accomplishments of the Department of Minerals and Geological Research, engineer Dukhqan said: "The department was able to accomplish several projects most important of which were:

--"The project of aerial geophysical surveying which includes the electromagnetic and the dry gravitational magnetic surveying.

--"The Authority of Natural Resources signed an agreement with the Geotrax Company for Aerial Geophysical Surveying. According to this agreement, 19,000 linear kilometers of the western heights area of the kingdom, which is located between Suwayma in the north and the Jordanian--Saudi borders in the south, were surveyed by means of two airplanes."

Radiomagnetic Surveying

--"According to an agreement signed between the authority and the Phoenix Company, the kingdom was radiomagnetically surveyed.

--"The two companies, Geotrax and Phoenix, along with the U.S. Government engineers and experts will collect, prepare and analyze all the information related to the survey and will also prepare the necessary maps. The final reports will be submitted to the authority next October."

Gravitational and Magnetic Surveying In Al-Khalidiqa and Al-Mafraq

"The field work of gravitational and magnetic surveying of the areas of al-Khalidiqa and al-Mafraq has been concluded. This means that the northern part of the kingdom has been gravitationally and magnetically surveyed. All the major highways in the kingdom have been surveyed as well."

Thermal En[illegible]

"This project included geoelectric and thermal energy studies and the study of land upon which the University of Jordan's School of Engineering building will be constructed. The authority also conducted a study to fix the land resistance for the project of constructing the fertiliser plant in al-'Aqaba."

The School of Engineering Building

"A study was conducted to define the locations for the foundations of the new building which will house the School of Engineering and the University of Jordan. A study was also conducted on subterranean water in the areas of al-Manzil and al-Sultani dam.

The Project of Seismic Studies

"A special team conducted a study on the thickness of the oil shale rock in the area of al-Lujun.

Industrial Rocks

"Several wells were drilled at the request of the company requesting the National Council for Planning. This project was conducted for the purpose of locating the portland cement ore and the dry clay needed for the cement factory which is to be constructed.

The Project of Brass

"Work has been concluded in the area of Khurbat al-Jariyat and the neighboring areas and has now moved to other areas. The project aims at increasing the copper ore reserves. Several samples were collected and sent to the laboratory for chemical analysis.

Oil Shale Rock

"The authority continued collecting samples of the entire layer of the oil shale rock which is 35 meters thick in the areas of the project. The samples are forwarded to the companies which are going to study the economic value of these rocks.

Radioactive Substances and Energy

"The radioactive substances of all 104 springs in al-Zarat and Ma'in were measured and calculations were tabulated for the uranium, potasium and thorium found in these springs. According to these measurements the areas which registered high readings were defined.

"Water samples from the springs where waterfalls have been built were collected for the purpose of chemical analysis to discover the barium, rubidium and scandium elements.

"The work was completed on preparing geological maps with a scale of 10,000 for al-Zarat and Ma'in (al-Hammamat). The maps cover an area 20 square kilometers. Another geological contour map with a scale of 50,000 was also prepared.

"The geological report for the studied area was also completed."

Prospecting for Dolomite

"Several samples from different areas were analyzed. The area of Ma'in was chosen to conduct a detailed study which will also include Ra's al-Naqab, Wadi al-Sulayji and al-Sukhna."

Prospecting for Limestone

"Several samples are being collected from different areas for the purpose of prospecting for the pure limestone and for finding enough quantities of this ore to be used in local industries such as potasium. The geological department is still waiting for the results of the chemical analysis so that the proper locations will be defined.

"A study is being conducted for the purpose of prospecting analyzing and defining the layer of dry clay in Batn al-Ghul.

"The geochemical project in the area of Abu-Khushaiba showed, as a result of a study, that the fire stone in Wadi 'Araba contain a high concentration of mineral ore, mainly copper, in the Rayolite rocks. The study concentrated on these rocks in a very detailed fashion in order to explain this phenomena. Samples were taken to the mineral laboratory for analysis."

A Study of Geological Engineering

"The geological engineering laboratory at the Authority of Natural Resources conducted studies and field and laboratory analysis for the collapsing area of al-Jufa and al-Luwaybid mountain and made the necessary recommendations.

"The laboratory will also analyze the soil in different areas and laboratory and field studies were made in al-Amana area in Saqfal-Sayl. Studies were also made al-Tahtur mountain in Amman. Laboratory tests were made for the project of connecting amman to the water of the eastern al-Ghawr canal. Sand samples from the Jordan Valley Authority were analysed also."

Supervising Quarries

"The department of supervision and licensing continued to perform its duty by inspecting quarries and collecting samples for the purpose of finding out the quality of the rock. This work which was performed in cooperation with the Royal Scientific Society also included the supervision of sand, marble and building rock quarries in Jordan."

Irrigation, Lakes and Dams

"In Irbid, al-Karak and al-Balqa' several projects of irrigation were executed. In al-Mafraq, Ma'daba and the outskirts of the capital studies were made on the desert lakes. Several desert dams and springs were repaired and protected from pollution in Irbid, al-Balqa', the capital, al-Karak and Ma'an."

The Department Drilling

"Several wells were dug by the Department of Drilling, at the Authority of Natural Resources, in Khunayzira, al-Munishir, Wadi Musa, Fidan No 2 and Fidan No 4, Ri'r Wadi Musa No 6 and Wadi 'Areba. A well was dug in al-Wala for the company of drinking water and another was dug in al-Baq'a to supervise the water level. A well was dug in Katm and another in 'Asal as an experiment to discover if there is water in the north. Another well was dug in Ghawr al-Safi (No 3) for the purpose of finding water for the Authority of Wadi al-'Urdun. Other wells were also dug in al-Mugarin, 'Arida Bani 'Ibad and Wadi al-'Abyad.

"Four old wells were repaired along with five industrial wells and three pumping stations in al-Karama, al-Tawani and al-Jafr.

"Several wells are currently being dug in al-Ajfur, al-Azraq, Sahm al-Kafarat, Kafar Yuba, al-Mawqir, Hasban, al-Baq'a, 'Anba, Irbid, Kafarnajat and Kafahuda for the purpose of studies and prospecting for subterranean water.

Surveying Wells

"Maps, tables and lists of available wells for the areas included in the surveying project have been prepared.

"Ninety-three wells have been surveyed so far in the areas of the northern part of al-Badiya, al-Ajfur, al-Risha, al-Qastal, al-Jiza, al-Zarqa', al-Bug'a and al-'Azraq.

Water Studies

"The Department of Water Studies conducted, through the Division of Subterranean Water, a study which included a schedule of drilling for 1980. The schedule includes prospecting for subterranean water in the sandy layers in the basin of al-Zarqa', searching for deep subterranean water in the basin of al-Azraq, searching and studying subterranean water in the basin of al-Hamad, studying the relationship among the water of al-Azraq, al-Dalil and northern desert and supervising the drilling of water wells in al-Azraq for the purpose of bringing it to Amman.

"Studies and consultations were conducted for the following ministries and institutions:

--"To locate the wells and to study the area of al-Ghuwayra for the purpose of using subterranean water for irrigation. This work was performed for the Ministry of Agriculture.

--"To supply the Division of Drinking Water with the required information on water resources in the northern desert, Qa'Ram, al-Humayma, al-Muthallath al-Sahrawi and Sumaya.

--"To study the availability of subterranean water in al-'Abdi for the armed forces.

--"To study the availability of subterranean water in al-Batrawi for the Department of Land Surveyance.

--"To conduct a study on the availability of water in al-Rusayfa for the Phosphate Mine Company.

--"To define the wells for the application of pumping water by solar power and wind for the Royal Scientific Society.

"The division of Subterranean Water supervised the following projects:

--"An experiment was made on a well in al-Baq'a in order to evaluate the hydrolic qualities of the sand layer lying under the water.

--"An experiment was made on the Ketm well for a period of 18 days for the purpose of evaluating the fixed amount of water produced.

--"Experiments were made on wells in al-Qastel for the Division of Drinking Water.

--"An experiment was made on the Well of Wadi al-Dalil, No 6, in order to diagnose the problems.

--"The work of drilling the well of the southern municipality of al-Zaraqa' and the well of the Authority of Water and Sewer in the area of Wadi al-Sibaq was supervised.

--"Reports were also prepared about the northern desert area and al-Dalil and about the water situation for the area of the Jordanian University.

--"Preparations are being made in order to benefit from the use of the comparative electric computer in the operations of the Division of Subterranean Water.

80 Percent of the Kingdom's Share

"The importance of the projects of the Division of Surface Water is due to the fact that this division deals with 880 million cubic meters annually of surface water which amounts to 80 percent of the kingdom's share of water. The division keeps track of rainfall, of draining the water of the valley and its floods and of the continually flowing springs. The division also measures the quantity and level of evaporation in the kingdom by means of 180 rainfall stations out of which 68 stations are mechanically operated, 16 are equipped to measure the weather factors for the purpose of defining the evaporating amounts of water and for the purpose of measuring 1,000 annual or seasonal springs in the kingdom.

"A register has been installed to measure the water levels in Judaida near the Red Sea area in al-'Aqaba. The division also administered and maintained all existing stations, published the technical rain report in Jordan, controlled water stations and analyzed field work."

Licensing Drilling for Water

"The Division of Licensing Drilling will supervise all drilling operations of the private sector by means of issuing well drilling licenses, collecting drilling samples of soil and water for analysis, monitoring water basins and applying the rules of monitoring subterranean water.

"The division responded to the requests of the private sector by issuing drilling licenses based on report preparations and defining the location. The division supervised the pumping operations of private wells where 27 pumping experiments were conducted issued reports on the drilling machines, prepared the bases upon which it relies in issuing drilling licenses to control water balance and the amounts of water pumped from each basin, obligating well owners to install water meters and defining the amount of land irrigated with subterranean water.

"The division prepared reports on all the licensed wells in the kingdom, their locations, productivity and the areas of land licensed for the drilled wells. The division prepared contour maps for the surface of water in some areas in the light of the most recent information on drilling especially in the areas that have not been completely studied. Other maps of water analysis were also prepared."

The Accomplishments of the Department of Mechanics and Transportation

"The department is supervizing the execution of constructing shops for the maintenance and repair of drilling machines, pumps, machinery and cars. An agreement was signed with a British consulting company for the purpose of constructing and equiping the workshops with the tools and the necessary machinery.

Seventeen donums of land have been purchased for the project a road has been built, a fence has been erected around the property and water has been brought to it. The electric company will install a transformer in order to bring electricity to the project. The authority will train technicians in the needed areas in order to improve their performance.

"The authority will also hire qualified technicians from the technical institutes and it will train them inside and outside the country."

ENI REPORTED IMPROVING RELATIONSHIP WITH KOC

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 19 Aug 80 p 11

[Report by Samir al-Ahmad: "ENI's Case Against Saudi Petromin Submitted to Higher Italian Judiciary"]

[Text] The special parliamentary committee for investigating "commissions" paid by the Italian company ENI, to close the well-known petroleum deal with Petromin of Saudi Arabia, announced that this matter was no longer under its jurisdiction and that it turned the whole subject to the higher Italian courts.

Relations With Kuwait

The exact amounts and recipients of those commissions were exposed. This case had turned into a great political scandal in Italy and led to the cancellation of the contract between the Italian petroleum company ENI and the Saudi company Petromin. It also led to the removal from office of ENI's existing management and the appointment of Mr Grande as the new president of the organization, in addition to a number of specialists who assist him in running and managing the country's most important economic organization. Since the new administration took over, its goal has been to improve relations, at all levels, with Arab oil-producing countries, mainly Kuwait and Iraq. However, petroleum relations between Italy and Kuwait have, in the past years, encountered some difficulties and obstacles which resulted in a noticeably lower rate of interaction between the two sides. This caused some concern among Italian petroleum policy makers, especially in the government-owned ENI. The reasons for these obstacles go back primarily to the fact that ENI chose to deal with other countries before going to Kuwait, and also to the [large] volume of connections between KOC and private Italian oil companies.

Monti's Empire

Relations totally deteriorated after the tanker "Salim's" incident and after its tonnage was purchased by an Italian company in Genoa. However, the best known Italian private company that dealt with KOC was "Petroliera Italiana," known as "Monti's Oil Company" after its owner Ezilio Monti, who also owns several financial institutions oil refineries and distribution stations known as MAC [expansion unknown].

About 1 year ago, "Monti's Empire" began to gradually collapse, forcing him to sell most of his distribution stations due to his huge debts and because of his direct clash with the United Workers' syndicates which wanted to administer the Italian oil sector through ENI in order to save this vital sector from private companies.

Attempts To Improve Conditions

A long time ago, the fact that Mr Monti owed KOC 25 million dollars became known. The story of these debts began when the customs authorities at the Milatzo refinery confiscated 185,000 tons of oil fuel which were imported from Kuwait by Monti, because he was unable to pay the import tax due on the fuel. This led to Monti's evasion from paying KOC for the imported fuel. Due to the continuing monetary inflation, the sum has increased to $30 million.

A few days ago, ENI, under its new management, intervened to solve the problem by purchasing more than one refinery owned by Mr Monti and also undertook to pay debts owed to KOC by Monti, provided Monti began immediately paying back this sum and its interest to ENI through his several companies, as agreed between the two sides.

This step by ENI is not aimed at saving Monti; it is an attempt at improving relations with KOC and having better relations with Kuwait in general. This would be achieved through a long-term project aimed at reexamining the nature and volume of ENI's work in all Arab oil-producing nations.

Kuwaiti Observations

ENI's president, Mr Grande, recently visited Kuwait and personally examined the nature of relations between the two countries in this field. He noticed discontent among official circles in Kuwait with the method of dealings of Italian companies in the oilfield. Grande relayed the Kuwaiti comments to ENI's board of directors in the hope of setting bases for proper and long-term cooperation between the two sides. It is worth noting that Mr Monti, or "king of the oil industry" as he is called here, was forced to sell "two newspapers" which he owned to pay the tens of millions of dollars of debts he owned some Italian organizations. ENI's step is considered a prelude to seizing the most important Italian refineries for the purpose of managing this vital sector throughout the country, because Italy, which needs to import oil more than any other European nation, cannot afford to leave the fate of their petroleum sector in the hands of private companies alone.

OSLO BOND ISSUE--A special economic report, published yesterday, said that the most important incident last week was the announcement that the city of Oslo was the first borrower in the Kuwaiti bond market, after 1 year of restriction of issuing new bonds. The volume of bonds issued was limited to 7 million dinars, which is the maximum amount permitted by the central bank. Oslo, the capital of Norway, is considered one of the highest rated borrowers. The international bonds report, issued by the Arab monetary exchange company, said that the bonds' maturity date is 1990, at a 9 and 1/4 percent interest. The median long term will be 7 years due to the loan payment fund. The initial market reaction was good, due to the excellent characteristics of the borrower, in addition to the good interest rate and maturity date especially compared with the old dinar [interest] rate issued by Oslo at 7 and 5/8 percent, with a maturity date of 1990. The weekly report also mentioned that the prices of other international bonds remained the same. This reflects caution by the investors against the gradually rising interest rates on the dinar due to increasing local market demand. In other international markets, the volume of exchange was low in general for seasonal reasons, in addition to the rise in interest rates in foreign markets. This was especially true in the U.S., where the stock market is suffering from a relapse due to the Federal Reserve Bank's policy in the money market and the presidential candidates' election campaign declarations. NATIONAL ASSEMBLY, WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE--Prime Minister al-Shaykh Saad Al-Abdullah [al-Sabah] announced that certain amendments will be made to the election law, and that the minister of interior was assigned the task of presenting suggestions in this regard. In a press conference held yesterday morning, he assured that all the decisions, decrees and laws issued during the past 4 years will be presented to the new National Assembly for review. He said that the return of the assembly was in fulfillment of his promise and commitment. He also said that being part of the assembly is not an honor, but a duty and responsibility. He expressed his hope that everybody has learned their lessons and to stay away from old assembly practices. He reconfirmed the right of women's suffrage in assembly elections, but he said that this matter was in the hands of the cabinet. He said that the new assembly will have 50 members and a recommendation will be presented to the new assembly to increase its membership to 60. He said that the circumstances of this area and the Arab world necessitate the existence of a National Assembly in order to establish group responsibility and public participation in decisions that are important to Kuwait's present and future. PHALANGIST INITIATIVES ASSESSED; FRANJIYAH OBTAINS MODERN ARMS

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 9 Aug 80 pp 23-23

[Article by Ghassan Bayram: "Latest Race between Security Breakdowns and Partition! Phalange Told Damascus, 'We Will not Declare a Christian State in our Sector!'"]

[Text] When the Syrian leaders decided to redeploy the Syrian Deterrent Forces in Lebanon, their decision was not tactical, as some believed and tried to explain. Rather, it was a strategic decision, through which the Syrians intended to regroup their forces to meet the great dangers that had begun to threaten their national security, and counter the pressure applied to insure the progress of the Camp David plans in the region.

At that time, Damascus communicated these reasons to all Lebanese and Arab officials concerned. Syria said that Israel, with the consent of the United States, was preparing to gradually drag the Syrian army in Lebanon into clashes which would lead to Syria's isolation. A decisive military blow would be directed against Syria, putting an end to its political and military role with regard to thwarting the Camp David accords.

The Syrian leadership implemented the first and second stages of withdrawal and regrouping, but it was not long before it stopped implementing the remaining stages. It informed those concerned with the reason for this.

These reasons gradually became apparent recently, with the revival of security breakdowns and military confrontations on the Lebanese scene. These began to escalate in such a way as to raise fears that the internal security situation in Lebanon is in danger of blowing up, and that confrontations might resume at times between yesterday's adversaries, and at other times between yesterday's allies.

In due course, senior Syrian officials became convinced that Arab and non-Arab forces had begun to return to the Lebanese scene, exploiting Syria's withdrawal, and the security and political vacuums left behind.

As a result, Lebanon was once again becoming an open area for the outbreak of repressed Arab struggles, as well as regional struggles which had been revived following the events of Iran and Afghanistan.

It became evident to Syria that this development threatened its own security, more than anybody else. Syria sensed that the appearance on the Lebanese scene of all the familiar forces as well as new elements concerned with the Middle East conflict, meant grave dangers, including the outbreak of a new war in Lebanon, which might be more savage than the 2-year war. These dangers also include the partition of Lebanon and a strike against the Palestinian Resistance. The purpose would be to attain the fundamental goal of fragmenting whatever Arab capabilities remain in opposition to the Camp David solutions, and, consequently, to impose a comprehensive solution at the expense of Lebanon, the Palestinians and the Arab territory occupied in 1967.

It also became quite evident that Israel would be the one in the best position to use the revived regional and Arab disputes on the Lebanese scene to its best advantage, by directing a military strike at the appropriate time. And why not, as long as the American administration, as a result of the presidential elections, has become powerless to deter or even to reproach Israel.

Faced with these new developments and factors, the Syrian leadership suspended its decision to pull out its forces from Lebanon. The first signs of the new perils appeared in the security violations and political assassinations which have so far occurred. They are all part of a scheme with which the Lebanese state has become thoroughly familiar. It is aimed at fabricating serious security incidents in Lebanon, in order to once again disrupt the situation in a way that makes the results difficult to foresee at the present time, unless the purpose is what Egyptian President Anwar Sadat stated in his recent speech to the effect that Lebanon was approaching a catastrophe and that its partition was forthcoming.

After the 7 July operation of the Phalange Party, in which it was able to eliminate the military wing of former President Camille Sham'un's party, the Phalange Party's military commander, Bashir al-Jumayyil, was quoted as saying that the 7 July operation was not for fun, because the military operation, and the stern security measures taken to control the situation, "have immunized our areas and will make them secure in the face of the serious security disruptions expected to take place in the western sector of Beirut and other areas subject to the authority of the Palestinians and their allies."

Bashir al-Jumayyil is also quoted as saying: "We have been aware that serious incidents would occur in the western sector of Beirut, as a result of the outbreak of Arab, regional and local conflicts there. We were afraid that these flare-ups would spread to our sector, as a result of the lax security situation in our areas and of our certainty that more than one hostile element would be capable of penetrating some of the Christian lines, including those of the military organization of the National Liberal Party. This would make it easy for these hostile forces to turn both east and west areas into a theater for the eruptions that would start in the western areas. Now, however, we can be confident that eruptions in the western sector of Beirut would not spread into our sector."

This, as well as prior Phalange Party justifications of the operation to eliminate President Sham'un's military arm, were the subject of interest and study, not only by senior Lebanese officials, but also by party and government leaders in Syria as well. The latter saw the Phalange Party's action as adding a new element to their apprehensions regarding Lebanon. This is the fear that this Phalangist initiative was in fact meant to pave the way for the proclamation of a Christian state under Phalangist leadership, making the partition of Lebanon a fait accompli.

On this basis, the matter remained the object of study and concern by the Syrians, pending adoption of a final decision to take political and military action to confront this dangerous development.

Damascus has to reach a decision in this regard before the meeting of the Ba'th Party Congress, so that government and party leaders could respond to all anticipated questions at the party congress. It was said in this regard that the topic of the Phalangist military and political initiatives, and the resultant danger of Lebanon's partition, were some of the basic matters to be brought up for discussion.

As part of the rapid action initiated in the Syrian capital, contacts took place between Damascus and officials of the Phalange Party to obtain clarification of the party's intentions and designs regarding the Christian areas now subject to its exclusive authority, and, consequently, to discuss accusations that the Phalange Party was preparing to proclaim its own state.

The Phalangist leadership appeared to be extremely eager, during these contacts, to convey the following to the Syrian capital:

First, the Phalangist forces' actions on 7 July were aimed at rectifying abnormal security conditions.

Second, the Phalange Party's security measures in its sector are not meant to be a prelude to proclaiming a state in this sector, because the party is for continuation of Lebanon's territorial and popular unity. The party has repeatedly proved that, particularly when it recently declared its support for the principles of a accord announced by President Ilyas Sarkis, and, consequently, its readiness to participate in a government of national accord on the basis of these premises.

Third, the Phalange Party wishes, or rather is anxious, to resume the dialog that was underway between itself and Syrian officials on various levels, in order to achieve mutual understanding and consultation and to arrive at solutions for all pending matters.

In light of the results of these contacts, the Phalange Party decided to form a broad-based delegation to go to Damascus to conduct a comprehensive review and evaluation of the Lebanese situation following the new developments, particularly the Phalange's elimination of President Sham'un's militia, and, consequently, the complication of the problem of forming a new government of reconciliation in Lebanon.

Additional reasons led the Phalange Party to speed up the visit to Damascus and the resumption of the dialog with Syrian officials. It has been decided to hold up renewal of this dialog until after a new Lebanese government was formed. What were these additional reasons?

A few days ago, firm information was received that former President Sulayman Franjiyah had received a large shipment of modern arms from a distant Arab state, which would enable him to open a powerful, military front against the Phalangists.

This caused Phalangist confusion, to the extent that Phalangist leaders thought that Franjiyah's new weapons were sent to him by Syria. However, this suspicion was quickly dispelled, when the Phalangist leadership discovered that the arms came from another Arab country.

In spite of that, the Phalangist leadership remained convinced that the Syrian capital would have a certain responsibility for any military initiative by former President Franjiyah, following his receipt of these modern weapons. This is because of two basic considerations:

First, President Franjiyah was Damascus' first political ally. Second, the Syrian forces operating in the north are capable of stopping any major military action by former President Franjiyah against Phalangist areas.

Therefore, the Phalangist leadership made two decisions. The first, a military one, was to concentrate military forces on the northern front of President Franjiyah, and to issue orders to destroy Zagharta at the first sign of military action by him. The second decision, a political one, was to accelerate the opening of a dialog with Damascus, in order to look into this matter and ascertain Syria's views on it.

In this climate, a large explosion occurred in the al-Ashrafiyah area, when an explosive charge of 40 kgs of TNT was detonated and resulted in heavy material damages and a number of dead and wounded.

The state of alarm caused by this explosion, apart from the fear of repetition of the incident, induced observers to believe that the myth of self-administered security, which the Phalange Party had tried or is trying to impose in the Christian sector, is subject to collapse any minute, and that the events confirm every day that the security situation remains unchanged. Any Lebanese sector, be it western or eastern, has been and continues to be exposed to bloody, painful incidents, because the reasons for this explosive situation are still present in every spot in Lebanon, from south to north, including Beirut and its suburbs.

Lebanese authorities know that there is a link between the clashes which are breaking out in the western sector of Beirut and the fighting which broke out in Ba'labakk during the funeral procession of the dean of the journalists' union, Riyadh Taha. These bloody military clashes are probably intensifying and escalating as a result of the regional and Arab conflicts which have reappeared on the Lebanese scene.

Had the situation been limited to these kinds of outbursts, the anxiety and fears of Lebanese officials would be quite restrained. However, the thing that increases the enormity of their fears is that the government does not know how far the Phalange Party will go in paving the way for a separatist state in the eastern sectors. The government also does not know whether what is happening in the eastern sector is a result of what is occurring in the western sector, or vice versa, with regard to the dangerous game that President Sarkis calls the game of partition.

LEBANESE GOVERNMENT CRISIS DISCUSSED

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 9 Aug 80 pp 24-25

[Article by Ghassan Bayram: "Outwardly, A Crisis of Government; Inwardly, a Crisis of Power; Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh Will Withdraw if Sarkis Wishes; al-Sulh's Withdrawal Means Abandonment of Last Constitutional Prerogative of President"]

[Text] The speech given by President Ilyas Sarkis on Army Day, 1 August, was not the speech he wanted to deliver on this national occasion. He wanted, by means of this speech, to dominate the next phase. He thought it would be one of relaxation for Lebanon, and the beginning of the reconciliation that would give the country a way out of its ordeal.

President Sarkis had prepared his basic Army Day speech amid preparations to charge Premier Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh with forming the government of reconciliation activists. Everything on the surface of the Lebanese crisis appeared relaxed and promising.

On this basis, President Sarkis prepared a speech tantamount to a program of action to initiate a solution of the crisis, under the aegis of national reconciliation beginning with the formation of a government of political activists.

However, winds always blow in the wrong direction. As soon as the Lebanese president had taken the first step of asking Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh to form the new government of political activists, and was about to take the second step of announcing the formation of the new government, matters became complicated, difficulties emerged and the rosy dream which President Sarkis had entertained for some time receded.

When Army Day approached, he found himself forced to cancel his prepared speech and write another one, concise and traditional in both form and content, in which he was content to affirm the importance of the army and its unity and of national reconciliation, and to express good wishes.

The past 4 years of President Sarkis' term have been filled with frustrated hopes of one kind or another. These frustrations have always left the Lebanese locomotive of peace and security motionless. The same motionless condition applies to Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh, who is waiting now, not knowing whether or not he will be able to form a new government or bow out.

The premier-designate has for some time entertained the idea of stepping down, due to growing complications, in spite of intense consultations and contacts between Damascus and Beirut to solve the problem of the choice of al-Sulh as premier and to reach mutual understanding on a formula which would allow Sarkis and al-Sulh to announce the formation of a government.

After a meeting held by the Nationalist Movement's Political Council, at the beginning of last week, a comprehensive evaluation of the situation was made in light of the results of contacts with Damascus by members of the movement. The Nationalist Movement's staff emerged from the meeting semi-convinced that the possibility of Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh's remaining as premier-designate had become almost impossible, and that President Ilyas Sarkis was at an impasse with respect to al-Sulh. Accordingly, Sarkis had to decide whether to remain committed to al-Sulh and stay at a dead end, or abandon al-Sulh and open the way for the formation of a new government, headed by a person acceptable to all and satisfactory to Damascus.

Several Nationalist Movement leaders expressed their belief that Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh was about to bow out. Dr Samir Sabbagh, deputy chief of the Murabitun Movement, said that according to information available to him, a reasonable way out was being arranged to induce al-Sulh to step aside. He said forming a government of second-line political leaders headed by Dr Salim al-Huss or Mr Malik Salam was under consideration.

Dr Sabbagh expressed his belief that the difficulty of taking this way out might keep the problem of forming a government hanging indefinitely. Apparently, there are those who feel that they benefit from the lack of formation of a new government, and are currently active to keep the situation as is.

Dr Sabbagh added that there is now fear of dangers which might arise from keeping the government situation in suspense. It is even feared that in the next phase, these dangers will develop in a way which will not serve the security situation, or the progress of reconciliation.

In view of these dangers, the Nationalist Movement leaders agreed at their recent meeting to draw up a contingency plan in the event matters deteriorated as a result of inability to form a government and of the Phalange Party's exploitation of this situation.

Some of the fundamentals of this plan, which calls for quick action, have been disclosed as follows:

--Action to consolidate the Islamic and Nationalist positions, and develop their effectiveness.

--Intensification of contacts and coordination with former presidents Sulayman Franjiyah and Rashid Karami, and forming a high-level delegation of the Nationalist Movement to visit northern Lebanon and hold meetings with Presidents Franjiyah and Karami. The purpose is to draw up a plan of national opposition to counter Phalangist schemes and positions of the regime which are not in keeping with this plan of action. It is a plan which might be outwardly political and secretly military or vice versa.

This move by the Nationalist Movement is matched by similar moves on the part of other forces operating in Lebanon to meet all eventualities, including the possibility of al-Sulh being induced to step aside or the possibility of President Sarkis sticking with al-Sulh as premier-designate.

The important question now is, which is the stronger possibility?

A lengthy conversation by Premier-designate Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh with AL-MUSTAQBAL, not originally meant for publication, reveals certain facets of the government crisis.

According to the premier-designate, "All contacts concerning formation of the new government have not been completed, and it is not true that we are at an impasse, merely because some say that Damascus opposes my forming the new government.

"We want to take our time in our efforts to overcome the difficulties which obstruct our mission of forming the government. This stems from our belief that it does not matter if the job takes a little longer, as long as we believe that this will later shorten the suffering of Lebanon and the Lebanese."

Premier al-Sulh holds that his decision to step aside would depend on the position of President Ilyas Sarkis. This means that he will continue to refuse to step aside and will continue his efforts to form a government, until he sees that the president of the republic has given up on these efforts and has decided to settle the problem by dropping al-Sulh. At such a time, al-Sulh would announce that he is stepping aside to make room for the president to select another person to form the government.

Al-Sulh's attitude has turned the spotlight on the president's position and on what he proposes to do.

Up to the end of last week, the president had no clear and final position. Rather, it seemed that he was inclined to intensify contacts with Damascus through the foreign minister, Fu'ad Butrus, whom he chose as a liaison between himself and Damascus, to solve the problem of who is to form the government and what type of government it will be.

The president's position has divided those close to him into two groups, each with its own view regarding what the president proposes to do.

The first view is that while President Sarkis now appears to stick with al-Sulh, he is not inflexible in this attitude. The proof of that is that he has left the door open for continued discussion with Damascus on a suitable government formula. While he would like to have al-Sulh as premier, he would prefer, if he has to choose, to maintain good relations with Damascus.

The second view is that it is no longer easy or possible for President Sarkis to induce Premier al-Sulh to step aside and replace him with another nominee like Salim al-Huss or Malik Salam. They go on to say that as far as President Sarkis is concerned, the issue is not a matter of being attached to or convinced of the competence of al-Sulh, but a matter of principle rooted in the system of government in Lebanon.

The president could not stomach two or more reversals at the same time.

The first reversal would be his being compelled to abandon al-Sulh. This would mean taking away the only remaining constitutional prerogative he can exercise,namely the right to select a prime minister.

The second reversal would consist not only of the forcing on him of a premier, such as Dr al-Huss or Malik Salam, but also of the imposition on him of a specific, political course of action. This would rob him of the freedom of action required to maintain the proper balance within the Lebanese political structure. What is more serious is that imposing a prime minister and a specific political course on the president would deprive him of the element of initiative in more than one domain and on more than one level, and would transform him into a figurehead president of the republic counting whatever days are left of his term.

If this latter view is correct, there is reason to believe that President Sarkis' firmness in sticking with al-Sulh, countered by the firmness of those who reject this choice, mean that the situation in Lebanon is heading toward a crisis in the government regime, whose results would be difficult to foresee.

What is certain is that no one, especially not President Sarkis, wants such a crisis to develop, because it would mean a new political confrontation between the government leaders of Syria and Lebanon. Past experience has proved that this type of confrontation frequently has repercussions on the security situation, in terms of tensions and explosiveness, and shuts the door on any possible solution.

Thus, the Lebanese situation reverts to spinning around in a vicious circle, awaiting either surprise developments or miracles.

AMIN AL-JUMAYYIL DISCUSSES NATIONAL SITUATION

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 25 Jul 80 pp 12-14

[Interview with Amin al-Jumayyil, Phalange Party Leader in Northern al-Matn, by Huda al-Hussayni; date and place not given]

[Text] Since 7 July, the date of the military "coup" which occurred within the ranks of the Lebanese Front, the responsibility of Shaykh Amin al-Jumayyil within the Phalangist Party has grown. Amin al-Jumayyil is the party official responsible for the northern area of al-Matn.

The political positions which al-Jumayyil formerly held have been toned down considerably since the tragedy that occurred during the military coup, and this has helped the Lebanese Phalangist Party avoid many negative reactions.

Amin al-Jumayyil played a conspicuous role during this phase. He is in continuous contact with Danny Sham'un, the military commander of the Liberal Nationalists Party, and his daily meetings with President Kamil Sham'un have continued without interruption.

In this interview with AL-HAWADITH, Amin al-Jumayyil insisted that the "Lebanese Army" is the one and only savior of Lebanon, provided that it is given complete powers. He revealed that the Phalangists' relations with the Palestinian resistance have not been cut off, and he said that a meeting recently took place between a Phalangist Party information official and Abu Iyad.

In this extended interview, Amin al-Jumayyil discussed many matters, both local and international. All these matters relate to Lebanon, however. He said that he would like to see normal relations between the Phalangists and Moscow, but stressed that such relations would not weaken their relations with the free world. In addition, he called for the Lebanese state to be courageous in confronting all its problems.

The text of the interview follows:

AL-HAWADITH: During a number of meetings between you and President Sham'un, it has been noted that Sham'un has acted with a certain amount of weakness, hesitancy, and confusion. What is your view on this?

Al-Jumayyil: To be truthful, I have never in my life seen President Sham'un stronger than he is today. If there is any weakness in his character, it was his natural reaction of wanting to withdraw from the field. If this had occurred, the biggest civil war in the history of the Christian area would have taken place.

Sham'un's coolness and his ability to overcome his natural feelings toward his associates and the organization he built a long time ago were put to the test, as were his thinking and his popularity. If President Sham'un had acted as any ordinary man, with a natural reaction to the enormity of this death, it is certain that everything would have been blown apart and Lebanon would have become embroiled in a more enormous and more perilous tragedy. And the matter would not have stopped with a few dozen deaths.

AL-HAWADITH: Don't you feel remorse for the tragedy that occurred? And was it possible to avoid it?

Al-Jumayyil: It is premature to talk about remorse, and it is premature to take a position. I believe that President Sham'un was clear when he told you that the present time is not a time for disapproval, or even a time for remorse. Now is a time for bold, objective and conscientious action to deal with the course of the tragedy. Because it really is a tragedy. And we have now reached this point. There are continuous meetings between President Sham'un and Shaykh Pierre [Jamayyil], and more than one side is trying to improve the climate. There are also efforts with Danny, and there are continuous contacts between me and him, so that we can at least save what we can. And this provides a basis for rectification.

There was an unreasonable lack of discipline, which was not accepted by anyone, and there were excesses. I am not saying that we have a duty to eliminate the excesses among others. Perhaps we have more idiosyncracies than some of the others, and I am not aiming an accusation at anyone. What I want to say is that this jolt to the conscience which took place could possibly generate some new feelings among the citizens. As a consequence, it could put new dynamism into organized, earnest and infallible action to save the situation, which has nearly gotten stuck in quagmires of corruption, irresponsibility, attrition, entanglement and conflicting wagering. In any case, the correct characterization of the events which have occurred is that the Lebanese crisis went on until it finally landed in a quagmire, where diseases are usually generated.

AL-HAWADITH: Who is responsible for the continuation of this maelstrom?

Al-Jumayyil: Perhaps we lay the responsibility on President Sarkis, and he blames the situation in the Middle East, and everyone blames someone-else. In my opinion, the main responsibility lies with President Sarkis, because he is supposed to search for solutions and move quickly--especially since the events which have taken place today have turned everyone against him. Those who want partition no longer have an interest in the presence of President Ilyas Sarkis, and those who want a unified Lebanon find that their interest does not lie with President Sarkis, who is incapable of insuring the unity of Lebanon.

Herein lies the gravity of the situation. All the sides, with all their conflicts, now feel a tendency to bypass President Sarkis or view him as not serving their interests.

AL-HAWADITH: Who wants partition?

Al-Jumayyil: Lord, you at AL-HAWADITH certainly have a broader field of vision that we do, especially since your move to London.

AL-HAWADITH: In any case, they write in the foreign press that you want partition, and especially Shaykh Bashir.

Al-Jumayyil: Why don't they put us to the test? In any case, partition will end when a single army comes in and puts all this area that we live in in order.

AL-HAWADITH: What is the crisis of the Lebanese Army?

Al-Jumayyil: Shaykh Pierre made a statement and said that we call for the army to be deployed in the two areas--or at least along the lines of engagement, or in the main centers of the state, such as the airport and the ports. Then communication should be opened between these areas. After that we will discuss (perfection?). As for the statement that the army must be put in order first, and country saved later, this is an unreasonable statement. I consider it treason. I believe that it is treasonous that, while the country is burning, we should discuss (perfection?), or discuss whether or not the powers of the Deuxieme Bureau [intelligence service] of the army should be expanded. The army should be deployed with a specific mission whose aim is to get things under control. As for the reforms and the other problems, they can be dealt with afterward.

AL-HAWADITH: How is it possible for the army to be deployed when it is in a state of moral and material collapse, and when you have a situation in which if a member of the army apprehends a fighter, a group from the fighter's party comes the next day to get revenge?

Al-Jumayyil: The reason for this is that the army is being deployed gradually, in small groups, and this has destroyed the army. No state in the world requires the army to deploy gradually in small groups. The Lebanese Army must be deployed in one group, and it must be deployed honorably. Along with the deployment of the army, civilian and secular courts must be established under these circumstances. Also, definite arrangements must be made to stand up for the cause of the army. If the army is deployed in small groups and is isolated from the other areas, then any band can cut it off and remain safe from any punishment. Therefore, we say that the army ought to be deployed immediately--at least in Beirut--and in integrated areas. That is, its lines of supply should be secure--it should be an integrated army unit. In addition, a state of emergency should be declared in the areas occupied by the army. But above all, the Lebanese Army must be deployed and it must assume its responsibilities. Then we can unify Lebanon--especially since our army is still the most untarnished army in the area. For in spite of all that has happened, the army has not been known to engage in any sectarian fighting. The members of the army have not opened fire on one another in the barracks. In the Sidon barracks they haven't opened fire on the Christian, and in the Juniyah barracks they haven't opened fire on the Moslem.

No officer has been killed for sectarian reasons in any of the barracks. And in spite of what has happened, nothing has taken place to affect the honor and integrity of the Lebanese Army. Thus, our army is still much more cohesive than people believe, and it is still more effective than people believe. It is still untarnished, and it still possesses the capability to act, provided that it is given the powers and the political, official and popular backing to do so.

AL-HAWADITH: But there is no equivalence between the weapons available to the parties and those possessed by the army.

Al-Jumayyil: The army possesses two kinds of weapons: material weapons and moral weapons. All its material weapons are of no benefit if they are not supported by the moral weapons. Today, all the Lebanese people are on the side of the army. When the army wishes to serve its country and carry out its duties conscientiously, then all the people will spit in the face of any individual who fires on the army, whether his weapon is a pistol or a cannon. Women and children will go and stand in front of the cannons that are aimed against the Lebanese Army. This would apply to both eastern and western Beirut alike, and to Moslems and Christians alike.

AL-HAWADITH: Are you speaking now on behalf of al-Jumayyil or on behalf of the Phalangist Party, which includes Shaykh Bashir?

Al-Jumayyil: I am speaking on behalf of the spirit of the Lebanese Phalangist Party, and the overwhelming majority, and the logic which forms the basis for the thinking of the president of the Phalangist Party himself. I speak from this position.

AL-HAWADITH: But doesn't Shaykh Bashir object to the deployment of the army?

Al-Jumayyil: Because Shaykh Bashir--and he is right to a great extent--has lost confidence in the ability of the army to carry out any rescue mission on the level of Lebanon. And perhaps Shaykh Bashir is not the only one who shares these feelings. The state takes pleasure in everything that happens and is waiting for the people to beg and plead with it. I don't believe that anyone will beg the authorities, and authority must be imposed or it will not have any existence.

These are the feelings of a large segment of the Lebanese. But in spite of these feelings, no one will stand in the way of the state if it takes matters firmly in hand. On the contrary, they will feel at ease, because the people really accept the tyranny of the state.

AL-HAWADITH: We have learned that you reject President Sarkis' position against deploying the army, but why won't you discuss the reasons for this rejection?

Al-Jumayyil: I am against President Ilyas Sarkis' logic, which says, as the English, "wait and see." And I am against the logic which says, "We can't do anything." This, unfortunately, was the logic of former minister Fu'ad Butrus, who is our dear friend. This logic has not contributed to saving the ship. Under previous circumstances, the state has been able to impose itself. We have not forgotten that you of AL-HAWADITH have paid the price. Your magazine was confiscated in east and west [Beirut]. Thus, the state could have confiscated the magazine and newspaper REVEIL which supported AL-HAWADITH and shared in some of measures taken by the state.

Therefore, the state had the capabilities to close the newspapers and apply the law in every sense of the word. So why did it give up all these capabilities? How could it have failed to settle the matter when it was able to? How did it permit all the initiatives to fall through its hands? This is the logic of Fu'ad Butrus, which did not lead to any progress in the Lebanese problem or any improvement of the situation in the Lebanese sphere.

Now, who is responsible? It is certain that these words will make former minister Fu'ad Butrus angry, and he will try to find an excuse for himself. In any case, it is incumbent on the government to succeed, and the people always hold the government accountable for success or failure and do not find any excuses for it. The people are not required to find excuses to absolve the ruler. When an architect is asked to design a house, the house is expected to be sound. It is the responsibility of the architect to build a sound house. In the case of the doctor, you don't force him to cure you, because there are some diseases which fall outside his specialty. He is required to perform all his duties in a completely conscientious manner. But there is no excuse for the architect if the building falls down.

Thus, the responsibility of the government is similar to that of the architect. It must succeed because the people will not excuse it--particularly when it comes to action. This is especially true because our problem is linked to a considerable extent to the Mideast situation and foreign issues. Many aspects of this problem have been brought before international conferences and gatherings and have been taken up in diplomatic and political activity in an effort to arrive at a solution. But Lebanese diplomacy has not moved effectively in a way that would bring about an improvement in circumstances and lead to progress in the Lebanese situation.

AL-HAWADITH: Do you believe that foreign pressure is keeping this from being achieved and preventing the state from taking action?

Al-Jumayyil: When you want the state to take matters in hand, there is no room to say that there is foreign pressure, because the world around us is not united against us. If we are subjected to pressures from one direction, we contain them with pressures in our favor from another direction. The state must look for the course which best serves our interests and follow it.

Now, everyone is maneuvering against us: the states, the forces in the Lebanese sphere--all are maneuvering except the state, which is submitting to all the maneuvers and is not daring to counter them or resist them. On the contrary, the state accepts and yields to the maneuvers and the pressures in spite of the fact that it is still the state, the ambassador is still the ambassador of the state, the minister is still the minister of the state, and the civil servant is still the employee of the state. In other words, the state is disdaining all the givens and all the resources in its possession.

AL-HAWADITH: You seem to be treating the state unfairly, as if it decides the fate of the Middle East problem. According to what is published in the major capitals, Lebanon is under sentence of colonization. Menachem Begin refuses to withdraw from one inch of the West Bank to allow the establishment of a Palestinian state. Consequently, the only final solution that remains is Lebanon.

Al-Jumayyil: If what they say in the Western capitals is correct--and I don't want to go into the details of it--and as long as we are talking about the role of the state, then it is incumbent on the state to deal with these suggestions. It should send for the Palestinians and come to terms with them on a sound basis, with courage and sincerity. Then it should reveal everything before public opinion and reach agreement with the Palestinians, as we did in 1969 after the encounters between us and them, as well as after the clashes between the state and the Palestinians in 1973. The state should come to terms with the Palestinians and say: We are now helpless, and there is a phase that we must get through. As long as neither one of us can do away with the other--if you please, Palestinians--it is in our interest for you to find a solution to your problem and for us to cooperate with one another. Otherwise, the Palestinian, the state, the Lebanese Front, and the National Movement, as well, will all be bled. The Amal movement will open fire on Fatah, Fatah will open fire on the Popular Front, and the Phalangists will open fire on the Liberals.

And these will open fire on the Guardians of the Cedars. In other words, this tragic situation that Lebanon is undergoing demands an individual who will come and speak the truth.

AL-HAWADITH: What is your view on the position of President Sham'un in which he refused to concede the defeat of the Liberal Party but suggested the idea of transforming his party from a military party into a political party?

Al-Jumayyil: It is premature to talk about and comment on these matters. At the same time, it is true that President Sham'un wants to change his party into a political party, because there is also discussion of turning the Phalangist Party into a political party, with the proviso that a national council of the Lebanese resistance would be established to control military matters. Therefore, it is premature for us to analyze President Sham'un's remark before things take shape.

AL-HAWADITH: Would the Phalangist Party really dissolve the war council?

Al-Jumayyil: Anything is possible and open. But for your information, there is nothing called the war council in the Phalangist Party. Certain names impose themselves in the field, but the real name is the Security Council. The designation "war council" got started during the war in order to gather all the leaders into a coordinating council, and it has continued in use because the war has not ended.

AL-HAWADITH: Where do your contacts with the Palestinians and the Soviet Union stand?

Al-Jumayyil: The contacts with Moscow are still in existence through a principle party in Lebanon and a state which we must respect. However, there are basic complications between us and Moscow, the main one being Moscow's solidarity with the Communist Party, which is our political adversary in the Lebanese arena.

Secondly, there are the joint statements between Moscow and the Palestinian resistance. These conflict with diplomatic principles since some of them involve interference in internal affairs, as when Moscow acknowledges the Palestinian resistance's right to act in Lebanon as an existing power. Moreover the Soviet information media express many positions hostile to a segment of the Lebanese people, in spite of all our wishes that our relations be normal and that Moscow respect the sovereignty of Lebanon in every sense of the word and act on this basis. At the same time, we do not renounce our basic friendships: the friendship of the free world, and our friendship with the United States.

AL-HAWADITH: What about the contacts with the Palestinians?

Al-Jumayyil: Our contacts with them have not been broken. Relations between us began in 1973. Joseph Shadir, Abu Iyad, and Abu Hasan were on the coordinating committee, which was under the supervision of Yasir 'Arafat. When we came to the Tall al-Za'tar events, it made a considerable effort to avert them and prevent a military settlement. Our relations with the Palestinians have not been broken since that time. We would always put the Syrians in the picture, and some meetings took place--with Sami al-Khatib present--for the sake of integration of action. The meetings were friendly. In order to be realistic, we say that the Palestinians are now present in Lebanon, and if we come to terms with one another, it will be possible for them to take part in easing the tragedy of Lebanon. On this basis, we began the earnest dialog with them. Today the dialog continues. Even at the level of the party, one of the information officials in the Phalangist Party met with Abu Iyad a short time ago, and the two talked about specific coordination and the intensification of meetings concerning various matters.

We are trying to put our relations with the Palestinians within an objective framework rather than an emotional framework or one of reactions and residual feelings. This is in the interest of Lebanon, because as we all know, before the Palestinian problem is solved, the Palestinian people will remain here. So we can either be content with this situation and work on this basis, or we can reject the accomplished fact. If we do the latter, Lebanon will continue to experience upheavals and conflicts.

PHALANGE CHIEF DEFENDS POLICIES, POSITIONS

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 15 Sep 80 p 5

/Article: "Bashir al-Jumayyil: Our Problems Are Not with the Members of the Army But with the Mentality Driving the State Institutions"/

/Text/ Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil, leader of the Lebanese Forces, has accused the Lebanese army of not honoring the Phalange's houses in al-Hadath or the banners displayed in them. He said that the problem "is not with the soldiers and officers in the army, and not with the institution as an institution, so much as it is with the mentality which drives all the institutions of the state, from the army to the judiciary, education and foreign policy."

He stressed that there will be no infighting among members of the united ranks from today on and warned that if circumstances continue as they have in al-Hadath "They will be dealt with by the dynamic of 7 July, and it is enough for them to understand."

He declared that after today there will be no party cells in the schools and universities.

Shaykh Bashir was talking at a celebration held in the town of al-Chinah, in the entry to Kasrawan, on the occasion of the laying of a cornerstone for a new Phalange Party house. Attending the meeting were a member of the Phalange Political Bureau and head of the Kasrawan Region, Mr Michel Sufayr, the head of the Department of Regions, Mr Salim Ru'aydi, member of the Executive Committee of the region, Mr Joseph Tutunji, and a gathering of people from the area.

The celebration was launched with a statement by the head of the al-Chinah Phalange Section, Mr Nazih Shalala, who talked about the "7 July Movement" and its role in "uniting the Lebanese rifle," concentrating on the need to "implant the spirit which this movement has given prominence to on the field level in order to liberate Lebanon."

Mr Antoine 'Assaf spoke in the name of the Kasrawan Region Council Executive Committee, dealing with the occasion and the positions of Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil.

Statement by Pierre al-Jumayyil

al-Jumayyil laid the cornerstone in participation with the head of the region, head of the section and town priest. He then made a statement in which he said "We are inaugurating a house for the Phalange and hope that after today our heroic army will not think of entering the houses of the Phalange or that anyone will enter these houses except those we want to enter them. Lebanon needs centers which are redolent with faith and love, and, because this love and spirit of sacrifice are lacking among others besides us, we have been compelled to make up for what others have lost in what we are doing now."

He added, "One need not pause at length before what happened in al-Hadath Some conclusions are adequate to draw lessons on what can happen or what we can do in the future. What happened in al-Hadath made us show to what extent we ourselves have become the army and to what extent others have become militias and bands. It has become clear to what extent we ourselves have become disciplined, a national patriotic organization responsible for the areas we are in, and how others have come to act the way we did 3, 4, 5 years ago, or even 2 months ago. What happened in al-Hadath proves that the more organized, developed and strong we are the more others regress. The first conclusion we can observe, without malicious joy or scorn, is that we acted like an army and a responsible authority in the 4 days these events occurred, alleviating the barriers and easing the passage of our brethren in the army, without restrictions, while our houses were entirely exposed and our comrades were entirely exposed to what they faced at the hands of the Syrians in the occupied areas. They were not able to enter the houses of the Phalange in al-Hadath because this army "went away." Perhaps the Syrians were slightly nobler, respecting the banners in the houses of the Phalange. On some occasions the army behaved with the Phalange and Phalange houses the way the Syrian army behaves in the area it is occupying. The newspaper AL-'AMAL has been prohibited from coming into al-Hadath as it was in the past and today from coming into Zahlah. The political effects of the insane 4 days which passed in al-Hadath are taking place and being studied, and their messages are being drawn. Our position will be based in accordance with deductions in the future. To this day we have not learned and have not understood why what happened happened. After today we have started to be afraid of the introduction of the Trojan horse into our region; even when we did not take from within or from outside they have tried to take us through institutions. Four thousand young prople died so that our freedom and our areas would remain inviolate."

After he repeated that the Phalange Party had preserved the security of the troops in its movements and its houses in the eastern sections of Beirut, he said, "The problem is not with the soldiers and officers of the army, or with the inatitution as an institution, so much as it is with the mentality which drives all the organizations of the state, from the army to the judiciary, education and foreign policy. We should point out to those in charge of affairs there that when we are more vexed than necessary we will say that we are not among those who will be vexed, will be hard pressed, or will be jammed into tin cans. We will bear it, swallow it and be patient, but there are limits to that, and we hope people will understand that we are not ready to endure what is going on today in 'Ayn al Rummanah, al-Hadath, Wadi Shahrur, and Kafr Shima These areas were a citadel of perseverance and they protected Ba'abda--it was not Ba'abda which protected them. To them go the thanks for protecting al Yarzah, it is not al Yarzah that protected their existence."

Then he said, "I would like to shed light on social conditions and living conditions, and leave the political conditions, which we are in agreement over, to the side. After what we have gone through the past 2 months, we find ourselves in the face of challenges and difficulties of a new kind. The dynamic of 7 July exists in al-Hadath. If the conditions in this region continue to deteriorate, they will be dealt with by the dynamic of 7 July. It is enough that they understand.

"We must deal with social conditions by the dynamic and mentality of 7 July. This is requested and demanded of our society, and our brothers who make up this society, on the territory of free Lebanon, from now until the war of liberation whose timing we have not declared, because the popular background to the war of liberation must be organized so that we may be able to bear the difficulties imposed upon us. We must become organized like a society and prepare ourselves socially and economically to transcend the state of chaos, fraudulence and perversity we are now experiencing as a result of the ferocious war. It seems that instead of the government saving us in any way, we consider that it is pouring oil on the fire; when dissension breaks out it stands by, neutrally watching, on the excuse that accredited ambassadors have not given it the green light to solve the crisis in Lebanon....We must go back to the organization we had at the beginning of this war and go back to the kind of discipline and conduct we respect and live in the light of....After 7 July, we created security and ended the fragmentation. Security without justice, a judiciary and order will not be proper and justice will turn into tyranny if we do not remedy our internal situation and propound solutions. We want to see how justice and the judiciary will be established. The Lebanese forces announced, at a press conference they held recently, that the government must proceed like traffic police and the judiciary and revive the public utilities. If it cannot, we will help it perform those tasks or else we will find ourselves compelled to do what will serve the vital social needs of the people. The government is not the guarantor of anything; its employees are employees on pension, and the same with its institutions. Why should a judge be active as long as he is able to receive a salary without exerting any effort? The same with traffic policemen. For 40 years of independence, the government has brought up its employees not to be men bearing responsibilities. We did not carry out the 7 July movement to take the place of the government, but, if the government is unable to rise up, we cannot wait until it does; we must guarantee a proper life for our society and end the law of the jungle. We hope that popular committees will be found on the stage between now and 1 October to remedy the various conditions of the citizens. We, as Lebanese forces, are not traffic policemen or people brought in to plant trees. Our task is defensive and security-based, to protect our area, we have liberationist responsibilities, and we are acting in this direction like a society.

"We are on the threshhold of a new season following the radical changes which occurred this summer, which led to the unification of the Lebanese rifle, after everyone had been hiding behind a tank and behind a party. Protection has been lifted from all violations and the government must bear the responsibility or else we will arrange our affairs and create a legitimate force which will always be responsible, in depth, ending all threats to our security and freedom in this area of the world and freeing us of the fear that someone will throw us into the ocean. We are organizing our society in a strong fashion, our ranks packed tight together, combining love, cooperation, mutual assistance and feelings of united destiny. No government will uproot a Palestinian refugee on our territory--nothing will uproot him except our struggle and our adherence to our land to regain sovereignty over all of it."

He moved on to the subject of schools and students, and said, "Today we must create new organizations and our brothers the students must realize that students are there to study and that it is the professor who teaches and not the student, that it is he who corrects and not the student, and that it is the administration which organizes and not us. There are no party cells. If it is necessary that there be party cells, let them be outside the sanctuary of the school. There are no Liberal and Phalange cells in the schools. Schools are for studying and for the acquisition of knowledge and science, and our students today are in the most pressing need to return to their genuine nature and perform well in civilization, knowledge and science. Let them leave politics outside the sanctuary of the school and the university. Workers have totally succeeded in being trade union members on their jobs and playing their unionist role, and they are supposed to continue in this direction. The atmosphere between worker and employer is supposed to be a normal one, because the two are in the same trench and bombs do not distinguish between them. We must view these matters with utmost interest....We are all prepared politically to make decisions together when they must be made, but the conspicuous difficulties now are in vital daily matters. In this little society, we want to live honorably and securely and emerge from the law of the jungle."

He expressed his hope that the "Lebanese forces" would be able to play their military and security part "in the battle of liberation, because when all this is achieved the Palestinian refugee will see how we defend ourselves and how we organize Lebanon."

STEPS TAKEN TO IMPLEMENT ECONOMIC AGREEMENT WITH EUROPE

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 31 Jul 80 pp 8, 12

[Article: "Lebanese-European Cooperation Agreement: The Foreign Ministry Requests Suggestions From the Economic Organization"]

[Text] The Ministry of Foreign and Expatriates' Affairs issued a memorandum to the economic organizations in Lebanon concerning the first session of the Lebanese-European Cooperation Council which was held in Brussels recently.

The memorandum called upon the economic organization and bodies in the country to study, within their own specialties, what would relate to the fourth article of the cooperation agreement concluded between Lebanon and the European economic community and to make suggestions concerning this issue along with appointing representatives to the Lebanese committee which is expected to be formed for this purpose.

The memorandum of the department of economic affairs defined the end of the current month as the deadline for receiving the responses of the concerned economic parties to the contents of the memorandum.

Following is the text of the memorandum:

First: The convening of the council:

In execution of the agreement signed between Lebanon and the European economic community on 3 May 1977 and in execution of the cabinet's decision number 11 dated 16 April 1980, the Lebanese-European Cooperation Council held its first session in Brussels on 6 June 1980. Lebanon was represented by a delegation headed by Kisirwan Labaky and comprised of Ambassador Joseph Dunato, Mr 'Adnan Qassar and Dr Antoine Basil who is a member of the Council of Development and Construction.

Second: The demands of the Lebanese delegation during the meeting:

The Lebanese delegation summarized its point of view of the meeting of the Cooperation Council in the following points:

--To develop trade exchange and to work on keeping the commercial balance between the two sides from shifting.

--To explain the great Lebanese need for reconstruction as a preparatory step towards reaching a new financial protocol for the purpose of receiving larger assistance from the European Economic Community.

--To continue to receive nutrition assistance from the community vis-a-vis the current social conditions in the country.

--To establish the technical and the economic cooperation between the two sides in order to benefit from the European advancement in these fields.

--To discuss with the European side new issues related to the fact that new countries such as Greece, Spain and Portugal haved joined the European Economic Community.

--To work toward establishing communications between the European parliament and the Lebanese parliament.

Third: The results of the meeting:

Three resolutions were made as a result of the meeting:

The First Resolution: The rules of procedures of the Cooperation Council:

--The chairmanship of the council will be on rotating basis whereby the Lebanese will assume the chairmanship from 1 April until 30 September and the Europeans will assume the chairmanship from 1 October until 31 March.

--Three Bodies:

The Cooperation Council which will meet at ambassadorial level.

The Cooperation Committee which will be comprised of experts and whose job is to assist the Cooperation Council.

The Custom Cooperation Committee which will be in charge of customs affairs and to facilitate the trade exchange from the customs-technical point of view. This committee will present its reports to the Cooperation Committee.

The Second Resolution: To define the aspects of cooperation between the European Community and Lebanon.

--The framework of the basic structure.

--Development of industrial and agricultural production.

--Vocational training, research and technical assistance.

The Third Resolution: This resolution deals with the origin of commodities.

--To review lists A and B which are part of the second protocol for the purpose of adjusting custom duties upon the new basis and rules of the Council of Custom Cooperation.

The conferees issued a note concerning the items on the agenda which pertains to the following:

--The three previously mentioned resolutions.

--The results of executing the rules of the commercial agreement:

--The imbalance in the commercial balance.

--The execution of the technical assistance to Lebanon will help in increasing productivity and will decrease the imbalance.

--The possibility of reviewing the agreement in 1985 (article 44).

--The results of the financial and technical cooperation:

--Lebanon benefited from an exceptional assistance in 1977 (20 million European units).

--The necessity to utilize the current financial protocol (30 million units).

--The desire of the Lebanese side for a new financial protocol as of 1 November 1981.

--To work toward the execution of the cooperation plan in all areas as mentioned in Article 4 of the agreement.

--To establish communications between the European Parliament and the Lebanese Parliament as per Article 39.

--Lebanon should be consulted by the European Economic Council concerning the joining of new countries.

--The Cooperation Council has been made aware of the Lebanese desire to obtain nutrition assistance for the year 1981 similar to the assistance for the current year.

Fourth: Practical steps for the purpose of cooperating with the European side.

1. The Financial Protocol:

To request from the Council of Development and Construction the following:

--To allocate the balance of the financial protocol allocations, to inform the European and to use this money in executing the planned projects.

--To prepare a list of projects for the purpose of reaching a new financial protocol as of 1 November 1981 taking into consideration that The European Economic Community representative in Lebanon, Mr Yansnes, had said that it is preferable that an agreement, on what has preceded, should be reached before the end of next July since the European side will be reviewing this matter at the end of July.

--The Nutrition Assistance

To request from the High Commission for Relief to prepare a study on the Lebanese needs for nutrition assistance for the year 1981 and to present a detailed suggestion, concerning this issue, to the European Community by means of the Ministry of Foreign and Expatriate Affairs in order for the Lebanese delegation to the European Economic Council to be able to present this request to the community.

3. In the commercial field.

--To request from the Higher Council of Customs to appoint one or two experts for the purpose of executing the third resolution (origen of the commodities, labeling the commodities as per lists A and B).

--To request from the Chanber of Commerce and Industry to prepare defined suggestions for the purpose of developing Lebanese exports to the European community (expositions, assistance, less customs restrictions, etc.).

--To request from the Ministry of Economy and Commerce to cooperate with the customs authorities and the Chamber of Commerce in this respect.

4. In the field of cooperation (article four of the agreement).

To form a Lebanese committee for the purpose of executing article four of the agreement. The committee will include the following organizations:

--The Ministry of Foreign and Expatriate Affairs.

--The General Administration of Industry.

--The Council of Development and Construction.

--The Ministry of Economy and Commerce.

--The National Council for Scientific Research.

--The Higher Council of Customs.

--The Ministry of Agriculture.

--The General Administration of Vocational Training.

--The Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

--The Association of Lebanese Industrialists.

To request from all these organizations to prepare a study as to the possibilities of cooperation with the European side in that which concerns each of these organizations. These organizations have to appoint representatives who will be members of the committee. When the Lebanese side concludes this study, a request will be made in order for the European side to hold a meeting within the framework of the Cooperation Committee and at the level of experts for the purpose of reviewing the ways to execute article four.

5. Concerning the expansion of the community:

It would be beneficial to present preliminary suggestions to the European side as to the new membership of Spain and Portugal in the community. This matter mainly centers on Spain's membership since it will create an agricultural competition to Lebanon in the European market. It will also compete with the Lebanese industrial products due to the low cost of production in Spain.

6. To establish communications between the European Parliament and the Lebanese Parliament.

--To send a message to the speaker of the parliament informing that the European Parliament has appointed the committee which will establish the communication with the parliaments of the eastern countries. The message also states that it is to the advantage of Lebanon that the Parliamentary Committee for Foreign Affairs would form a committee to communicate with the European Parliament and to express the feeling of friendship which ties the two sides together and to encourage the execution of the agreement reached between them on 3 May 1977.

7. A note.

The agreement is being executed from the commercial point of view which is a matter controlled by businessmen on both sides. Steps are being taken to execute this agreement from the point of view of the financial protocol.

It would be to the benefit of Lebanon to try to execute the agreement in its totality in order to benefit from the technical cooperation, the financial protocol and the commercial facilitations.

It would also be better not to bring up article 44 which is related to reviewing the agreement as of 1 January 1981 because this agreement, in its entirety, is beneficial to Lebanon and it is our duty to try to execute it before any new reconsiderations.

SYRIAN ECONOMIC DECISION HARMFUL TO LEBANESE BANKS

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 24 Jul 80 p 5

[Article: "Lebanese Banks Might Be Affected Negatively as a Result of a Decision, by the Syrian Ministry of Economy, To Offer Facilitation for Foreign Imports"]

[Text] Banking circles mentioned that the Lebanese banking sector might be affected negatively as a result of a decision issued in mid-June by the Syrian minister of economy and foreign trade, Dr Muhammad al-Atrash. The decision offered new facilitations in repaying the value of the private sector imports with foreign currencies.

The decision contained conditions allowing licensed private sector importers to repay the value of their imports by means of local licensed banks either by establishing credit or by placing the value of the documents up for collection.

The expected cause for negative effects on Lebanese banks is that most of the foreign imports operations used to occur through these banks or through Jordanian or common interest banks operating in Paris.

Although the decision did not forbid the use of foreign banks yet it included incentives if the operations are concluded by means of Syrian banks.

Following is the text of the decision, "Instructions No 81:"

"In order to encourage importers from the private sector, in order for them to confine their banking transactions to local banks in Syria so that they can save commissions and banking expenses which are paid in foreign currencies when using foreign banks, to give the opportunity to those importers who have money abroad to bring their money back to the country so that it can be used in repaying the value of their imports by means of using local banks, in an effort to develop our decision No 173 dated 7 March 1974 and in clarifying decision No 211 dated 7 April 1980 which permits the issuance of import licence of import licenses to the private sector without the need to transfer the value of imports in foreign currencies.

"In fulfillment of the above we issue the following:

"First: It is permitted for importers from the private sector, who were granted or will be granted licenses and permits stamped by the phrase 'no need to transfer the money value abroad', to pay for their imports by means of licensed local banks either by establishing a credit account or by the value of their documents up for collection. This can be done on condition that the importers should either deposit at that bank a down-payment of at least 15 percent of the total value of their credit in foreign currency or they should give the bank the right to collect the value of the documents in foreign currency. The importer will not be questioned about the origin of these foreign currencies which are used in these operations.

"Second: In order to benefit from the provisions of the previous article (No 1) the following conditions are required:

"1. The importer should present to the local bank a valid import license or permit.

"2. The importer should either give the bank the foreign currency which is needed to establish the credit account or the value of the documents for collection according to the rules and regulations of that bank.

"3. The importer should give the bank not more than 1.5 percent of the total value of the credit of the documents for collection, in foreign currency in exchange for banking commission and expenses.

"4. The importer should give the bank the balance of the value of the documents of the imported shipment in execution of the established credit in foreign currency and on the designated dates in accordance with the conventional rules of the bank for such operations.

"Third: The importer can repay by using the foreign currency he has in his open accounts at the Syrian Commercial Bank. This is done according to the decision No 191 issued by the minister of economic and foreign trade on 23 April 1970 concerning the use of foreign currency which was earned abroad.

"Fourth: The amounts deposited in foreign currencies in local banks should be strictly used in repaying the value of imports ordered by the importer himself. In case the foreign currency is not used in import operations within a 3-month period from the time the last import license has been presented to the local bank, then the local bank will purchase these amounts at the current rate of exchange issued daily by the Syrian Commercial Bank and the exchange value is then deposited in Syrian currency in the importer's account.

"Fifth: The local bank will be permitted to exchange the incoming foreign currencies for import purposes to any other foreign currency desired by the importers according to the conventional regulations of the bank in exchange operations.

"Sixth: The repayment of foreign currencies by the important can be made with all forms of payment (checks, money orders and banknotes) and with different accepted foreign currencies without asking questions about the source of these monies.

"Seventh: The foreign currencies paid by the importer to the bank for the previously defined purposes does not exempt the owner from paying the dues resulting from the value of his imports or any other commitments which are subject to the regulations of bankrates.

"Eighth: The provisions of these instructions do not apply on imports from countries with which Syria has established payment agreements.

"Ninth: These instructions will go into effect upon issuance and their provisions will apply to licenses and permits issued to the private sector prior to the issuance of these instructions."

INDUSTRIALISTS PRESENT REQUESTS FOR COMMON MARKET ECONOMIC AID

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 15 Sep 80 p 7

/Article: "Industrialists' Recommendations on Benefiting from Agreement with European Market"/

/Text/ In accordance with a request from the Economic Affairs Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, the Society of Lebanese Industrialists has drawn up a memorandum containing recommendations on different aspects of possible benefits from the economic, technical and financial cooperation agreement signed with the European Economic Group, in light of the principles included in Article Four of the agreement, which in particular stipulates the following:

"Cooperation between the group and Lebanon, aimed at particular in strengthening the following matters:

"The group's participation in the efforts Lebanon is exerting to develop its output and the infrastructure of its economy in order to diversify its economic structure. This participation must be linked with the industrialization of Lebanon and the modernization of its agricultural sector.

"Strengthening of trade and promoting the sale of products which Lebanon exports.

"Group cooperation aimed at developing Lebanese industrial output."

The society set forth a number of recommendations, expressing its readiness to prepare integrated projects for all of them, stressing the need to restudy the schedule appended to the agreement on commodities which benefit from customs exemptions and discounts, especially in order to review the conditions imposed for these commodities to acquire the character of "originating in Lebanon."

Here is the text of the memorandum:

Honored Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, Economic Affairs Department:

Subject: The society's observations and recommendations on the implementation of Article Four of the Lebanese-European agreement.

Source: Your letter No 1683/9 dated 3 July 1980.

Greetings and respect, following which: we received your letter mentioned above, with attachments, last 29 July. The society is honored to submit to you as follows its observations and recommendations, whose adoption it considers will help the industrial sector achieve practical benefit from the Lebanese-European agreement:

First, as regards the principles contained in Article Four of the agreement under discussion:

A. The group's participation in efforts Lebanon is making to develop its production and the infrastructure of its economy:

Because of the events which have passed over the country, Lebanese industry lost some of the basic ingredients to support and develop growth, especially /through/:

A deficiency in spheres of development credit.

A difficulty in obtaining credit facilities from abroad to import machinery, equipment and primary materials.

Emigration of skilled Lebanese manpower.

Direct and indirect damage to some mutual development institutions, such as the Industrial Research Institute and the Vocational Training Center.

The fact that some industrial organizations have been compelled to review factory sites.

The Lebanese government has made many attempts to confront these obstacles. However, Lebanese industry is still in need of more effective measures to repair what the events have wrought on the industrial development infrastructure. The society, relying on the first principle contained in Article Four of the Lebanese-European agreement, which stipulates "the group's participation in the efforts being made by Lebanon to develop its production and the infrastructure of its economy," considers that:

There are numerous areas in which to put this principle into practical application.

Specifically, the society recommends that the Lebanese government strive to obtain aid from the European group in the following areas:

1. Obtain a $200-million long term loan from the group at low interest to be dedicated to industrial development purposes.

The society would like to point out in this regard that the foundation exists for guaranteeing the soundness of this loan, in the event it is obtained, both in terms of managing the loan channels and distributing them among industrial organizations and in terms of guaranteeing new investments.

The Lebanese government previously guaranteed a long-term credit loan to damaged industrial organizations and took suitable administrative measures to oversee the management of this loan and its distribution through the Development and Reconstruction Council in cooperation with some medium- and long-term lending banks. It is in these banks' capability, in cooperation with other specialized financing banks to provide the objective conditions to guarantee the soundness of the desired loan.

In another area, the Lebanese government has established the National New Investment Insurance Organization, which constitutes an element of security as regards loans granted to industrial organizations to finance their development investments.

2. In the same framework, the society recommends that an effort be made by countries in the group to induce export insurance organizations, especially COFAS /sic/ in France and HERMES in West Germany, to resume insuring these countries' exports of industrial machinery and equipment to Lebanon. In this field we have had successful experience, since the HERMES organization has recently agreed to resume insuring German organizations' exports to Lebanon, although within specific limits which will not satisfy the requisite goals of industrial development. The society considers that contacts in this regard must be centered on the guarantees Lebanese laws provide, as we pointed out above. In general, if it seems that countries in the group want additional official guarantees, such as special agreements to guarantee investments, we consider that the matter merits positive study.

3. As regards meeting the skilled manpower deficiency the events have brought about, we recommend that the group be requested to provide material support to support the establishment of vocational training centers in Lebanon and develop them in a manner which will help provide manpower trained in the necessary skills in the necessary numbers.

4. In the basic areas to which the group can contribute, in order to support attempts to develop Lebanese production, there is help to re-equip the Industrial Research Institute, which is considered the technical cornerstone for getting industry in Lebanon to grow and develop.

5. In another area, the events, and the economic and security developments which arose from them, have made a review of the status of some industrial organizations mandatory. Therefore, and in view of the fact that most countries in the group be requested to take charge of conducting a study which will deal with the definition of the following points:

The industrial organizations' need to move from one place to another.

The expenses of moving industrial organizations.

Moving expenses for industrial organizations.

Financing industrial organizations' moves to new areas.

6. In another context, the Council of Ministers previously approved the framework for guiding the policy of encouraging industry and industrial development in Lebanon. However, it is not possible to set out any objective development plans for industry without relying on clear data and figures on the true current state of industry.

Therefore we consider that among the urgent matters which the group can contribute to realizing as regards the sector is the provision of financial and technical aid to complete the conduct of a comprehensive survey of industry in Lebanon. The committee derived from the General Department of Industry, in which this group is represented, has completed a full draft of the industrial survey, specifying among other things the material and technical requirements of the project. We consider that it might be useful to request the European group's help in implementing this project.

B. As regards the consolidation of trade and the sale of products Lebanon exports, as well as industrial cooperation aimed at developing Lebanese industrial output:

For years, in order to facilitate the export of Lebanese industrial goods to European group markets, this group devoted special attention to economic and political considerations, most important of which are:

The need to parcel out shares for the disposition of Lebanese production among various markets.

Concentration on stable markets in terms of the factor of demand.

Through the experiences we have acquired in this field, major obstacles have appeared which have obstructed efforts to open group markets up to Lebanese production. The most conspicuous of these obstacles are the following:

The high costs of marketing in the group countries and the inability of most Lebanese industrial organizations to defray these costs.

The industrial organizations' lack of an adequate grasp of the principles of marketing in the group countries.

The industrial organizations' readiness to confront marketing demands in the group markets is insufficient and will not fulfil the requirements of these markets, especially in terms of packaging and processing conditions and specifications, distribution channels, and means for communicating with them, as well as means for making use of the privileges and preferences the market countries give Lebanese production.

The society previously made numerous contacts with international organizations, especially the Unido organization and some institutes of cooperation in some market countries, of which we can mention the German Technical Cooperation Organization and the German Institute of Developing Countries in West Germany and the Federation of Industries in The Netherlands. However, the attempts faltered because of the security conditions the country has gone through since 1975. The society recommends that the projects listed below be included in the bill of priorities regarding the group countries' contribution to backing Lebanese products up and promoting them in their markets.

The holding of a specialized symposium or symposia in Beirut whose main topic will be "Marketing techniques in the group countries."

A study of the possibility of developing some Lebanese industrial products to conform to the requirements and demands of group markets. The society, in cooperation with the Unido organization and the Federation of Industries in The Netherlands, had already ventured on a corresponding project, whose implementation was halted by the events.

Participation in establishment of an industrial data center, bearing in mind that an integrated project is ready in this regard, between the General Department of Industry and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization.

Offering financial aid or aid in kind through this society to enable industrial organizations to take part in the specialized displays which are set up in market countries. It should be pointed out that the society has many encouraging experiences in this regard, of which we might mention in particular the aid the Exhibition Department in the city of West Berlin presented to take part in the "Partners in Progress" exhibit, devoted to the development of exports from developing countries to West Germany, as well as the aid presented to the society by the German Technical Assistance Organization to take part in the International Office Furniture and Supplies Exhibit set up in the city of Cologne in West Germany.

In addition one should point out that in the event you agree in principle to adopt these recommendations, the society is prepared to provide integrated projects for each of them and the means it considers available for putting them into execution.

In another context, we consider that it is necessary and appropriate to review Protocol No Two attached to the agreement regarding the definition of the concept "products of local origin." This is because the stipulated definition of local origin prevents many Lebanese industrial products from benefiting from this agreement. We consider that in this regard steps should be taken to form a technical committee in which the General Department and this society will take part to study Table A attached to the agreement, commodity by commodity, preparatory to entering into negotiations with market management to make the necessary modifications.

As regards your request that the society name a delegate to the Lebanese committee to the agreement, the society delegates the secretary, Mr Nabil al-Ladhiqi, to represent it in this committee.

Hoping that you will find that the abovementioned observations and recommendations merit attention, and stressing the society's permanent readiness to cooperate with you in view of the benefit this entails to the economy and its prosperity:

Please accept our highest regards,

/Signed/ President Fu'ad Abu Salih.

KORAN INSPIRES SAUDI RULERSHIP

Seoul THE KOREAN HERALD in English 23 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] Saudi Arabia is an Islamic monarchy which has been developing from monarchical to ministerial rule. The duties of the King-Imam are defined in the Shari'ah law (religious Islamic law as recorded in the Qur'an and interpreted in the Hadith, the Prophet's sayings) which recognizes the Imam not as an absolute hereditary monarch but as one who reigns in order to rule for the public goods.

The modern history of Saudi Arabia begins with the recapture of Riyadh by King Abdul Aziz ibn Abd ar-Rahman Al Faisal Al Saud in 1901. Other conquests followed and the Kingdom's international position was confirmed by a series of treaties, the most important of which was the Treaty of Jiddah signed in 1927, when Britain recognized the complete independence of the Kingdom in return for a pledge by King Abdul Aziz to abstain from attacking the Gulf Sheikhdoms which were under British protection. In 1932 the name Saudi Arabia was adopted.

The Royal Decrees, proclaimed in 1953 and 1958, which provided for a Council of Ministers and laid down its functions, may be regarded as the beginning of the "constitutional regime."

At the present time King Khalid heads the Government as Prime Minister; the First Deputy Prime Minister is Crown Prince Fahd, and Second Deputy Prime Minister is Prince Abdullah bin Abdul Aziz, who also has charge of the National Guard. The other members of the Council of Ministers — some of whom belong to the Royal Family — include the Ministers of Finance and National Economy, Justice, Defense and Aviation, Transport, Communications, Commerce, Industry and Electricity, Agriculture and Water, the Interior, Higher Education, Education, Information, Petroleum and Mineral Resources, Health, Labor and Social Affairs, Pilgrimage and Waqfs, Planning, Public Works and Housing, Municipal and Rural Affairs, and Foreign Affairs.

Ministers are responsible to the King. Almost all the apparatus of modern government--ministries, civil service, budgeting systems and so on--have been set up since 1955; in the early 1950s the Ministry of Finance was the only executive department of government. An independent judiciary and a modern judicial system were part of a reform program begun in 1962, but the first Minister of Justice was not appointed until 1970.

Although there are no elections and no political parties, Saudi Arabia has its own form of Islamic democracy. All men are regarded as equal, and differences are minimized between the rich and the poor, the governors and the governed. Ministers and officials keep their doors open so that anyone with any business can call in, without prior appointment, and be offered refreshment in accordance with Arab customs. A morning visitor to a senior official may find himself waiting with a large number of other callers; and since most of the official's morning may be spent receiving visitors in this way, he often needs to return to his office in the evening to do uninterrupted work when the office is closed.

An element of decentralization was introduced in 1963 when the country was divided into four provinces: Western (Jijaz), Central (Najd), South Western (Asir) and Eastern Province (Hasa), each with an appointed governor, or Emir, who is charged with local administration, maintenance of order and implementation of Shari'ah judgments. Various ministries have field offices, and the Ministry of the Interior is responsible for appointing the Emirs, but Saudi Arabia has no effective local government as the term is understood in Western democracies. The municipalities are completely dependent on central Government for funds. The people expect the Government to provide whatever utilities and services are necessary, and the Government accepts an obligation to do so. The only form of local election is for council members, called al-Majlis al-Batadi, who have a purely advisory function, their advice being directed to the chief municipal executive. A new "district system" of local administration was approved in principle by Royal Decree in 1963.

Oil provides nearly all the Government's revenue. There is no income tax. This dependence on oil is too great, and many of the Government's plans are aimed at diversification: by increasing the area of land under cultivation, settling the nomads, and stimulating industrialization.

The Ministry of Education with its sister Ministry of Higher Education together comprise the largest area of Government with over 50,000 administrators and teachers throughout the country, of whom 2,800 are employed centrally in the ministries' headquarters in Riyadh. Saudi students do not have to pay fees, and are given generous allowances to cover their expenses. In 1967 the Kingdom's third university, King Abdul Aziz University, was founded in Jiddah (the others are Riyadh University, founded in 1957, and the Islamic University, Medina, founded in 1961). The University of Petroleum and Minerals produced its first graduates in 1970. In 1975 King Faisal University was established in the Eastern Province. Riyadh's University of Imam Muhammad ibn Saud was preparing to include colleges of Arabic languages. Social Studies, and Shabic languages. Social Studies, and Shari'ah (Islamic law) and the High Institute of Judiciary.

The Civil Service Commission is responsible for staffing policies throughout the public service. Considerable efforts are being made in the direction of administrative innovation and reform, and impressive training schemes are being introduced to improve the structure and processes of public administration. The Institute of Public Administration, which was established in Riyadh by Royal Decree in 1961 as a semi-independent public agency, provides training and further education for civil servants, undertakes research, and assists government departments in reorganization and reform. It is probably the biggest and best equipped institute of its kind in the Middle East.

The Government's general objectives are to provide for national security and economic and social stability, and to raise the living standards of the people, while maintaining the religious and moral values for which the Kingdom, as the original homeland of Islam, is so well known.

The most difficult administrative problem is the shortage of skilled manpower. Although increased efforts are being made to remedy this it is unlikely that the Government will achieve its social and economic objectives with considerable help from non-Saudis, and such achievement may be at the expense of some of the religious and moral values which are an essential and distinctive element of Saudi society. It will be a matter of great interest to see how Saudi Arabia continues to develop towards objectives which anywhere else would be considered virtually irreconcilable.

EFFECT OF URBAN CULTURE ON ARABIAN SOCIETY STUDIED

[Text] In is the town culture--markedly Islamic--which brings together the various strands in Arabia society. to form a complex but harmonious whole, combining the virtues of Beduin life with merchanting acumen and a high standard of literacy and education.

The ancient records of Arabia show a society simultaneously at many distinct but interdependent stages of development. Beside the high civilization of the ancient South there is mention of Beduin, who do not, however, seem to play a role of any great importance. In early Islamic times, the interrelationship between nomads and townsmen is closer, each depending on the other for essential goods and services.

Although the early towns were organised in quarters corresponding to the tribal origins of their inhabitants, the conditions of settled life produced a culture superior to that of the tribes in the desert. One aspect of the rise of Islam can be seen as a clash between the aspirations of the town and the customs of the desert, where animism had been the principal religion. Many of the most important historical events during the first centuries of Islam must be interpreted to some extent in tribal terms, but there was a strong reaction by those who thought of the Islamic community as a whole.

The old poetry gives a good account of Arab life in pre-islamic times. It describes a heroic society demanding heroic virtues. The heroes are the symbol, the poets the voice, of their tribes.

It was the task of the poet, and of the invisible being who whispered inspiration into his ear, to act for the tribe in diplomatic negotiations, and to vanquish the opposing poet's familiar spirit. Before a battle he had to create martial ardor in his own people and weakness in the enemy. These incantatory poets verged on sorcery, which is doubtless why they are condemned in the Qur'an.

Some of the customs of early tribal society — such as the habit of exposing unwanted female children — were banned by Islam. Gambling and the drinking of wine were also forbidden, warfare between Muslims was condemned and revenge discouraged.

The old way of life still persisted to some extent, however. The Qur'an complains that the Beduin sometimes put tribal obligations above their duty to Islam. Over the centuries, urban society continued to develop while Beduin society altered very little. The economic changes of the twentieth century have now intervened. The motor car spelt the end of Beduin wealth based on camel and horse breeding, and the rise of the oil industry has forced them into new occupations.

There have always been differences between the southern and northern Beduin. Those of the south dress differently, and in their migrations do not live in tents, but merely hang a sunshade from a tree, or go between mountain caves and camps.

The Beduin of the north ride their camels on saddles, while the southerners ride without saddles and much further back. The northern Arabs are believed to have adopted the saddle for use in war against their powerful neighbors, because it allows another warrior to be mounted behind the rider.

The aristocracy of the desert are the camel-rearing tribes. The sheep-rearing tribes were thought to be of lower social standing but, as the nomadic way of life has been eroded, any social disadvantage has now virtually disappeared.

Individuals or groups have always attached themselves to powerful persons or groups to obtain protection and the sheep-rearing tribes may have been clients who were not granted full right of membership in the more powerful tribes with which they had associated themselves for protection.

The economic basis of nomadic life lay in the utilization of resources difficult to exploit. Many scholars believe that it was not the weaker members of the tribe who were forced out of the oases and fertile areas, but rather the strongest who launched themselves into the hostile desert.

It is clear that there are not and never were, nomads in Arabia who have had complete economic independence. They have always relied on the settled areas for an important proportion of their food.

H. St. John Philby has written of the unifying achievement of King Ibn Saud by the mid-1920s: "The Arabia over which he was to rule for nearly three more decades was united as never before: ...and the realm which he had carved out with his sword and his faith would descend intact to his successor. The vital factor... was his reputation for justice and resolution, which was seldom put to the test, and always vindicated when the rare need arose. For the first time in human memory Arabia had a single ruler whom all could, and did, respect." "The Arabia over which King Abdul Aziz ruled was united as never before... The vital factor was his reputation for justice and resolution, always vindicated when the need arose."

IRRIGATION PROMISES AGRICULTURAL BOOM

Seoul THE KOREAN HERALD in English 23 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Saudi Arabia is characterized by the vastness of its land area, which is more than 900,000 square miles, over 1.5 per cent of the world land mass. Under 0.2 per cent is cultivated and the total area utilized for agriculture and forests is less than three per cent. Huge oil revenues give the country a high income per capita rate, but the traditional agricultural sector is still dominant in terms of the numbers employed within it.

The tenure of agricultural land in the Kingdom is unlike that of other Middle Eastern countries. There is no concentration of ownership by a few rich individuals and the cultivated land is remarkably evenly distributed. Owner occupied agricultural holdings make up ninety-six per cent of the cultivated areas. The total area planted with field crops is over one million acres.

Vegetable crops are becoming very popular in villages close to urban markets where transportation is available for marketing. In tonnage, the biggest crop today is still dates. Saudi Arabia has between seven and nine million mature date palms--ten per cent of the world's palms. But the tomato crop and the water melon crop are already producing almost as large a tonnage. Onions are a significant crop, and other vegetables and citrus fruits are of increasing importance.

The smallness of the average holdings--2.5 acres in the mid-1970's-- naturally presented problems for agricultural development; but with widening horizons, more ambitious farming has led to the production of substantial crops of alfalfa (by far the largest annual tonnage), wheat and sorghum. The government-funded Agricultural Bank has played a major role in producing credit for the energetic farmer, while the Ministry of Agriculture has established country-wide training programs for farmers.

One of the earliest success stories was in the field of chicken and egg production, where — in a period of high growth in food consumption — national self-sufficiency was achieved by 1979, and prices had remained steady in a period of inflation. Milk production had been successfully pioneered (e.g. at al-Kharj) for public sale, and prospects for a national dairy industry looked decidedly promising. H. M. King Khalid himself was encouraging the development of modern methods for the production of camel's milk which, with a low fat content, is especially health giving. The Royal herd at Riyadh, for example, is being milked by specially developed milking machines. One characteristic of the she-camel in lactation is that it will not give milk unless it is living with its calf. The lactation period is shorter than that of the cow. But camels enjoy the inestimable advantage of maintaining good health in the extremes of temperature that prevail in Central Arabia.

About half, in value, of total food consumed is imported, and imports have grown more rapidly than domestic production. An opportunity to reverse the trend lies in the field of marine food, for which a growing demand offers and opportunity to increase food production with a minimum input of labor.

The most binding constraint on Saudi agriculture is imposed by water. The general availability of water in areas of cultivable soil is insufficient almost everywhere in the Kingdom: but studies conducted by the Ministry of

Scarce Resource Of Fresh Water Wisely Protected

Agriculture and Water have revealed that underground water resources are much greater than was believed ten years ago. Comparative studies of known water sources with recent national water consumption rates demonstrate that they should be sufficient for tens or even hundreds of years. Surface water is intermittent and primarily available in the southwestern highlands and coastal areas, brackish water is abundant and seawater is available for desalination in unlimited quantities.

It has been found that the eastern, northern and central areas of the Kingdom are compiled of sedimentary rocks containing water-bearing formations which vary in quality and quantity. Such sedimentary deposits cover two-thirds of the country. Most of these deposits are represented by sandstone or limestone, which hold a considerable amount of ground water.

These aquifers contain water more than thirty thousand years old. Some formations are near the surface but some are very deep, so diving and pumping equipment are necessary to extract the water. Some of these formations are not rechargeable, so water resources, like oil resources, are diminishing. According to studies made by consultants, twenty-eight important sedimentary aquifers have been discovered. Artesian water, once tapped, reaches the surface under its own pressure, often at a high temperature, from the heat of the earth's core.

As for surface water, Saudi Arabia is the largest country in the world without rivers. The annual rainfall does not exceed 100 mm, although the southwestern parts of the country are affected by monsoons and the annual rainfall average in these areas might reach 500 mm. In general, rainfall is sporadic and variable. There can be periods of drought of up to seven years, great humidity, high evaporation, strong wind effects and rapid run-off floods.

The accumulation of salts in the soil is one of the permanent problems facing irrigated agriculture. All surface water contains some soluble salts in negligible amounts, but after several years of irrigation a harmful accumulation appears. Salts found in irrigation water remain in the soil, while water itself is lost by evaporation and drainage. Irrigation water is used in Saudi Arabia with a salt content ranging from one thousand to more than four thousand parts per million (ppm). Generally 3,150 ppm is considered the maximum for the safe watering of any plant; so salinity is a severe problem.

Irrigation agriculture has been and will continue to be by far the largest user of eater. The demands made by agriculture on water supplies reflect crop needs and also determine minimum production and maximum cost levels. The depth of ground water in the Kingdom varies from a few feet to three thousand feet. It is estimated, however, that there is enough water, in rainfall and below ground, for the area of cultivated land to double in the short run.

The main means of combating the constraint imposed by scarcity of water are by dams, wells, water-towers, draining and long-distance piping. Fifteen dams are already built, of which the largest, across the Waid Jizan in the South-Western Tihama region, provides irrigation for 70,000 hectares. The greatest of the irrigation and drainage schemes — to rid the soil of its salinity — is at Hasa. The reclamation of land has led to a marked rise in the number of sheep raised, to, which the Faisal Model Scheme bears striking witness. Here, a total of 3,600 hectares have been reclaimed, and the sheep population reached 33,000. In due course, the Faisal Model Scheme was to be converted into a private commercial enterprise which a group of Saudi and foreign firms were to operate.

The final protection against lack of water is the sea. With the increasing refinement of methods of distillation, a pipeline system is to link the capital with Jubayl on the Gulf. Meanwhile, a National Water Policy has been established, providing for the enforcement of a National Water Code, to sharpen public awareness.

The three main objectives for agricultural development are to raise the per capita income and improve the welfare of rural people, minimize the Kingdom's dependence on imported food and release surplus labor for employment in other sectors.

Fifteen research stations and demonstration farms have already been established and there are sixty-two extension units throughout the country. A government subsidy on fertilizers has encouraged their use, and insecticides and pesticides are being distributed. An Agricultural Bank has been set up, and has continuously expanded interest-free credit to farmers. To encourage the adoption of modern technology and to increase farm production, the government pays subsidies on selected imports and products.

The leaders of the country are committed to the processes of agricultural development. They recognize its connection with the maintenance of political stability.

AL-ASAD'S OFFICER CHOICES VIEWED

Tel Aviv BAMAHANEH in Hebrew 20 Aug 80 pp 30-31

[Article edited by Hayim Raviv: "The Officers of the Syrian Army"]

[Text] Syria's President Hafez al-Asad is now facing a new problem in addition to all his other internal problems, which is likely to give him many headaches, namely, the appointment of the next chief of staff of the Syrian Army. The question is whether a professional soldier is preferable to a political one, or whether a representative one should be picked. The new chief of staff will greatly influence the molding of the image of the army's officers in the future.

We do not have the space to discuss all the characteristics of the Syrian officer. We will only mention some typical landmarks in the course of the average regular army's officer's term of duty, and we will dwell on the role of the ruling Ba'ath party and the Alawite minority in shaping the present image of this officer.

The present chief of staff, Lieutenant General (Ahmad) Hikmat Shihabi, who has served for 6 years, is a prototype of the representative officers in the Syrian Army. Shihabi, a Sunnite, was picked for his post, as was Talas, minister of defense, in order to compensate the Sunnite majority and blunt the edge of possible feelings of discrimination. In effect, this chief of staff does not have real authority. He is mainly a representative and ceremonial figurehead. Thanks to his past as an intelligence officer, Shihabi is helpful in fighting the violent opposition of the Muslim Brotherhood.

Chief of Staff Shihabi is one of the three top officers in the Syrian Army who symbolize, especially for the Syrian officer, the encounter between professional quality and political power. The other two senior officers are the assistant chief of staff, Maj Gen Col (Liwa) Ali Aslan and the commander of the "Defense Units," Col Rifat Asad.

The assistant chief of staff represents the professional officer. He is a skillful officer who advanced persistently and systematically through the ranks on his own merit, doing a variety of assignments in the field and at general staff. Rifat Asad, on the other hand, represents the political officer. Rifat, who is the president's brother, heads the unit which is responsible for protecting the regime. This officer, who has decorated himself with a doctorate from Moscow, has served in the same capacity all along and has advanced rapidly through the ranks.

The common denominator for both officers is their Alawite origin, which is also the origin of most of the leaders of the regime and the president. Beyond that they are quite different. Ali Aslan who served in 1976-78 as commander of the Syrian forces in Lebanon, is considered a professional in today's Syrian Army, and the political leadership recognizes his achievements. Despite his membership in the Alawite minority and the fact that he is a loyal party member, Ali Aslan has not been close to the political arena, and his promotion is due mainly to his performance. This respectable professional image has not gone unnoticed by the majority of Syrian officers.

Rifat Asad, the president's brother, on the other hand, is hardly ever photographed in uniform, and insists on being referred to as "Doctor-Member of the National Leadership of the Ba'ath party," without any mention of his military rank. From the beginning Rifat served as commander of his brother's bodyguard (even before he took power). Under his command this unit grew to gigantic proportions (it became recently a regular armored division and was given the best means of combat). The task of this unit which has a great many Alawites and members of Asad's family, is to defend the regime from a coup. It is well known that during Rifat Asad's term of duty his authority has been used to obtain political objectives and favors for those close to him. His military rank is also unusual--he is now commanding a division-size unit which according to regulations calls for a brigadier general (Ahmad).

Strangely, he and his officers make sure they maintain ranks lower than the usual--lieutenant colonels and majors serve as brigade commanders, while majors and captains serve as battalion commanders, despite the size of the forces under their command. This may be due to their desire to maintain a separate position within the army. Because of their political image and their many privileges, Rifat and his men have become the most hated unit in the army, feared by all.

An Open File--And a Secret One

The Syrian Army, which was established in 1946 when Syria became an independent country, has undergone many radical changes over the years. The frequent coups and political upheavals which took place during the 50's and 60's, did not leave the army untouched, certainly not the officers. Only during the past decade has the Syrian Army enjoyed a measure of stability, under Hafez al-Asad's regime. This too has changed somewhat in the past year.

Unlike the 50's and 60's, when most army officers were engaged in intensive political activity, their involvement today has been reduced significantly. Moreover, the political activity within the army has been channelled through established political structures which are separate from the civilian structures. This development undoubtedly has had a growing salutory effect on the professional level of Syrian Army officers. But it seems that even today the Syrian officer is preoccupied with the question of the importance of the political factor in his professional career in the army, especially in light of the struggle of the regime with the violent Sunnite opposition emanating from the Muslim Brotherhood.

Any highschool graduate in Syria who wants to serve as an army officer has to volunteer beforehand for several years of service in the army. After a series of tests the candidate enters the military academy in Homs (central Syria). The cadets take a 3-year course which includes general military training as well as professional training in the various training centers. An officer's course diploma is legally considered the equivalent of a bachelor's degree. Upon graduation the cadets become first lieutenants (Malasm Ul) and are placed in different units, according to the professional training. (Only academic officers who do 2 and 1/2-years of compulsory service become second lieutenants.)

In principle, the advancement process of Syrian officers through the military ranks consists of constant and changing elements: A period of 4 years between ranks; field assignments for certain periods of time; professional courses like company and battalion commander course; followed by command and staff course. The body which controls appointments, transfers, advancement, and demotions is called the "Officers' Committee." This committee includes most of the administrative heads of the general staff, but their decision must always be approved by President Hafez al-Asad.

The career of a Syrian Army officer, from the moment he arrives in his unit and gets his first assignment, is documented in two parallel files--an open one and a secret one. This is the symbolic start of a military career in the Syrian Army, since from here on out the officer will be tested on two levels:

The professional level--his skills, his performance, and his ability to carry out professional assignments.

The political level--his loyalty to the heads of the regime and the principles of the ruling Ba'ath party.

In every case the political consideration is decisive in the appointment of officers and their advancement (intermediate ranks and up), in accordance with the "scale of loyalties" of the following order of preference:

Preference A--Family ties (the families of Asad and those close to him).

Preference B--Sect membership (the Alawites, who are today the ruling sect in Syria, and are only 12-13 percent of the total population).

Preference C--Party affiliation (the Ba'ath party).

It follows that the Sunnites, who are the majority sect, are discriminated against, although quite a few Sunnite senior officers stand out in representative posts, such as the minister of defense, the chief of staff, the commander of the Syrian Air Force, and several unit commanders.

A Professional or a Political Chief of Staff?

Aside from the issue of advancement, it appears that the working conditions of Syrian officers today are relatively easy: a work day of only 7 hours, except for field units which are busy operationally, namely, in taking positions in the Golan Heights front, or in the "Arab Deterrent Forces" in Lebanon. In such units too, officers get many leaves during calm periods. The salary of officers, who are considered state workers, is above average, and they enjoy tax exemptions and aid with housing and the education of their children. No wonder that after their first term of service most officers extend their commitment for many additional years.

The average Syrian officer is undoubtedly impressed by the professional success of Assistant Chief of Staff Ali Aslan. But he is also aware of the power which political officers like Rifat Asad enjoy. This symbolic encounter between the two foci of power--the political and the professional--has great influence over the considerations of the army officer as to his future career. The answer to this question may be reflected in the person of the next chief of staff (the present one has served 6 years, and it is time for his replacement).

The question which arises is: will the Syrian Army be headed by a professional officer, like Ali Aslan, who seems the likely candidate for thi this post, or will it be a political officer like Rifat Asad?

There is only a possibility of compromise, by appointing a senior "representative officer" like the present chief of staff, in order to prevent further complaining by the Sunnite officers and the Sunnite population. In such case Rifat Asad will continue to head his private army and his sect's forces which will defend the regime within the official military system, while Ali Aslan will continue to serve as the highest professional officer in the army.

As in the past, this time too everyone is looking to "Comrade Commander," President Hafez al-Asad, since he alone can decide, as he continues to create the delicate balance between the various centers of power which surround the leader of the Syrian regime.

This delicate balance is bound to break down as soon as Hafez al-Asad leaves power, which he has held since 1970. This eventuality is more likely today than in the past, since his regime is in constant decline.

When will this regime come to an end and who will follow it--the answer to these questions also holds the key to the image of the Syrian officer in the future.

UAE PAPER CALLS FOR GULF SUMMIT CONFERENCE

GF151842 Al-Shariqah AL-KHALIJ in Arabic 13 Oct 80 p 1

[Editorial: "An Immediate Gulf Summit Is a National Historic Task"]

[Excerpts] Now that the Iraqi-Iranian war has lasted so long, the situation in the Gulf and the Arab region is leading politically, economically, militarily and psychologically toward a real calamity. It will reach one if immediate and effective action is not taken to stop this situation in preparation for reasonable and wise arbitration for the sake of the primary interest and through guidance by principles and national traditions which have been enriched by Islam and which accelerated the spread of Islam.

During these days of the bitter Iraqi-Iranian war, the observer of the Arab situation in general and the Gulf situation in particular sees clearly that the savagery and squalor of war machinery, the psychological and media warfare couldn't defeat the wisdom and reason that are characteristic of the Arab nation and were achieved admirably through practices associated with Arabism and Islam on the way to the establishment of states, respect for man and contribution to the civilization of man.

When peace, goodness and understanding are called for to rule Gulf relations these days, it is not a mere political exercise or simply a call that can have no part in the Arabs' battle against their imperialist and Zionist enemies. It is rather a call based on close knowledge of the true nature of this nation, which has witnessed conflicts and crises and learned, from this knowledge, that dialog leads to consensus on the common goal. It was the departure from peace and guiding dialog which led to the situation from which the Arabs and Muslims are now suffering and of which the Iraqi-Iranian war is an example. When dialog and the inclination to peace were lacking, the law of war ruled the two neighbors: Iraq and Iran. And when the rift dividing Iraq and Iran began to widen, it engulfed all the Arabs. The picture is very clear: It is between pro-Iran Arabs and anti-Iran Arabs, Arabs against non-Arabs, anti-Muslim Arabs and anti-Muslim Muslims.

It is a pitiable situation indeed. The losers are the Gulf countries, Arabs and non-Arabs, and the sole winner is the enemy of the region, world imperialism and its world Zionist ally. The conflict is giving the enemies of the Arab nation, of Arab-Islamic consolidation and of anti-imperialist and Zionist struggle a splendid, attainable opportunity.

A Gulf summit conference is urgently needed. We firmly believe that the leaders of the region's countries, if they don't take such a step, will miss a historic opportunity granted by destiny to achieve an exceptional national feat. We call for such a Gulf summit soon with the sole objective of stopping the disaster and keeping it from turning into a river of blood which will never dry. Such action is within the framework of true, constructive and comprehensive understanding in the interest of the nations and peoples of the region and their historic relations.

TOP PALESTINIAN LEADER ANALYZES STRUGGLE WITH ISRAEL

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 16 Sep 80 pp 8, 9

[Report on interview with Abu Iyad by Salih Qallab: "A Talk With Abu Iyad on Concerns About the Palestinian and Lebanese Situation"]

/Text/ Talking with Salah Khalaf (Abu Iyad) on the concerns and worries of the Palestinian revolution is always significant, by virtue of his status in the FATH command, his longstanding roles in dealing with the most delicate, sensitive issues, and his position in the Palestinian revolution as a whole.

People who know Abu Iyad, and people who have followed the political tasks he has assumed close at hand, will always remember a string of difficult missions. In Amman Abu Iyad was always the figure of national unity. At the fourth FATH conference he played a prominent role in unifying the ranks of the conference and enabling it to rise above the numerous difficulties facing it. In Lebanon he was the person assigned by the FATH command to hold the dialogue with the authorities and try to find ways out of crises, starting with the famous Shatura agreement and proceeding up to the latest meetings with chiefs Sarkis and al-Huss.

In this dialogue AL-SAFIR held with him after his return from a long trip, in which colleagues Balal al-Hasan, Sa'd Mahyu and Salih Qallab took part, Abu Iyad was as usual clear in answering all questions.

In talking about the Lebanese arena, Abu Iyad did not belittle the responsibility for security transgressions, but called for bridges of trust to be extended among the resistance, the Lebanese authorities and the deterrence forces, and for the transgressions to be remedied by mutual coordination, considering that the security issue is an indivisible one.

In talking about Arab circumstances, he was also explicit in calling for the establishment of solid, strategic relations with Syria, eliminating all the possibilities for doubt which arise from time to time.

In talking about Palestinian conditions, he stressed the need to hasten to convene the Palestinian National Congress lest its constant postponement affect the solidity of internal relations.

In talking about international Palestinian activity, he was very precise in defining the need to continue political action toward Europe and similarly to put a ceiling on this movement and to remove illusions on any anticipated European position independent of American policy.

What imparts greater importance to conversation with Abu Iyad is the fact that in his positions he expresses not just his personal convictions but also the directives of the Palestinian command, from the viewpoint of one who is knowledgeable about the various, indeed sometimes contradictory, information, decisions and viewpoints. Herewith is the text of the conversation.

Holding the National Congress

/Question/ The National Congress was to have been held at the start of September 1980. We know that there are some organizational issues which require previous discussion, but to what extent is it correct to state that the postponement of the council was made in anticipation of the American elections and the European initiative?

/Answer/ With regard to this matter, I must point out that the National Congress, at its meeting in June, formed a committee of secretaries general under the chairmanship of our brother Abu 'Ammar to agree to all details bearing on the Executive Committee and some issues which are hanging, on grounds that the political program is approved by the National Congress.

This committee was to have met last 18 August but it appears that the Palestinian command's preoccupation with holding the Jerusalem committee in Morocco prevented this meeting. I believe that there is no political reason in the background for postponement of the National Congress as far as either the American elections or the European initiative go.

Probably it is the failure to state the reasons for the postponement of the National Congress meeting that has led to these ambiguities and stirred up these rumors. The failure to state them has also led some detachments to raise an outcry, and I say they have the right to do so, because postponements without explanations certainly lead to stirring up doubts.

I stress here that we now need a congress meeting more than in any past period, and I also stress that if there is no longer any justification to postpone it, I believe it should be convened at the start of next month.

Before that, however, it is necessary to reach agreement over the following basic issues. First, the detachments must meet and agree on the form of the Executive Committee, because without agreement on this issue we will go through the same painful experience we went through at the previous National Congress meeting.

Second, it is necessary to reach agreement on a minimum national unity, militarily and financially, especially since the Palestine Liberation Organization's national fund is now able to cover all the detachments' requirements and it is not compelled to go to one Arab country or another and hold out its hand for money.

I believe that it is now time for the budgets of all detachments of the resistance to be under the Liberation Organization--strengthening national unity and making us discuss other subjects besides money with the Arab countries.

Third, it is necessary to observe sudden political changes, and we should promulgate a plan for dealing with them in the light of the political program which has been approved, although in circumstances which differ from the current one in some particulars.

In other words, before the National Congress meeting we must agree on the style of confrontation and on what our role is and what the role of others in it is. We must set out a plan and mobilize the Arabs around it, because the Arabs, as has been clear so far, do not have any confrontation plan. Therefore we must explain the role of oil in the sturggle and the role of military power in the struggle. I state that before convening the National Congress we must agree on political movement, if we are not able to agree on the abovementioned points.

Some of us are now opppsed to political movement on the European level, and some are unreservedly for this movement. Therefore, before the National Congress convenes, it is necessary for us to agree on this point at least, because once agreement is reached on these issues the time for convening the congress will not be important, whereas if we do not agree on a political position and the state of the council remains hanging, Palestinian national unity itself will be affected.

I now recommend that the committee assigned by the Central Council meet to discuss matters most frankly in order to take a stand on the abovementioned issues and determine a firm date for the congress meeting.

Finally, I believe that linking postponement of the congress to the American elections or the European initiative is not right. Proof of that is that as long as it is not possible to bind the Palestinian leaders to it outside the congress it will not be possible to bind them to it within it.

The Limits of the European Initiative

/Question/ Is the goal of European activity the belief that the existing balance of forces in the region will permit successful official diplomatic activity, or is it just an issue of political activity to gain support from public opinion?

/Answer/ The issue about which most uproar has revolved is that of the European initiative, although the matter is very plain and simple.

Before talking about the initiative, we must ask the following:

Must we become immersed in what is going on in Lebanon and content ourselves with talking about political victories?

Will we just be content with military action and not turn it into political positions?

We must view political activity in this framework, whether it is toward Europe or in another direction.

I believe that through this movement we will have to achieve gains for our people's cause, however they differ, however small they might be.

Here, however, one must distinguish between moving politically for the sake of new gains for our people and betting that a movement toward Europe may produce an acceptable solution for our cause.

This type of bet will certainly lead to illusions and mistakes, because the Palestinian, Arab and international balances of forces will not allow for thought of a reasonable solution through the current European movements.

Therefore one must just view political movement from the standpoint of attaining media and political gains in the European camp.

As the regards the European initiative, on which talk is taking place and toward which we observe some movement, I can state in advance that that initiative is an extension of American diplomacy and an extension of Washington's movements.

Europe is not able, and does not dare, to move alone without a signal from the American White House.

Even as far as the two major countries in Western Europe go, that is, West Germany and France, Germany is to be considered a political and economic colony, even a military colony, of the United States.

As for France, in spite of the fact that it is trying to adopt an independent position, this position has not yet reached the point of liberation from the zone of American influence, especially since the American administration, headed by Carter, has laid out a red line on the Middle East, and that is Camp David. Carter considers that any diminution of Camp David is tantamount to a challenge to his foreign policy and the successes it has realized during his term.

Neutralization of Oil

I believe that some Arabs do not want to use oil in the struggle, either by threatening to cut it off, by controlling its prices or selling it to friendly countries at reduced prices. Therefore they have resorted to backing the European initiative in order to cover their positions and say "We are in the struggle, and Europe, through our efforts, has started to tilt toward the Arabs."

I can give an example of that in D'Estaing's visit to the region, in which as the price for his statements on the Liberation Organization and the Palestine cause he reaped great gains for his country and the European states, although in fact he brought nothing new in spite of all that was said about his progressive stand in this sphere.

I state that we must not fall prey to the illusion that there is a European initiative. It is true that we hear some promises from one European official or another, but these will all remain just promises, and all European initiatives will remain mere movement within the American orbit.

/Question/ What about the relationship between the European initiative and the American elections?

/Answer/ I believe that Washington's view on the European Middle East iniative will crystallize after the American elections, on grounds that the Europeans will then demand that the American administration show what limited formal concessions it will accept regarding Camp David.

As for the European initiative assuming a form independent of the American contest, I state that that is impossible, and, even if we concede that it is possible that a third force could appear in Western Europe, alongside the American imperialist camp and the system of Socialist states, this would be considered a revolution in international politics which is not likely to happen now.

Europe--and the Arabs

/Question/ But in the light of all this, isn't it necessary that the resistance distance itself from the Arab countries accepting the European initiative.

/Answer/ To clarify what you say, one must recognize that there is a crisis of confidence in our relations with the Arab bodies involved whereby our movements and positions are interpreted in an incorrect fashion.

Therefore I say that we must describe to certain Arab countries, and our partners in the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front, the true nature of our movement toward Europe, which does not go beyond a specific political framework and does not reach the point of an illusion that this movement will yield a solution.

Moreover there is another matter which must be noted and that is that some statements issued by some Palestinian officials are sometimes not marked by precision and therefore some Arab brothers, in light of the crisis of confidence, give these statements interpretations which are remote from the true nature of the real Palestinian positions.

Our brothers must understand the importance of our political movement; if we abrogate it it will be as if we have abrogated our existence, but we must clarify the dimensions and limits of this movement and the extent to which we are betting on it. At that point I foresee that the lack of confidence will disappear and will be replaced by a common coordination aimed at deepening the contradictions between Israel and some European forces, inside or outside power, and expanding the scope for recognition of the Liberation Organization.

/Question/ However, the issue of the European initiative is not confined just to the Liberation Organization. There are other Arab countries, like Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Iraq, which are enthusiastic about this initiative.

/Answer/ I mentioned earlier that some Arab countries, not necessarily the ones I mentioned, believe that euphoria over the European initiative might exempt them from their responsibilities for setting forth oil as a weapon in the struggle.

New statements are being made about the failure to use oil in the struggle, on the excuse that this method is repugnant to civilized human taste and so forth. People make these statements in order to remove oil from the struggle and separate economics from politics, although, if we recall the history of the Arab struggle with Zionism we will find that Israel launched its wars against us at times when it was being stifled by economic crises and the crisis of unemployment.

Ceausescu's Activity

/Question/ Ceausescu, we have learned, advised some Palestinian officials to exploit the present situation and get what can be gotten, on the pretext that the coming years will witness a new international detente and will witness a decline in the degree of the world's need for oil as a source of energy.

/Answer/ What can be gotten? At a time when Israel is even bargaining over autonomy, which does not go beyond a mission to implant the occupation on our territory and does not respond to the slightest national demand of our people, and has adopted a decision to incorporate Jerusalem with the objective of further diligent activity to lay its hands on our territory and our people?

I differ with Ceausescu in his viewpoint. He thinks that it is possible to divert the Palestinian people at this stage through some placebos.

This reminds me of the attack launched against us to make us tentatively accept autonomy. Some of our friends advised us after Camp David tentatively to accept this until we strengthened ourselves, and then demand new gains.

This type of step could be acceptable in the case of another pattern of imperialism, but, as regards the Israeli presence on our territory, that is a colonialist imperialist presence and I stress that acceptance of autonomy will be tantamount to a step toward strengthening and implanting this presence at the expense of the rights and the existence of our people.

Sliding into this kind of step will result in joining al-Sadat, who is no longer able even to extricate himself even partially from being bogged down on the road to final treason.

/Question/ In the light of your talk about the oil issue, do you not believe that it is the resistance's duty to set out a plan to tell the Arab masses ways and means for using oil, such as reducing production, raising prices, linking political negotiations to oil issues, and commercial and economic matters related to them?

/Answer/ I believe that Arabs, even those who have not yet reached adulthood, have started to realize the value of oil in the struggle. We realize that some Western European countries are resorting to a rapprochement with us because they are eager to exploit our influence on the Arab situation to obtain specific gains in oil.

Therefore I consider that the Arab oil states must follow a plan to explain the value of oil in the political struggle.

Here I can give an example. Before the Suez war, which 'Abd-al-Nasir waged, the Arabs did not exactly realize the value of the Suez Canal; they just knew that it was a simple waterway.

However, following 'Abd-al-Nasir's nationalization of the canal and the 1956 war, the strategic importance of this important waterway was driven home to the Arabs.

Now the Arab nationalist oil countries must take a stand like 'Abd-al-Nasir's so that the importance of this vital element in the struggle the Arab nation is embarked on will be clear to the Arab masses.

However, I would like to state bluntly that people have started to feel that the Arabs do not want to bring oil into the struggle, for numerous reasons, foremost fear of America, American occupation and confrontation with America.

I say that this fear is unjustified, because, if we put barrels of gunpowder under the oil wells and threaten to set them off in the event of any threat to infringe on the sovereignty of a given Arab country, no country in the world, America of any other, will dare even think of occupying or invading an Arab country.

Threats to the Gulf States

/Question/ As long as you are talking about oil and threats of occupying oil fields, this reminds us of what is currently being said to the effect that the gulf is on the verge of tensions and rifts, and what is said about the role of Palestinians in these tensions.

/Answer/ We have been hearing these rumors for a long time, and I believe that their purpose is to get people to take the issue of American bases in the gulf area for granted, especially since some emirs and sheiks reject the presence of such bases and the Arab masses there are fighting against American hegemony in the region. There is also an Arab rejection by some countries of these bases.

This is one reason, and a main one, but a second reason is to put some wedge between the Palestinians and expatriate Arabs in the gulf area on the one hand and the original inhabitants of the region. Therefore some people are fabricating individual problems and security problems and labelling Palestinians with them to justify banishing and deporting them, in order to make it easy to implant an American military presence in the region.

In this regard, concentration is now being made on Kuwait.

I might mention that I met the Emir of Kuwait 6 months ago and a conversation took place on the Ka'bah incident. We said that some people from a number of Arab countries were among the people who caused that incident but there were no Palestinians among them, and we stressed that that was proof that it is not necessarily true that Palestinians participate in every problem occurring in a given area.

After that meeting, in which the Emir of Kuwait was won over to our viewpoint, two incidents took place:

First, the hijacking of an airplane by a Palestinian who was working in Kuwait. In spite of our condemnation of this act, which is not justified by the oppression and bias this Palestinian faced, we are amazed at the media attack which was launched against the Palestinians in Kuwait, which ignored all their contributions to the development of this fraternal country and service to its people.

Second, the explosion in the AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM newspaper. I can assert to you that when I heard this news, I was outside the Arab area, and it only occurred to me that it was Israeli intelligence, or that of some other hostile body, that carried out this operation.

However, when I returned I was surprised to hear that some Palestinians had been arrested on the charge of involvement in this operation, which we condemn and deplore, as we do not permit anyone connected with the Palestinian revolution, closely or remotely connected with the Palestinian revolution, to venture on such operation.

In this sphere, I am amazed, in spite of the competent bodies' knowledge of the nature of our positions on such matters, that defamation campaigns are being carried out and that talk is being made of an open trial. I have even started to feel as if the objective is to fabricate problems between the Kuwaiti government and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

We are not against having any Palestinian who has done wrong brought to trial, but we are against defamation and against the fabrication of campaigns against Palestinians which we fear will move into offices, schools and factories and could lead to unpleasant things.

Any Palestinian might err. We are not angels. However, for this noise to be stirred up on this matter at a time involving issues which bigger, more serious Arab bodies stand behind, at a time when we have refrained from embarrassing the government of Kuwait on the issue of the assassination of 'Ali Yasin, this means that the intention is to deport Palestinians from Kuwait so that it may fall prey to American bases. I am not saying that we are the ones protecting Kuwait, but I say that the goal in expelling our people from Kuwait is for Kuwait to create a justification for American intervention.

We Are Not a Party to an Axis

/Question/ There are people who say that FATH is working out of an alliance with Iraq, that this alliance has opened the way for the European initiative, and that it has opened the way to the special relationship with Jordan and led to touchiness between you and Syria.

/Answer/ The subject of an alliance is not at issue, because alliances have meanings which are different from the existing situation. What I would like to say is that our relations with Iraq improved recently, having been almost cut off before Camp David.

I stress that our real alliances are expressed through the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front, because as far as we are concerned that represents a position which is more advanced than other Arab positions. It was our hope that Iraq would join this front, in view of the weight it accounts for on the Arab stage.

However, for reasons which concern it, it has not joined this front. Therefore, because we are pursuing a platform which holds that it is necessary to deepen bonds with any country standing against Camp David, we are concerned about good relations with Iraq.

We have heard of these rumors, which might perhaps have been repeated by some Arab officials. I have not met with Syrian officials for a while but some of them might be repeating talk of this sort.

Therefore, from a position of responsibility, I deny that the Palestinian revolution is a party to an Arab axis working against any given Arab body. As I said, our basic position is in the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front, but that does not prevent us from having good relations with other Arab parties working against Camp David.

Ultimately I must state that Syria always represents along, and, as far as the current period goes, all fighting forces must stand alongside the current Syrian regime to confront the assault which is being made on it because of its positions against Camp David.

Then one must point out that some forces, in order to drive wedges between us and Syria, are anxious to spread rumors about a Palestinian-Jordanian-Iraqi-Saudi security alliance and talk about a Saudi-Jordanian-Iraqi-Palestinian axis.

Once again I say that the goal of these rumors is to crush the prime element of perseverance; their goal is to crush the firm relations between Syria and the Palestinian revolution and the Lebanese national movement.

Our Relations with Jordan Embarrass Us

/Question/ It is clear that relations with Jordan constitute a basic matter of dispute among the detachments of the resistance. The prevailing view is that Jordan is exploiting this dialogue with you for its benefit, is moving toward Europe, and is establishing a Ministry of Occupied Territory Affairs in order to attain the demand for a united kingdom.

/Answer/ To be fair I must say that the dialogue with Jordan was approved by the Palestine National Congress, under the pressing need to expand the scope of contacts with our people in the occupied territories and to create political and military positions for ourselves in Jordan.

Our aspirations were to create a firm base in Jordan to confront the enemy, but the Jordanian regime limited the scope for cooperation to the occupied territories and did not allow any cooperation outside this framework.

Most bluntly, I say that the fact that our relations with the Jordanian regime take this form is causing us much embarrassment. At a time when Palestinian officials are going to Jordan and sitting down at the negotiating table with Jordanian officials, Jordanian intelligence is carrying out broad house searches and arrests against our Palestinian and Jordanian people.

It is necessary to point out that arrests of our people in Jordan are continuing in spite of all that is said about the releases which have taken place.

It is true that some arrested persons have been released, but in exchange for these releases intelligence has arrested many many times more people than were released.

In the last 2 years Jordanian intelligence has broadened the scope of its activities against our people. The file on this is in front of me. They have not stopped infiltration campaigns against us and have not stopped cursing us while Palestinian leaders are holding dialogues with their officials in Amman.

I believe that if the Jordanian regime's intention is sincere, it will permit broader relations than cooperation on certain matters concerning the occupied territories.

If the Jordanian regime's intentions are sincere, it will allow the Palestine revolution to mobilize the masses in Jordan and agree to a form of cooperation, even partial, regarding military activity in the occupied territories.

To confine relations just to methods of distributing aid in the occupied territories, I believe that a committee much lower than the command level is able to carry out that task and as a consequence I say that the Jordanian regime is the only one benefiting from the relationship with us. It is moving in the political and foreign contexts under the cover of mutual understanding with the Liberation Organization although it is not even giving the resistance the slightest rights from these relations.

I further stress that it is necessary to specify a position and review relations with the Jordanian regime in the light of the National Congress resolutions.

If the Jordanian regime is to remain the sole beneficiary of the relationship with the Liberation Organization by obtaining Arab funds or by moving politically to attain a united kingdom, I say the matter requires urgent review, because for relations to continue without rules will result in a disaster.

/Question/ We have heard that there has been a freeze on your part on joint committees with Jordan.

/Answer/ Matters have not reached that point. However, there is a stand on our part in the light of the experience of the past 2 years, because we do not agree that a Palestinian leader should go Amman and not be allowed to visit the al-Wahdat camp. Nor do we agree that Jordanian intelligence should continue its campaigns against our people and the staffs of our revolution.

The Camp David Predicament?

/Question/ Much talk is going on about the Camp David predicament, and, through that, the predicament of the Egyptian regime. First, do you really believe that Camp David is in a predicament or is what is called the predicament just the implementation of a separate peace between Egypt and Israel, which is the essence of Camp David?

Second, what is the meaning of bringing down Camp David? Does that mean making al-Sadat retrench or bringing down his regime?

/Answer/ Let me go back a little, that is, back to 1970, and point out that a Palestinian resistance delegation met with the late leader Jamal 'Abd-al-Nasir. At that time he showed us documents on international offers to return all of Sinai to Egypt in exchange for an end to the state of war with Egypt.

At that time, 'Abd-al-Nasir told us, "They want to swallow the Egyptian fish, so that it will be easy for them to swallow the other Arab fish." Therefore, in view of the occurrence, I state that al-Sadat realized and declared before embarking on Camp David that that solution would be an Egyptian-Israeli one and could be nothing but that.

However, in alienating Egypt, al-Sadat has had to tell the Arabs that what he was reaching was not a separate Egyptian Israeli solution. Therefore I am sure that all the talk that went on, before and after Camp David, on a so-called Egyptian-Israeli dispute over the Palestinian issue, is only part of the same process of alienation.

I stress that if Israeli had not paid part of Sinai as a price for the Palestinian cause, the Arab cause and Egypt's relations with the Arab nation, it would never have withdrawn from a square inch of Egyptian territory.

Proof of the validity of what I am saying is that these complications that talk has been going on about, before and after Camp David, reached a climax, then disappeared all at once, and the separate solution has continued on its way unobstructed.

This applies to some matters related to autonomy, the settlements and even the issue of incorporating the city of Jerusalem which al-Sadat tried to exploit in order to portray himself as concerned for the Palestinian cause and the sacred shrines of Moslems, which he is still relinquishing and considering not to be a basic problem obstructing the resumption of negotiations.

This is as far as the first issue goes. As regards the second issue, bringing about the collapse of Camp David, I say that persons who view this issue in terms of betting on the chance that al-Sadat will draw back are far removed from reality, consciously or unconsciously.

al-Sadat went on to Camp David determined not to draw back from any step he took. Anyone following al-Sadat's statements since the signing of the Camp David agreements must notice that this man considers that he has entered history through them.

Therefore the simplest obvious facts stress that bringing Camp David down means bringing al-Sadat down, that there will be no bringing down Camp David without bringing down al-Sadat. In this sphere one must remind people that the Egyptian people, who have fought tyrannical rulers with caustic jokes, always reached the peak of tension and rose up against these rulers with blood and iron. This is what happened in the era of 'Urabi and what happened in the July revolution under the command of 'Abd-al-Nasir, and this is what will happen against al-Sadat, in spite of the gloom surrounding Cairo now.

The Resistance's Predicament

/Question/ A final question on this subject: it sometimes seems to the observer that the Palestine cause is realizing great successes on the international level, while it faces further frustrations on the Arab level, and in this sense faces a strategic predicament. Do you agree with this view of things?

/Answer/ The cause of the predicament is not the fact that we are living in a small area which is Lebanon; rather, it may be ascribed to a general Arab deficiency and to general frustration, which makes it mandatory that we set forth a broad scale plan of action which in the first place will observe Palestinian-Syrian relations and consolidate them on a firm basis transcending minor points of touchiness.

I say that it is necessary that there will be a lack of complete congruence between our positions and those of our Syrian brothers, for a simple reason, which is that they are an existing state with all its assets and we are a revolution with its special, objective circumstances. However, this must not result in a lack of trust or a lack of coordination in everything.

I say most bluntly that if we do not arise, we and Syria, and hold hands to face all the challenges that come up, the Arab situation will proceed toward further deterioration and regression.

Therefore we must build firm, solid, clear relations which are not influenced by reports, whispers, plots or attempts at distortion and confusion.

Again I stress that we, along with Syria, will be able to dispell Arab deficiencies, will be able to disrupt the balance of forces, and will be able to extend into a heartland which reaches Iran and the Arab west.

In this regard, I also say that it is necessary to strengthen the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front and strengthen the trust of the Arab masses, lest they continue to view its action as just that of a body issuing statements with no scope for carrying them out in actuality.

/Question/ Some days ago Yasir 'Arafat called for an Arab Defense Council meeting to discuss the dangers of the Israeli aggressions against southern Lebanon. So far we have not noticed any Arab response. Frankly, we say that if he had gone to any international body it would not have delayed in responding to the call. This is the predicament.

/Answer/ Our brother Abu 'Ammar called for an Arab summit before that and the Arabs did not respond. He called us to a meeting of foreign ministers of Arab countries before the convening of the United Nations session, and the Arabs still did not respond and the issue was confined to a meeting at the delegate level in the international organization.

This issue does not concern Abu 'Ammar as a person; rather, it concerns the Palestinian revolution, because Abu 'Ammar is the commander and spokesman of this revolution. However, this state of affairs leads us to an important matter, which is that some Arab countries are no longer afraid of the Palestinian revolution.

Therefore I say that these Arabs must know that the Palestine cause has become an international one, as well as being the everyday cause of every Arab, and that the voice of the Palestine revolution, as a consequence, cannot be bought by money. We need money, this is true, but I say in a loud voice that we need political positions.

Let me be more explicit. This indifferent position toward the Palestine revolution is caused by the alienation which sometimes seeps into Palestinian-Syrian relations, because Syrian-Palestinian relations are firm and clear and will impose on every Arab a blood tax and will bind them to positions on the Palestine cause.

The Unity of Syria and Libya

/Question/ The latest important Arab event is the declaration of a merger union between Syria and the Libyan jamahiriyah. It is true that the ordinary citizen wonders about the Palestine revolution's position on this union.

/Answer/ The climate of the Syrian-Libyan union brings us back to the climate of the fifties. However, as much as we are happy and support, back and bless this union, to that extent also do we fear for it, from a position of solicitude.

Fear for the union arises from a glance at its importance. The linkup between Damascus in the Arab east and Libya in the Arab west is not a simple matter which hostile forces are standing and watching.

Then I say that our Arab masses are not able to endure a new setback in the context of this nation's historic goal. Therefore, just as we say that it is not permissible for the Palestinian resistance to be defeated, so do we say that it is not permissible for this union to fail, whatever the reasons might be.

I say also that it is necessary for the Palestinian resistance to take its stand on this union and it is necessary that at its core it not take the form of statements and "dazzling displays" but take a true combative form and serious revolutionary solidarity.

This solidarity will make all the Arab nation and the Arab masses join this union, which is to be considered a ray of hope for them and is to be considered a great historic achievement.

Israel's Threats

/Question/ Fear for the union, in the light of Israeli statements and movements, causes us to wonder about the possibility that an Israeli military blow might be directed against Syria and the Palestinian resistance.

/Answer/ If what is meant is an Israeli aggression against Syria, or a Sadatist aggression against Libya, I can say that these aggressions will strengthen the union and will move the two countries toward further solidarity.

However, the source of fear for the union is domestic enemies, not foreign ones. An attack by the foreign enemies will give the union its value and will give it its strength.

The Lebanese Explosions

/Question/ There is talk about domestic explosions in Lebanon, in addition to anticipated aggressions against the south. To what extent can one consider this talk valid?

/Answer/ The talk about explosions is not new. We spent the last year in an atmosphere of explosions, and talk about explosions; in reality the gravity of the anticipated explosions started to assume real dimensions after the 7 July operation in the eastern section.

This operation united Israel's agents and consequently united Israel's schemes. In my opinion, this operation constituted the start of the rallying of forces under the command of a single decisionmaker linked with Israel.

There are people who say that this operation was linked with a more distant framework, that is, the United States, but in this regard I believe that the Phalange Party and Israel are playing their own game this time, in the sense that there was no current American agreement, although the scheme basically was drawn up by the American administration in 1975 at the time of Kissinger and that administration is still carrying it out in stages.

Therefore Bashir al-Jumayyil resorted to this operation to gather power in his hands. The recent clashes in al-Hadath between the Phalange militia and the army, in addition to two previous attempts to assassinate Sarkis, even managed to prove his intentions to the legitimate authorities.

Anyone reading Bashir al-Jumayyil's statements in the wake of the Ba'abda clashes will fully confirm his intentions and his party's intentions toward the legitimate authorities in whose name they have immersed Lebanon in a cauldron of death and destruction over the past 5 years. If Rashid Karami or other Islamic leaders had made these statements, the world would have risen up in arms and stayed up.

What gives Bashir al-Jumayyil's statements regarding the army a dangerous dimension is the fact that because of specific circumstances he is able to penetrate the army and is able to do what he wants in its ranks.

In the light of what the Phalange Party has done and has been doing since the 13 April events, proceeding from the Ihdin massacre, to the 7 July operation and the latest skirmishes with the army, I believe that the Phalange is carrying out a plan which aims not just at dominating the area but also encompasses all of Lebanon.

The talk about liberating Lebanon from what is called the Palestinian and Syrian occupation is the index of the coming drift toward an explosion.

Here we must observe that when it talks about settlement, adopts a viewpoint based on the lack of a likelihood that the Phalange Party solution will be created to the Middle East crisis. Therefore it says "We will accept the Palestinians in Lebanon, but without arms."

Thus it is clear that the Phalange Party is carrying out an Israeli scheme aimed at stripping the Palestinian people of their arms and consequently at imposing settlement on them by force.

Therefore we appeal to those who are talking about settlement to cast a real glance at the scheme the Phalange Party is carrying out in coordination with Israel, aimed at settling the Palestinians in Lebanon after the liquidation of their revolution (which is their instrument for returning to their homeland) and after their arms have been snatched from their hands.

One must observe that the Israelis, and the Americans also, are now talking about the need to settle the Palestinians in Jordan. In reality they mean Lebanon, because the Palestinians in Jordan have been considered Jordanian citizens, especially since they were stripped of their weapons following the September events.

Therefore the conspiracy the Phalange Party is now carrying out is to continue fighting the resistance under the slogan of stripping it of weapons, in preparation for applying the settlement in practice.

The Palestinian resistance has declared, and I declare now, that implementation of settlement will in practice begin the moment the rifles fall from the hands of the Palestinian fighting men, because these rifles are what are fighting settlement.

It appears in the light of all that is going on that the scheme requires the fabrication of clashes with the resistance in Beirut while Israel moves from the south, so that together they may comprise a pincers,strangling the Palestinian resistance and stripping it of its arms, after which the settlement will occur.

On this occasion I would like to say a word, which is that the Phalange Party, which has committed massacres to impose its dominance over the area, consists of the sons of the cream of the Maronite families and will never hesitate at any moment when anyone who just thinks of standing up to its hegemony extends his hands to other areas.

At some stages it has deluded some Islamic leaders into thinking that the Palestinians constitute a burden to them, thereby exploiting some of our excesses to win these people over by the slogans of liberation they raise.

I stress that those who have dared to strike against Sulayman Franjiyah and Camille Chamoun will never hesitate to belittle any Lebanese personality, whatever his religious position, and his social leadership.

The Phalange Party is the party of a person with a fascist platform who inherited it when it was an athletic team and continued to strengthen it until it became an armed force aspiring to dominate all of Lebanon and to see no one on this land but itself.

Again, I give as testimony to what I say what happened to Camille Chamoun at the hands of the Phalange, although he is trying to rid himself of Bashir al-Jumayyil's grip by attacking the Palestinians and the Palestine revolution.

Bashir al-Jumayyil "shone" at the game of chess, and it appears that Israeli intelligence found in him the person who could be driven by his ambitions to implement all its plans.

Concerns about the Transgressions

/Question/ There is an issue which has kept coming up over the past years: the security issue. The Lebanese citizen is suffering from these conditions and sometimes expresses his concern through stands against the resistance. The question is, why isn't a solution found to this issue, which is considered the basic concern that deprives citizens of their sleep?

/Answer/ If we start with the security issue when the Arab deterrent forces came into Lebanon, we will find that the agreement called on these forces to assume the responsibility for security in all areas, or at least in our areas.

What happened was that after the Bayt-al-Din conference--and all of us know the nature of its resolutions and the positions of the parties to these resolutions--the deterrent forces started to relinquish security responsibilities on behalf of the Lebanese authorities, in accordance with their desires.

The deterrent forces' patrols at the beginning acted in participation with the Lebanese security forces, backing them up and enabling them to impose their dominance. Here I must point out that we in the national movement and the resistance refused to take part in controlling security outside our areas, on grounds that this was the task of the deterrent forces which are the legitimate Lebanese forces.

The fact is that one cannot parcel out security responsibilities, because this kind of parcelling out will lead to instability as a result, since each party will throw the responsibility on the other party.

Once again I point out that security responsibility lies on the shoulders of the deterrent forces and the shoulders of the Lebanese security forces. This is our opinion in the resistance and the national movement.

I wonder why the Lebanese security forces do not exercise their responsibilities, although we in the resistance and the national movement would welcome this sort of conduct.

This year we have held a series of meetings devoted to security matters, in the light of a broadening scope of complaints about thefts, aggressions and the imposition of detention. We agreed to the formation of a security committee, and this committee managed to get in movement, if only in a limited manner, at the beginning, but its activity soon was paralyzed after it had come to a standstill, impotently, in the face of the question of what entities ought to have been arrested, especially as far as the Lebanese are concerned.

The national movement has insisted on the fact that the deterrent forces and the Lebanese security forces are the body in charge of this matter. Therefore, contact was made with the Lebanese authorities and the deterrent forces to discuss the matter, but, in spite of that, things remain as they are.

Here I would like to mention that the felons and crooks in the western section number no more than 140. We can arrest them in 48 hours and rid the people of their evil. However, the problem is that these people are mixed--some are Lebanese, some are Palestinian, and the majority of them do not live in the Palestinian camps, which prevents us from taking a decision to arrest and impose the punishments on them they deserve.

We got in touch with the deterrent forces and agreement was reached with them on arresting them, but this agreement has not been carried out yet, and the situation remains as it is.

Therefore I repeat what I said before, which is that the deterrent forces and the Lebanese security forces are the ones that bear the responsibility and therefore we must cooperate with them and offer them information on people who seek defense and protection from given organizations for bodies.

For the sake of the citizens, we must also hide displays of weapons and close down some offices. However, these issues will remain partial and limited in their results unless a radical treatment is made in cooperation among the three parties--the resistance and national movement, the Lebanese authorities, and the Arab deterrent forces.

We recognize the gravity of the responsibility for security conditions and we are therefore continuing the effort to deal with this problem. Here I should not miss the chance to mention that we reached agreement with Dr al-Huss to set aside a prison in Beirut so that these criminals and felons may be rounded up and put in it, to be released only after their punishment period has ended. This is the opposite of what happened in the past, when we would imprison someone committing a violation and hand him over to the Lebanese authorities, then be surprised the next day to see that he was free and out on his own.

Support for the South

/Question/ The security issue in the south goes beyond the issue of violations and brings up the matter of support and confrontation. Here also Lebanese citizens complain bitterly. How do you envision dealing with this issue?

/Answer/ As far as the south goes, and the fact that Lebanese citizens are continuing to endure suffering by being alone in confronting the enemy, without any support or backing, I hold the Arab countries without exception responsible for this.

The Arab countries are withholding support and backing from the people in the south, on the pretext that there are no authorities to receive support money. We say that this pretext is unacceptable and unjustified, because the Lebanese authorities are present. Let these monies flow to them if the Arab countries concerned do not trust other bodies.

Lebanese citizens in the south are supposed to feel that a hand is extending them support, so that their perseverance may be strengthened and their will to confront the enemy may be strengthened.

This is as far as support goes, but as regards the security situation in the south, we in the resistance consider that the solution to this matter must come about through coordination and cooperation with the Lebanese authorities. The Lebanese authorities must open their hearts to us and we must open our hearts to them so that a solution may be found for all the problems facing them and the citizens.

On this occasion I must give thanks to Dr Salim al-Huss, who, through his sincere Lebanese nationalism and his clear national commitment, has managed to create bridges of trust between the resistance and the Lebanese authorities and has managed to implant the beginning of a cooperation based on equality and mutual understanding which we hope will continue and develop.

Here I state that the time has come to carry out a peaceful dialogue in which all forces will participate to create a formula for coexistence which will enable the citizen to be free of the things he faces every day in his life and aggressions against his property.

/Question/ By this approach do you mean the Lebanese authorities?

/Answer/ Yes, the Lebanese authorities. Lebanese authorities which forswear the influence of gangs connected with Israel. These gangs on whom the authorities' decisions sometimes appear to depend.

/Question/ A few days ago a conflict arose between you and the Lebanese authorities, since the Foreign Ministry considered the invitation 'Arafat sent to the Joint Arab Defense Council to be tantamount to a violation of their powers, and they issued a statement in this regard.

/Answer/ The reason for this, as I said, was the lack of dialogue and coordination. If there had been coordination and dialogue, these types of problems would not have occurred.

Regarding the episode you mentioned, what I would like to point out is that our brother Abu 'Ammar's invitation absolutely does not conflict with the powers of the authorities. The Palestinian forces in the south are exposed to the process of being ground down and are exposed to extermination attempts. Therefore 'Arafat has the right to invite the Arabs to bear their responsibility toward what is going on in the south.

More than that, doesn't any Arab country that belongs to the Arab League have the right to call the Arab Defense Council to meet over southern Lebanon?

What is going on in the south is a responsibility borne by all the Arabs, and when Abu 'Ammar calls on the Arabs to bear their responsibility, he is not detracting from the powers or the sovereignty of the Lebanese authorities.

Then why doesn't Fu'ad Butrus take the initiative to call for such a meeting, so that 'Arafat can come and the Liberation Organization can come and strengthen and back up the Lebanese invitation?

/Question/ Is there any specific initiative regarding the subject of coordination with the Lebanese authorities?

/Answer/ There is no specific initiative. However, I call for coordination because of its importance and necessity.

The Tripoli Events

/Question/ There are ambiguous circumstances surrounding the recent events in Tripoli. Would it be possible to shed some light on these events, in view of the measures which have been taken?

/Answer/ When I spoke of the need for security coordination between us, the authorities and the deterrent forces, I meant that if this kind of coordination had occurred we would not have suffered from what happened in Tripoli and elsewhere.

As regards what happened in Tripoli, it appeared that people outside the law gathered to commit a political act of a security nature in order to strike out at Syrian-Palestinian relations and stir up factional grudges.

I should not miss the opportunity to mention that some Lebanese official agencies played a bad role in this type of atmosphere.

The Tripoli events began with the imposition of forcible detention, the robbery of citizens and aggressions against their property; then they escalated, assuming a political character which assumed the nature of factional grudges, leading to acts of capricious slaughter and aggressions against innocent people, without justification.

Col Muhammad Ghanim and our brother Abu al-Hawl were able, in their missions, to eliminate the consequences of this fabricated discord but they were not able to eliminate the causes of it; this may result in a resumption of these incidents at any moment.

Therefore we must continue to coordinate and deal with this discord in order to pull it out by its roots and put an end to it.

I believe that as far as the resistance, the national movement and the deterrent forces go, the fact that the higher command was absent from Tripoli is one of the reasons why it was possible for the discord to develop on its own and enabled the gangs to give their conduct a political character.

I believe that if the higher command were present in the north, alongside Rashid Karami and other national leaders, these security shocks would not have occurred.

/Question/ Through the latest skirmishes in al-Ghaziyah, the nightmare of the southern suburbs has returned again, again stirring up talk about relations between the Palestine resistance and the Amal movement.

/Answer/ When Imam al-Sadr raised the slogan "arms are the clothing of man," his goal was to fight the Zionist enemy, defend the south, stand alongside the resistance and support and back it.

Anyone reviewing Amal's premises will find no narrow factional Shiite demands among them. Amal's premises have all been national and domestic demands concerning all the Lebanese people and all the Arab people.

However, what truly cuts one's spirit is that after the disappearance of Imam al-Sadr, some leaders started trying to divert Amal from its national course and its patriotic platform. Some people tried to fabricate contradictions between it and the Palestine resistance. However, for the sake of the truth and fairness, one must point out that the higher command has made maximum efforts to prevent these attempts from succeeding.

I can point out that I met with some medium-level leaders in the Amal movement about 4 months ago and some of them asked me questions which were far removed from the nature of interaction between friendly forces, such as "Do you pray or not?" "Why isn't the Palestinian revolution an Islamic revolution?" and "What are your relations with Libya? with Iraq?"

I believe that people who know the true nature of the Palestinian revolution must not ask it this kind of question, because they at least know that one-quarter of our Palestinian people are Christians.

Once again, I say that this kind of question is a departure from the field of well known fraternal interaction between the Palestinian revolution and the Amal movement.

In any case, new commanders were recently elected to the Amal movement and although I have not met my brother Nabil Barri for a number of years I know him from before as a patriotic person who holds progressive national positions.

What bodes well, now that the new commanders have assumed the keys of matters in Amal, is that the skirmishes have stopped and the situation has started to return to the way it was before, as far as relations with the Palestine resistance go.

However, we must be sure that not everyone who is hostile to the national movement and the Palestine resistance must of necessity be a member of the Amal movement and that the motive for entering Amal must not be enmity toward the Palestinians and the national movement.

I believe that personnel of this sort are deliberately infiltrated into the Amal movement; the higher command in the Amal movement must be aware of them and rid the movement of their problems and evils.

I can bluntly state that some Lebanese official security agencies and some Arab intelligence bureaus are trying to pervert the Amal movement and create misunderstandings between it and the Palestine resistance and the Lebanese national movement.

However, this must not mean that everyone in the Amal movement is suspect.

Amal is full of chaste, sincere, fighting staffs. The small number of people with tendentious ends makes the possibility of getting rid of them easy--very easy for sincere fighting leaders.

The Phalange and the Bologna Explosion

Abu Iyad mentioned that the Palestinian resistance has evidence and documents confirming that the Phalange was involved in the explosion which took place on trains in the Bologna station in Italy, resulting in the death of about 80 people, in addition to the wounded and serious material losses.

The Palestinian leader stressed that the resistance's information confirms the existence of camps in the eastern district training fascist party groups from Western Europe and some other countries, in addition to sections for training groups of forces committing sabotage against some Arab countries.

KUWAIT, TUNISIA SET UP JOINT DEVELOPMENT BANK

Paris AL MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 6 Sep 80 pp 54, 55

/Article: "Plan To Establish a Tunisian Kuwaiti Bank To Develop the Tunisian Economy"/

/Text/ On the sidelines of the meetings of the Arab Economic Ministerial Committee held in Tunisia to follow up on preparations for the anticipated Arab economic summit in Jordan, the Kuwaiti minister of finance, 'Abd-al-Rahman Salim al-'Atiqi, made a statement after he came out of a special meeting with the Tunisian president, Habib Bourguiba, in which he pointed out that the focus of the meeting with the Tunisian was "a review of the existing good relations between the two countries, especially in the sphere of economic cooperation, which we hope will develop and flourish to the benefit of Tunisia, Kuwait and the Arab countries."

It was possible to consider this statement a kind of acceptable flattery by the minister on his emergence from the meeting with the president of a country which has no dispute with his country. However, people observing the development of Kuwaiti investment policy in general, and those who have been following its investment policy programs carried out in Arab countries in general and Tunisia in particular, consider that these flattering statements reflect the vivid reality of investment relations between Kuwaiti and Tunisia, and prove the positive developments with which these relations are proceeding--relations which might in the foreseeable future witness growth and expansion either as part of previous trends in investment relations between the two countries or as part of new trends which will be crystallized in new projects and institutions in the process of preparation or study.

The fact is that al-'Atiqi has expressed all this in other statements which he made prior to his departure from Tunis in the wake of the conclusion of the Arab ministerial committee meetings.

On the one hand, al-'Atiqi expressed "great satisfaction over the course of bilateral economic and investment cooperation between Tunisia and Kuwait," pointing out that "the success of this cooperation may be attributed to a number of factors, among them the good results that have been attained so far and the success of the projects that have been carried out in its context."

On the other hand, al-'Atiqi expressed his hopes for broad horizons for this cooperation, referring to a new step which will follow the ones that have taken place so far, by broadening the scope of cooperation between the two countries, especially by establishing a Tunisian-Kuwaiti development bank.

Nothing in this statement goes beyond the facts. It is supported by the actual steps which have been taken in the sphere of investment cooperation between Kuwait and Tunisia, and its expansion in the future is in accord with one of the basic rules of Kuwaiti investment policy in the Arab countries. These are the details:

So far one can state that investment cooperation between Kuwait and Tunisia, within the context of the Tunisian economy, has taken place within four frameworks, which are independent and integrated, each involving a number of various projects, although their common denominator is the fact that they are a troup of tourist projects, including real estate projects with a tourist character and tourist objectives.

Relying on the official data available on these projects, one can present them as follows:

The first framework, within the Tunisian-Kuwaiti Development Group. This group was established with a capital of 20 million Tunisian dinars (about US$55 million), 60 percent belonging to Kuwait, whose share is broken down among the Ministry of Finance (49 percent), the Kuwaiti Real Estate Investment Group (6 percent), and the Social Insurance Fund (5 percent), while the remaining 40 percent is distributed among the Tunisian government and other Tunisian banking and financial institutions.

Although the bylaws of the group stipulate that in the first stage just half the value of the shares each side owns be drawn up, Tunisia so far has paid only 1,419.75 Tunisian dinars of what it owes for its shares (that is, less than 40 percent, for which the sum due totals 4 million dinars). Kuwait has paid everything it owes, 6 million Tunisian dinars. This Kuwaiti position has been one of the causes contributing to stimulating the activities of the group, which was stipulated to have an investment budget of 46.5 million Tunisian dinars (more than $127 million), including loans of about 27 million dinars and capital of about 18.5 million dinars, provided that the investment budget be managed in a manner which will give implementation priority to the six following projects:

1. The Andalus homes project, consisting (in the first phase) of hotel apartments with a capacity of 140 beds, to rise in the second stage to 240 beds, in addition to 32 villas, five of which are to be built to test the market.

Costs of this project, which covers a territory of 19 hectares, are estimated at 8.25 million Tunisian dinars. Construction of it started in July 1978 and it is expected that it will be delivered in full in the last month of this year, 1980, that is, without a delay beyond the specified date.

2. The al-Najmah Tourist Complex project, established on territory estimated at 2 hectares in area in a spot of the town of Sousse looking out over the sea, which also consists of tourist apartments with a capacity of 213 beds and a commercial and recreation center containing all the facilities and services a tourist project requires. The costs of the project have been estimated at 4.5 million dinars; it is expected that this will rise following the issuance of agreement by Tunisian authorities to the addition of new apartments with a capacity of 100 beds. So far work on the first part of the project has been finished, and it is expected that it will be wholly completed at the end of the current year. One should realize that construction started in July 1978 also. Construction of some new apartments might be delayed until the second month of 1981.

3. The Abu Nuwas project, consisting of a scheme to improve and develop the hotel known by that name, which is located in the suburb of Qamart.

The improvement is aimed at raising the level of the hotel to four-star status while it is expanded to accommodate 200 beds with hotel apartments accommodating 254 beds over an area of 40,000 square meters at a total cost of 5 million Tunisian dinars (about $14 million). Work on construction of the project started in the first month of 1980 and it is expected that it will be completed before the start of summer 1981.

4. The al-Mashtal Complex project, which might be considered the most important tourist investment project in which Kuwaiti capital is participating in Tunisia.

This project, situated in an area overlooking the Belvedere Gardens in the Tunisian capital, consists of a three-star hotel with a lodging capacity of 800 rooms with hotel apartments accommodating 246 beds, in addition to 1,000 square meters for a company office building, a commercial and sports complex, and halls for movies, meetings and receptions.

The importance of this project also lies in its large costs; its total budget has been estimated at about 11 million Tunisian dinars (more than $30 million). Work is now underway to assign an architectural consulting firm to perform design work, supervision and engineering studies on the project and set out a detailed specific implementation schedule.

5. The Tunis Palace Hotel project, lying in the heart of the capital, Tunis, covering an area of 2,000 square meters. The project consists of renovation and repair on the existing hotel by that name so that it will accommodate 380 beds while retaining its rating at the three-star level. A technical and financial study at estimated costs of 3.34 million dinars has been prepared for it. It is expected that the development plan will be received from the consulting firm assigned to do it at the latter part of this year, provided that construction on it start in the first half of 1981.

6. The Qamart Hotel project, whose goal is to develop this hotel and raise its level to a four-star class with a lodging capacity of 300 beds, with bungalows with a capacity of 100 beds, gaming halls, a marine club, a recreation and sports center, and the services and facilities necessary for a first class hotel. The bodies concerned with the project have made big strides in studying the bids they have received from consulting firms to study the project and to program construction of it, as well as the bids they have received from hotel management companies to run and manage the hotel.

The second framework in which investment cooperation between Tunisia and Kuwait takes place is the Real Estate and Tourist Financial Company, known in short by the name KUNAT.

The company's capital has been fixed at 7 million Tunisian dinars (a little less than $20 million). It specializes in financing commercial real estate tourist projects in Tunisia. The company has actually taken part in financing a number of projects which enter into the context of its concern and area of specialization.

The third framework does not differ from the previous two but is confined to the el-Mahdia Tourist Development Company, which is now active in the first stage of a project calling for construction of a three-star hotel with a lodging capacity of 500 beds and hotel apartments accommodating 200 beds and supplementary recreational and sporting facilities, in addition to a commercial center for the project annexed to it. A start has been made on setting out an economic feasibility study for the project and the financial study bearing on it.

There remains the fourth framework, which consists of the el-Tewfiq Sanatorium being constructed over an area of 24,000 square meters. This consists of 20,586 square meters of seven-storey buildings containing 116 beds set aside to provide advanced, progressive medical treatment in the Tunisian capital, thus saving a large portion of the numerous funds Tunisians spend for treatment outside the country.

The sanatorium has actually entered the practical operating stage following the celebration of its inauguration in December 1979, after it had been provided with modern management and advanced treatment facilities, including radiation treatment.

The capital of the company which owns and operates the project has been set at 2.5 million Tunisian dinars, of which Kuwait has contributed 20 percent (500,000 Tunisian dinars) through the Kuwait Unified Real Estate Investment Group, in exchange for a further 20 percent from Shaykh Salih Kamil (a Saudi businessman), 30 percent from the Islamic Development Bank in Jiddah, and 30 percent distributed among Tunisian banks, insurance companies, and private and government firms and Tunisian individuals as well.

It is clear from the preceding review that some of these projects have actually entered the stage of commercial operation and that some of them are on the verge of being completed, preparatory to operation, while others are still in the process of being outfitted, prepared or even subjected to preliminary study. Therefore it might be difficult now to judge the degree of productivity of these projects in full although that has not prevented Min al-'Atiqi from ruling that they are successful from a number of angles coinciding with the announced and implicit rules of Kuwaiti investment policy:

The first angle: this is the general legal and legislative framework in which these projects lie. It is a framework of joint cooperation, joint participation and joint ownership of investment projects. While Tunisia needs financing for its investment projects and economic sectors, Kuwait needs to invest its money in projects with a reasonable advanced yield which will reduce its reliance on oil resources and help it to endure depletion of oil in the future. There is a great deal of equitability and justice in commitment to this rule to the point where it makes these projects mutually beneficial, now and in the future, to both parties, who cooperate and participate in carrying them out on behalf of economic and social development in the Arab world.

The second angle: this is the relative speed with which these projects are carried out. This may be ascribed to the general legislative framework of the Tunisian economy, which is founded on the liberal system, which attracts capital and offers it a suitable legal, human and executive context, especially in terms of transcending a large degree of the red tape and bureaucracy rampant in other economic systems which require Kuwaiti and non-Kuwaiti money but do not open suitable systemic or executive averages through which it can flow into their sectors.

The third angle: this is that all these projects are involved in the tourist sector or in the real estate sector supplementary to it; this sector is continuously prospering in Tunisia. Since these projects have the effect of increasing the degree and scope of Tunisia's capacity for increasing tourist activity in its territory, this state of affairs has the effect of assuring Kuwaiti investors that their money is being put into projects which can grow and develop with a good yield which may rise.

From this angle, Kuwaiti finance minister 'Abd-al-Rahman Salim al 'Atiqi's talk about the project to establish a Tunisian-Kuwaiti development bank becomes more than just an idea or a hope--it is a step capable of rapid implementation which will allow investment cooperation between Tunisia and Kuwait to make a quantum leap, moving it from the framework of the tourist sector to a broader one which might include the productive agricultural and industrial sectors which have already attracted various European organizations (refer to AL-MUSTAQBAL AL-IQTISADI, No 16, 14 August 1980, pages 6, 7). If Kuwaiti capital enters these fields, that will have the effect of realizing mutual benefits for Tunisia and Kuwait, by accelerating the growth rates of the productive sectors in the Tunisian economy and enlarging the fields for feasible permanent investment for Kuwaiti money.

COMMITTEE FOR DEFENSE OF SYRIAN POLITICAL DETAINEES CABLES IRAQ

JN101456 Baghdad Voice of the Masses in Arabic 1200 GMT 10 Oct 80

[Text of cable sent to Iraqi President Saddam Husayn by the Committee for the Defense of the Political Detainees in Syria--date not given]

[Text] We, the Committee for the Defense of the Political Detainees in Syria, greet you and welcome your great move to regain and liberate our Arab nation's territories which have been usurped by the ancient and modern racist Persians, who have been blinded by rancor against our nation. We strongly condemn the stand taken by the regime of sectarian repression in Syria toward this move. The sectarian Syrian regime's cowardly stand has affirmed its connection with and allegiance to the racists, the imperialists and the Zionists.

Oh struggling President, this stand by the Syrian regime is hardly surprising, since it was this regime which sold the Golan Heights, approved the shedding of the blood of the freedom fighters in Tal al-Za'tar and spilled the blood of our strugglers in Syrian prisons. In the latest massacre in the history of Syria, the regime executed more than 1,000 political prisoners in Palmyra Prison. The regime shelled the great towns of Aleppo, Hamah and Dayr al-Zawr. The regime is currently launching a war of extermination against our young men in Syria. However, our great people will not condone these actions and will struggle until they have carried out their honorable duty of overthrowing the sanguinary regime and bringing Syria back to its pan-Arab line.

We send greetings and admiration from our strugglers and youth to you and to Iraq's Arab army, which is waging its battle of honor. May you remain, Mr President, the knight to lead our nation. We congratulate you on raising high the banner of liberation.

IRAQI ORGANIZATION AT JORDAN-PLO TALKS--Persons returning from Jordan said yesterday that a representative of the "Iraqi Liberation Front," 'Abd al-Rahim Ahmad, is participating for the first time in the talks of the Joint Jordanian-PLO Committee, which are currently taking place in Amman. To date, only FATAH representatives have participated in this committee's discussions. The talks were boycotted by representatives of the PLO's Rejection Front, of which the Iraqi Liberation Front is a member. It now appears that with the tightening of relations between Iraq and Jordan, and the latter's participation in the war against Iran, Iraq has decided to dispatch a representative of this organization to the committee's discussions. IRAQI MOVEMENT TELEGRAM TO AL-QADHDHAFI--Tripoli, 5 Oct (JANA)--Colonel al-Qadhdhafi received the following telegram from the Movement of the Iraqi People: Brother, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, leader of the great Al Fateh revolution: Finally Saddam Husayn regime revealed through its conduct the contradictory nature of its slogans. At the time when he is raising the banner of liberating Palestine, he keeps his troops busy with a side fight, and mobilizes them for invading Iran, the enemy of imperialism and Zionism. As far as the Iraqi armed forces are concerned, they have no interest in fighting against Iran, but they have an interest in fighting against the Zionist enemy. The repressive Iraqi Government forces the army to wage its war through threats of death and imprisonment. It is your nationalist and humanitarian responsibility to take a firm stand in urging Iraq not to distract the Iraqi forces from the fight against their primary enemy which is (Israel), and to form a joint front with Iran against the front being forged by the Iraqi regime in the area. PALESTINIAN LEADER ON AMMAN TALKS--Amman--Khalil al-Wazir (Abu Jihad) has told AL-QABAS that his talks in Amman were successful and fruitful and that they gave new impetus to Jordanian-Palestinian relations. He said he and the Jordanian prime minister discussed measures that have been completed so far in supporting the steadfastness of the occupied territories and also Israeli threats to prevent the entry of steadfastness funds to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Abu Jihad said that he discussed with the commander of the Jordanian armed forces, Sharif Zayd ibn Shakir, plans to develop the Palestine Liberation Army [PLA] in Jordan and turn it into a brigade. He said that the Jordanian Government has accepted the transfer of 200 Palestinian soldiers who are Jordanian citizens to the PLA, as well as the transfer of 1,000 Jordanian Palestinians on the completion of their military service. MAURITANIA DEPENDING ON ALGERIA--Lt Col Ould Haidallah, Mauritanian chief of state, ended his 4-day visit to Algeria last Wednesday, 1 October. If they have disengaged themselves from their alliance with Morocco, into which President Ould Daddah had led them, the Nouakchott leaders state nevertheless that they do not want to fall under Algerian control. They maintain a prudent attitude and will refuse to recognize the SADR despite pressures exerted on them, especially by the POLISARIO who still have not freed all the Mauritanian prisoners they are holding. However, Mauritania is counting on Algerian cooperation to overcome its economic difficulties. [Text] [Paris LE MONDE in French 3 Oct 80 p 8] 9341

LAWFUL WAYS FOR ISLAMIC BANKS TO MAKE PROFIT EXPLORED

Sharjah AL-KHALIJ (BANKS, INSURANCE, INVESTMENT SUPPLEMENT) in Arabic
22 Jul 80 p 13

[Article by Muhammad Badawi: "Means of Capital Investment by Islamic Banks"]

[Text] "Islamic" banks in the modern age got their start in the United Arab Emirates. The Dubai Islamic Bank was the pioneer among Islamic banks. Within a few years, this type of bank spread throughout the Arab world--to places such as Sudan, Jordan, Kuwait and Bahrain. In Egypt right now there are three Islamic banks. Also, one of the large banks in Egypt has set up a special branch for Islamic business transactions. It has also set up a special section in each of its branches for Islamic business transactions.

These moves by the banks are an implicit acknowledgement that they had been conducting their business in a way which is not in conformity with Islam.

In Europe, there is actually such a thing as an Islamic bank in Luxembourg. And in Pakistan, Iran and the Moslem countries of Asia, there is a continual effort to establish Islamic banks and to conduct banking transactions on a basis which is in conformity with the principles of Islamic law.

Every day, Islamic banks receive numerous letters from all parts of the world asking questions and requesting explanations about how Islamic banks operate. Islamic banks now are also continually invited to participate in the founding of new Islamic establishments.

Whoever has been following the growth of Islamic banks, can have no doubt that within a few years the entire world will be blanketed by an integral network of such banks.

For this reason, it is important that many studies be made. The experience of those who work in Islamic banks and the results of their unique and fortunate experiment should be published. Thus, all Moslems would become familiar with how Islamic banks work, and would be convinced of the soundness of this method of doing business.

In this regard, I wish to share with the readers what I know, from my actual experience as comptroller in the Dubai Islamic Bank, concerning some of the investment methods utilized by Islamic banks.

Usurious banks [that is, banks that charge and pay interest] utilize methods of investment and ways of collecting revenues which are different from methods that are followed by Islamic banks. The reason for this is that Islam forbids usury.

Interest-Paying Loans

The great majority of investments made by usurious banks are in the form of loans where money is loaned in return for interest payments.

Since the loan consists of a fixed sum of money and obligates the borrower to return it on the date agreed upon, in addition to obligating him to pay the interest agreed upon, it provides the bank with an easy way to invest money.

The reason it is easy is that the bank can simply calculate the profits it will get from the loan, at any time. All the bank has to be concerned about is the reputation of the client and his ability to pay back the loan. The bank is not concerned about whether or not the client has or has not gained any benefit from the loan.

In most cases, the loans are of the following types:

1. A fixed sum of money which is paid to the client or put at his disposal in return for his commitment to pay the loan back on a certain date. The client commits himself to pay back the full amount, together with interest, on a particular date.

2. Loan credit--an arrangement under which the bank agrees to put at the disposal of the client a sum of money which is agreed upon, and which the client can use whenever he needs it. In such a case, the loan usually takes the form of a current account.

The client commits himself to pay back the amount of money which he has taken out on credit. On top of this, he must pay interest on the sums of money he has used at a rate agreed upon for the period of the loan.

3. Discounting a commercial paper which matures after a certain time period. The person submitting the commercial paper transfers to the bank all rights related thereto, with a guarantee that it will be paid at maturity. The bank pays the client the value of the commercial paper, with an amount discounted from it equal to the interest payment it would normally receive for the time period beginning with the date of the discount and ending with the maturity date of the commercial paper.

In the three types of loans shown above, it is easy, as we have pointed out, for the bank to calculate the interest due on loans at the end of every month. Consequently, the bank can know what profits it will be getting. The profits basically consist of the difference in the interest which the bank pays or will pay, and the interest which the bank collects or will collect. Thus a usurious bank can secure its financial position over short periods of time, and can always be aware of the extent of the profits it is making.

Partners in Profits

As for Islamic banks, numerous thinkers and authorities on religion have consulted Islamic legal books and traditional sources in search of a basis which Islamic banks can use to conduct their investment of capital operations. Some of this research has resulted in the appearance of a new word in the investment terminology of our modern age. The word is "mudarabah" [silent partnership].

Silent partnership is defined as follows: An owner of capital gives it to someone who uses it. In return, the lender receives a portion of the profits at a rate established on the basis of an estimated part of the profits.

One of the conditions of silent partnership is that it is not proper to distribute profits before the capital is returned. Thus, if profit is distributed, and the borrower dies, the lender is regarded as having received part of the capital. The lender would then have a claim equal to the outstanding balance of the loan.

Silent partnership can be either unrestricted or restricted, as determined by the owner of the capital in terms of where the business activity is to take place, the nature of the activity, etc.

According to this definition, a silent partnership contract is a known type of partnership contract and is governed and regulated by law. The sharing of partners in both profits and losses is considered to be one of the basic principles of a partnership contract. The law prohibits any form of the so-called lion's share. It may be stipulated that one partner should not share in the profits, that one partner should not share in the losses, that one partner should receive profits to the exclusion of others, or that a partner should receive a certain amount as profit whether the entity has profits or losses. All these are known as lion's share conditions, and are considered invalid. In addition, they invalidate the partnership contract itself.

There are two major categories of association:

1. Associations of capital, and

2. Associations of persons.

The most widespread types of associations of capital are joint-stock companies, limited partnerships and limited liability companies. The most widespread types of associations of persons are commercial companies of joint liability and simple partnerships.

In associations of persons (as well as in limited partnerships), it is permitted to have partners who only participate in the work of the company and do not own any part of its capital.

My opinion is that some of these types of associations represent favorable areas for capital investment by Islamic banks. Some of the most important types of associations which serve this purpose are:

1. Joint-stock companies.

A joint-stock company is defined as being a company which divides its capital into shares of equal value which can be bought and sold in the market. The company's shareholders are responsible for company obligations up to their share of the company's capital.

The existence of this type of company has led to the undertaking of numerous projects which individuals were not able to undertake in the past.

It is characteristic of the joint-stock company that its shares have an organized market-place in which stock prices are publicized and in which it is easy to buy and sell the stocks.

Stocks characteristically have a value which is not stable. Their value goes up or down according to the degree of progress or failure manifested by the company. Also, the price of the stock goes up when the buying power of the currency goes down (assuming that the conditions which affect the price of the stock are unchanged). This feature is not true of loans, but the real value of a loan would go down if the buying power of the currency goes down.

2. Limited partnerships.

A simple limited partnership is composed of one or more partners who are collectively responsible for all of the company's obligations, and they run the company. It includes one or more limited partners who are responsible for partnership obligations to the extent of the share they contribute to the partnership.

In view of the fact that a limited partner is responsible for the company's debts only to the extent of his share in the entity, and that he does not work for the partnership, this type of association is considered to be suitable for owners of capital who do not want to assume commercial risks. They give their money to whomever they consider to be worthy of their trust, and share in his commercial activities.

This type of partnership developed in Europe in the 12th century. The reason for its emergence was the fact that it does not involve usury, which was prohibited by the church.

Simple limited partnerships are considered to be a practical application of the idea of silent partnership. Its principles can be applied to financing operations which are undertaken by non-usurious banks. Tradesmen and small merchants, who want to expand their business activities, can participate in such partnerships.

It is possible to modify the simple limited partnership, so that a working partner commits himself in the contract to utilize part of his share of the profits to purchase a portion of the capital of the financing partner (the bank), until such time as the bank disassociates itself from the enterprises. Thus, the bank will have sufficient liquidity and potential to finance other enterprises.

There is no doubt that when Islamic banks choose to invest part of their available capital in the purchase of stocks of successful stock companies, and thus earn profits from them (by selling the stocks or cashing in their coupons), they engage in one form of successful investment. Usurious banks quite often engage in this type of profit-making activity.

Likewise, when Islamic banks share in financing projects undertaken by merchants or tradesmen associated in simple limited partnerships, they engage in a type of investment which will benefit not only the banks, but society as a whole.

However, these types of investment should not absorb all of the capital of a bank or of its depositors. If they do, Islamic banks would not retain sufficient liquidity to repay short-term deposits, or finance many needs of the bank's clients.

There is no doubt that there are several ways through which Islamic banks can engage in financing the needs of their clients. Here are some of these ways:

1. Selling on credit or through installment plans.

One means of investment which Islamic banks have resorted to is financing the purchase of durable goods, be it for production purposes or for consumption. The bank purchases the goods in cash, and then sells these same goods to the client for deferred payments. Usury is totally absent from this type of transaction, since the bank has exchanged cash for goods, and then sold the goods for cash. The difference in the amount of money which the bank pays for the goods, and the amount of money it receives when it sells the goods to the client, represents the bank's profit.

Nevertheless, it is my opinion that when a bank itself undertakes to purchase and sell goods, it departs from its normal realm of activity. Islamic banks can share in the formation and financing of specialized companies which undertake transactions such as these. A bank can undertake to collect installment payments due to be paid in connection with a purchase, and can do so in behalf of a commercial company in return for a commission.

If a bank is compelled to undertake purchase and resale transactions, it would be appropriate for the bank to set up a special independent department for them, and to totally separate this activity from other normal accounts.

2. Participation in limited operations.

An existing enterprise might need a certain amount of cash which it is unable to provide from its own resources. It might need this to carry out one or more operations that have been entrusted to it. It would not be a matter of increasing the enterprise's basic capital, because there is no guarantee that the enterprise, in the future, will continue to be entrusted with such operations.

It is possible for Islamic banks to finance activities such as these. The bank could provide money to the enterprise on condition that the bank would share in the profits resulting from the operation. The enterprise would pledge to deposit the revenues resulting from its activities in its account in the bank. When the operation is completed, the client could present to the bank his accounting statement concerning the operation. In accordance with this accounting statement, the profits or losses of the operation would be divided up.

One of the most important things which should be taken into consideration in determining the bank's percentage of the profits, is that this percentage should not be excessively high. Although the bank does contribute its capital, it is the enterprise which has to carry out the operation and which must put into the operation what it possesses in terms of effort, know-how and material resources. One thing that could be done is to be guided by the accounting statements of previous operations, carried out by this same client, which were financed by usurious banks.

3. Participation in financing.

Perhaps a particular enterprise does not have sufficient cash liquidity. This might be the result of having too much inventory on hand, or because some of the clients of the enterprise have not met their payment obligations on time. Or it might be because the enterprise needs to finance maintenance work or has to renovate its machinery. Or it could be for any number of other reasons which crop up and which cause the enterprise to need money to meet its payment obligations. The enterprise might feel that its needs for money will not be a continuous thing, and that it does not require an increase in basic capital.

Islamic banks could offer money to an enterprise such as this by means of sharing in profits and losses. This could take place on the basis of following principles:

a. An agreement is concluded between the bank and the client to distribute profits and losses according to the ratio of contributed capital (company's capital + capital reserves + retained earnings of prior years) over capital furnished by the bank. The company could be given a greater share of the profits. This is because the enterprise achieves its profits not only as a result of capital used, but also as a result of factors such as its know-how and other material factors which are difficult to evaluate. Furthermore, the enterprise is obligated to return the bank's money when it has sufficient cash to do so.

The enterprise could receive money from the bank in installments. In such a case, it is possible to evaluate both the capital contributions of the company and of the bank on the basis of the number of days during which their capital was invested. The financing could be provided through a current credit account. In this case, the capital furnished by the bank could be calculated by means of the well-known (digits) method. The entitlements of the two parties could be computed by multiplying the value of their capital contributions by the number of days in the time period involved.

The above has been a quick sketch of the most important ways Islamic banks have of making investments. It would be useful if various Islamic banks would publish information about their experience, hold symposiums, and present lectures at close time intervals so as to promote an exchange of practical experience which would be of benefit to everyone.

OPERATIONS OF ISLAMIC INVESTMENT COMPANY DISCUSSED

Sharjah AL-KHALIJ (BANKS, INSURANCE, INVESTMENT SUPPLEMENT) in Arabic
22 Jul 80 pp 9, 25

[Article: "How Are Islamic Investments Different From Other Investments?"]

[Text] Commerce and Partnership Instead of Fixed Interest.

Ten Percent Profit the First Year After Deducting the Zakat [religious tax].

Islamic Insurance Has Become a Reality.

Prohibition of Deduction of Zakat From Profits To Put an End to Attacks by Skeptics.

Since people have for so long been used to the Western concept of banking transactions and investments, they might think that there is no alternative to this system of conducting business. But statistics show that only 4 percent of the world's Arab Moslems conduct transactions with banks. This is in contrast to, for example, 80 percent of the people in the United States. The reason for this is obvious. It is the fact that the banks use the system of paying and charging interest.

In the past, there were several attempts to devise practical means of applying the spirit of Islamic law in economics. Some of these attempts failed, and others simply camouflaged themselves by calling interest payments a "commission" or "service fee."

In 1978 a group of Arab businessmen in the Gulf area set up an investment firm which, they believe, overcame all of the obstacles which frustrated previous such attempts. They set up the Gulf Islamic Investment Company. Its headquarters is in Sharjah, and its honorary president is Shaykh Sultan Ibn Muhammad al-Qasimi, the ruler of Sharjah. Quite a few of the heads of state of the region's countries have contributed toward the establishment of this company.

Profits Permissible for Moslems

Dr Hasan 'Abd al-Qadir, the director general of the company, says: "Our firm was set up to serve the average Moslem investor who does not want to do transactions which involve interest payments (something forbidden by God), and who has a surplus of capital and has neither the time nor the expertise to engage in investing it himself.

"The idea for such a firm arose from the necessity to provide Moslems with a permissible means by which they could earn profits in Saudi Arabia--a country which forbids interest payment transactions in its banks. The result was the formation of the Islamic Legal Supervisory Commission, whose members are some of the best economists from the entire Moslem world. During the last 5 years, they engaged in devising ideas and means which have guaranteed the realization of this goal. With the help of Dr Ibrahim Kamil's consultant firm in Egypt, they have developed all of the necessary regulations which are in conformity with the spirit of Islamic law."

Dr 'Abd al-Qadir went on to say: "At first the parent company, called the Islamic Investment Company, was set up in the Bahama Islands in the Caribbean Sea, in view of the tax exemptions provided by that country. This company utilized the efforts of scholars and researchers, and undertook pioneering experiments in all fields, to the point where statistics demonstrated that they had achieved complete success.

"Then the company established an 'operating company' called the Gulf Islamic Investment Company. Its headquarters is in Sharjah, and its initial capital was 3 million dirhams. After its establishment a year and a half ago, I can safely say that the company has been a 100-percent success.

"The company has withstood large-scale hostile attacks on the part of skeptics from all directions. It has continued to do its job quietly and with a determination which is indomitable. Figures show that the results of the first year of the company's operation were a success. The company was able to distribute net profits of 10 percent to its shareholders after the zakat was deducted. The company sold "silent partnership" shares amounting to $7.5 million when subscriptions were first advertised in Qatar. In fact, the National Bank of Qatar was forced to call the police to disperse people who insisted on buying subscriptions in the company."

Commerce Permissable for Moslems

In an interview with Mr Ibrahim Mustafa, the company's sales manager, we asked him about how the company operates and about the types of investments which the company is now advertising in the market. He said:

"The principle of investment in the company is based on two types of legal agreements. The first type is a loan contract. The investor loans to the company a sum of money which he can spare. He loans the money free of charge, and for the service of his fellow-Moslems. The company commits itself to return this sum of money to him, with nothing added to, or subtracted from, the original amount. That is to say, the investor earns no profit when the loan is repaid at maturity.

"The second type of arrangement is that of 'silent partnership' contracts. Their basis is that of a partnership contract between the company (in its capacity as a body which possesses expertise and the necessary potential to engage in investing capital) and the investor (who is the silent partner). The company conducts transactions with the capital under conditions which are fixed in the silent partnership contract, depending on which particular type it is. The silent partner and the company have to accept whatever profits or losses God sees fit to bestow upon them.

"There are different types of silent partnership contracts. For this reason, for each type of silent partnership contract, a particular silent partnership company is formed. It is made known through a public ordinance which advertises subscription contracts. The company can then begin operating.

"The company engages in all types of commerce which are permissible according to Islamic law, and does so under the supervision of the Islamic Legal Commission and the auditors. It is aided by the most prominent Arab and international experts in the field of investment. In addition, the company utilizes the most modern methods and tools of operation which are used by the most prominent international investment companies.

"The company invests its capital in various commercial transactions. It buys and sells different types of minerals and crops, and sells them at a profit. It also deals in the acquisition of foreign currency to provide for its needs of hard currency when financing commercial operations. It does this so as not to be at the mercy of fluctuations in the currency market. Likewise, the company leases various types of heavy equipment and means of transportation to contracting companies and other companies. In fact, the company has already established a special branch which deals with such operations."

Types of Silent Partnerships

Mr Mustafa explained to us the different types of silent partnership which the company so far has advertised in the market. He said: "The first and second types of silent partnership were silent partnership contracts, each of which involved the amount of $100 for periods of 1, 3 or 5 years. Sales connected with the first issue amounted to $7.5 million. Sales connected with the second issue totaled about $5 million. Profits are paid out annually.

"The third type of silent partnership was connected with life insurance. It involved the amount of $20,000, to be paid during the course of 20 years, at a rate of $1,000 per year. At the present time, this type of life insurance can only be taken out by married couples. But we are in the process of issuing special contracts for other categories of individuals. Later on this will even include children. Subscriptions became available starting in October 1979, and will be available until October 1981.

"The fourth type of silent partnership deals with current investments. Subscriptions to this type of partnership have been available since 1 January 1980. The minimum subscription is $500. It is possible to add any additional amounts by means of contracts, each of which involve $250. A partner may withdraw either all or part of his money whenever he wants to, on condition that he inform the company of his intention by the 20th of the month (Christian calendar). He will then be paid whatever he is entitled to in terms of profits which God has seen fit to bestow upon him. This payment will occur on the 5th of the following month. Subscriptions to this type of partnership totaled $15 million by May of this year.

"The fifth type of silent partnership has to do with financial establishments, banks and companies, including personal companies. The minimum subscription is $100,000, for a period of either 2 or 5 years. In the first instance, profits are distributed every month. In the second instance, they are distributed every 3 months. This type of investment provides tremendous advantages for investors. They have the right to withdraw their money within 72 hours. Also, they are able to obtain letters of credit for up to 4 times the value of their subscription, provided they report the type of goods they are purchasing and their financial situation. Likewise, it is also possible for the company to join the silent partner in commercial transactions which he is not able to finance by himself. All of this can be done because the company, in advance, has a complete and clear idea about the financial dealings of its subscriber. In addition, while the subscribed capital is invested, the subscriber can receive nine-tenths of its estimated profit.

"There are special silent partnerships available to governments. The company is thinking about entering, into average-term investments in guaranteed projects after the necessary studies have been prepared. God willing, this will take place in the near future."

An Islamic Securities Market

We asked the director general about developments in the company's activities, about its impact on the financial markets, and about how the company publishes the results of its activities. He said: "An indication of our success is the fact that 90 percent of the subscribers in our first type of silent partnership have decided to participate in subsequent partnership arrangements. Also, the company has become a member of the Federation of Islamic Banks. Pakistan, Malaysia and Nigeria have extended permission to the company to open branches in those countries without their being subject to laws which are designed to regulate usurious interest.

"Furthermore, an Islamic securities market has arisen. The company used to issue its financial statements every 3 months but now it issues them every month. Soon it will issue them every week. Later on, God willing, it will issue them daily. When the company's financial situation is known every day like this, the financial papers can be reliably bought and sold.

"The Islamic Legal Supervisory Commission has recently decided not to deduct zakat from the profits. This decision was made to put an end to attacks by skeptics, and to apply the principle that Moslems may spend their profits as they see fit.

"As far as supervision goes, there is the Islamic Legal Supervisory Commission, the annual general assembly, the board of directors meeting twice every year, the investment commission created by the board of directors, and the financial supervisor who is commissioned by the general assembly, in addition to auditors from the best-known company in this field, namely, the (Price Waterhouse) Company.

"We are looking forward to the future with confidence with optimism and indomitable determination. Our guiding principle is our belief in God. This belief is bolstered by the success which we have achieved and continue to achieve every day.

"In conclusion, I would like to say that our experiment is a pioneering type of experiment. It is successfully moving forward, and has proven that there is, in fact, an alternative to engaging in Western-type banking and investment transactions. This alternative emanates from the true faith of Islam. However, non-Moslems are also permitted to participate in our partnership subscriptions, with the exception of those having to do with insurance."

IRAN-IRAQ CRISIS IMPACT ON MIDDLE EAST, U.S. EXAMINED

Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 20 Sep 80 p 5

/Article by Ali Sirmen: "Iran-Iraq-Middle East"/

/Text/ The dimensions of the border clash between Iran and Iraq is growing steadily. Within the week, Bani-Sadr's helicopters were attacked by Iraqi aircraft, then two days ago one Iranian plane was downed in a clash between the two nations' airforces.

In addition to these developments, Iraqi President Saddam Husayn announced that they had unilaterally abrogated the border agreement between the two nations. The 1975 agreement to resolve the festering Shatt al-Arab and Kurdish problems had been signed between Baghdad and the shah. The agreement regulated passage through the Shatt al-Arab and introduced measures to prevent infiltration of Iraq via Iranian borders of armed Kurdish forces.

Iraq's abrogation of the 1975 agreement and the clashes' having gained obvious intensity in recent days strengthen the liklihood of all-out war. More than anything else, such a development clearly would bring with it dangers difficult to predict for Iran.

In fact, it may be thought, at first glance, that a war would be effective for the administration in Iran to overcome, or at least freeze for a while, its own internal difficulties. Yet such a thought fails to take into account the liklihood that the shah's left-over army, which is still a very great danger to the Iranian administration, would move to the foreground in the event of total war and form a powerful force against the administration.

Intensification of the conflict between Iran and Iraq, in addition to the problems it would create in the two nations, would clearly cause significant developments in the Middle East also.

There is no doubt that going to war with Iran would completely destroy Iraq's status as a force, albeit small, against Israel in the future and would, perhaps push Baghdad rapidly to the side of the United States. Washington is looking for nations to take on the police role vacated by Iran in the area and clearly would benefit tremendously from this situation and would do anything and promise everything in order to bring about such a development.

When the shah left the country at the beginning of 1979 and Shapur Bakhtiyar's post-shah, soft-landing formula quickly lost its validity in Tehran, the United States suffered three, actually four, interrelated losses in the Middle East.

The first of these losses was that a large source of oil was no longer under the West's control. This loss was made up by Saudi Arabia which stepped in and raised its production. The fact that the conjuncture on the world oil market at the moment is not conducive to new price hikes and that, for the first time in a long time, the supply-demand balance in this area has tipped in favor of demand has put Iran in the position where it cannot be too fussy about oil sales, and the problem which the new administration in Tehran created as a source of oil has been automatically resolved to an extent, albeit temporarily.

The second great U.S. loss was the loss of an arms buyer which provided very handsome profits to its own arms industry. If fact, Iran, which paid more than $20 billion in 4 years to American arms manufacturers at the time of the shah, is no longer a profitable customer for the arms industry.

The third and fourth U.S. losses are the loss of a policeman to keep the Persian Gulf oil nations under control and the fact that its foundation stone in the Middle East, Israel, lost a major supporter in the north.

The Pentagon cannot sit on its hands, watching these two developments. The United States' greatest concern in the post-shah period is, on one hand, to pursue efforts to enable Iran to resume its former duties while, on the other, to prevent the bridges which Israel has already built from being blown up anywhere in the region, to render ineffective one by one the dangers confronting Israel and to find new forces to take on part of Iran's police dutues.

So intensification of the Iran-Iraq conflict comes at a time when the United States is increasing the efforts we have considered above. If developments proceed in this direction, a wider war between the two nations will bring with it brand new changes in the balance in the region.

MAJLIS DEPUTY WEIGHS FATE OF HOSTAGES

Tehran ECHO OF IRAN in English 29 Sep 80 pp 12-14

[Interview with Ali Akbar Parvaresh, deputy speaker of Majlis, date and place not given]

[Text] In an interview with the daily JOMHOURI ISLAMI, Ali Akbar Parvaresh, Deputy Speaker of the Majlis, spoke on the issue of the U.S. hostages in Iran and the views held by the Majlis deputies on it. Here are the salient features of the interview:

Q. What is the Majlis deputies' approach to the U.S. hostages issue?

A. There are presently two types of attitude in the Islamic Parliament on this issue. There is a group of parliamentarians who seek the release of the hostages, while another group wants them to be put on trial.

The group, seeking the U.S. hostages' release, bring in the following arguments:

1. Since Iran is presently facing economic sanctions, and because of its dire need for machinery spare parts for the industries imported from the West, we are very much dependent upon America. Hence, these hostages should be freed.

2. The hostage-taking has lost its initial excitement and fervour among the Iranian masses, which necessitates the hostages' release.

3. There are vast energies being used in protecting and maintaining these hostages. By releasing them, such energies can be utilised to the advantage of the Islamic Revolution.

4. The court trial of the hostages is very problematic. If we try them in Iran, then certainly, there is a prejudgment of their being sentenced. If we try them in some Western country, then we ourselves would rather be sentenced. However, verdicts issued at these trials would not be acceptable to the parties involved. Since there is likely to be no agreement on any one of the counrt verdicts, it is desirable to release the hostages.

5. American is constantly taking measures to draw us into political isolation. The U.S.-planned coup in Turkey is one such effort to check the revolutionary movement of the oppressed nations in this region and to consequently neutralise theexport of the Iranian revolution. Similarly, the U.S.-initiated Iraqi war is another factor leading to our political isolation. Hence, it is essential to free the hostages so that we could continue our propaganda aimed at exporting the revolution.

6. The domestic anti-revolutionary forces are collectively trying to wear down the energies of our forces and nation. There is currently a plan before the Majlis to reactivate these revolutionary energies.

7. The United States has resorted to sending emissaries to start parleys with the Iranian Majlis such as PLO representative Hani al-Hasan and Papal Envoy Archbishop Cappucci. In his mediatory letter, Pope John Paul II has even referred to a six-point agreement which America is willing to sign with the Iranian nation. These include: (a) all the assets of the Shah would be returned to Iran (b) all the frozen assets of Iran standing at 12 billion dollars would be released. There are also another 21 billion dollars which were invested by the Shah in Pentagon's various Ordnance factories (c) America would denounce its past policies (d) America would withdraw all of its claims against Iran. There are already about 200 suits filed by America against Iran including the one at the International Court of Justice (e) America is willing to sign a non-aggression treaty with Iran under which it would not interfere in its political and military affairs (f) This article would be left open to be filled up by the Iranian nation as deemed fit by it.

In case of article (f) it can be observed that America has greatly degraded itself. While analysing the causes for it, we come to note that by such willingness, America wants to show to the world its desire to resolve the hostages issue through negotiations by and by granting privileges to Iran through its own nation in order to isolate the Majlis, and to show it to be compromising with imperialism. This group argues since America is willing to surrender itself to us, we should grab such an opportunity.

8. Since the hostage-taking has only been approved by the Iranian nation, and many countries of the world have already condemned it, with even some of the liberation movements remaining neutral in the matter, as such we should release these hostages.

9. What are the conditions on which parleys should be started with America? Recently Imam Khomeyni referred to five such preconditions in one of his messages. This was taken as a green signal by the Swiss Embassy which is the protector of U.S. rights in Iran. However, if America promises to part with its imperialist tendencies in case of Iran, and we consequently start negotiations with it, what is the executive guarantee for such promises? Such a guarantee would be otained by the Special Majlis Commission on U.S. Hostages if it decides on holding such talks. We don't possess documents in respect of all these U.S. spies as most of them have been destroyed by the Embassy staff during its seizure. Out of these spies, we have only got documents against 22 of them.

The other group in Majlis, which favours the court trial of the U.S. hostages, offers the following reasons in support of its viewpoint:

1. Islamic revolution is an ideological one, and hence seeks to put an end to material domination. If we agree to hold parleys with America, then it would mean our submission to materialism and consequent degradation. Since we are not going to submit to it, hence the hostages should be set on trial.

2. If we agree to set the hostages free, this would be contrary to our Islamic spirit outlined in our constitution (Principles 2 and 3) which says that "Our constitution and Islamic Republic would keep away from domination and also from being dominated." Hence our revolution should act in favour of the interests of the oppressed world to attain full unity of the Muslim nations.

3. To conclude non-aggression treaty with America is, in fact, to accept U.S. hegemony over us. We should not avoid such an act.

4. The U.S. crimes should be brought to the notice of the whole world. We have not been isolated in the world since we enjoy the support of the oppressed nations. So we should go on with the trial of these hostages.

5. America is observing that anti-U.S. feelings are increasing in the region, with Iran playing an active role in instigating such sentiments. It is trying to do away with such feelings through isolating Iran. Thus there should be no release of the U.S. hostages.

6. If these hostages are freed, then it would dampen the revolutionary energies at national level. Therefore, these spies shouldn't be released.

7. America has committed many crimes in Iran during the past 27 years and has done so to keep in place the decadent monarchial system. Would a mere denunciation of its crimes by the United States compensate all these tyrannies against the Iranian nation? Is Washington going to pay for all the damages caused to the Iranian nation during all these years? U.S. imperialism is certainly not going to give up its tactics for the sake of Iran. Hence, there should be no relaxation in case of the U.S. hostages.

These were the arguments of the two groups on the release or court trial of the U.S. hostages. I must here say that Islam only considers the good deeds of individuals. If we contend that Islam negates such parleys with the United States, then this argument is rejected by certain events which took place in the early days of Islam. In those days, even Prophet Mohammad concluded pacts with the non-Muslims (such as the Hodeibiyeh Agreement), and Imam Hasan's truce with Moa'aviyeh clearly indicates that the interests of Islam have to be kept in mind in such parleys. All these aspects are to be discussed by the Majlis in its debate on the U.S. hostages issue within the framework of the special commission.

MINISTER OF STATE'S DEFECTION ANALYZED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 5 Sep 80 p 22

[Article: "Al-'Aqrawi Aligns Himself With al-Talibani; the Minister Was Called a 'Mule', and He Defected"]

[Text] There is nothing new in a minister or other official defecting from his country to another. This is what 'Aziz al-'Aqrawi, the Iraqi minister of state, did when he asked for asylum in Damascus last week. But al-'Aqrawi's defection is different. Al-'Aqrawi is a Kurd from the north, and was primarily associated with the non-separatist Kurdish nationalist movement. Thus, he was not in agreement with the movement of the late Kurdish leader Mulla Mustafa al-Barzani. Before becoming involved in politics, he was a member of the traditional Iraqi military establishment, in which he reached a high rank before his retirement. Therefore, he is said to have been more in agreement with Ahmad Hasan al-Bakr than with Saddam Husayn, who was not a member of the military establishment until quite recently, and then only in an honorary capacity.

As a Kurd opposed to the movement of al-Barzani, who led the Kurdish rebellion against the central government in Baghdad from the time of his return from exile in the Soviet Union in 1959 until his death in the United States in 1979, al-'Aqrawi found a key place for himself in the autonomy administration established by the Iraqi Government, after the end of al-Barzani's rebellion following the agreement between Saddam Husayn and the late shah of Iran in Algiers in 1974. Since that time, al-'Aqrawi has occupied ministerial posts in the Iraqi Government and has been a member of the Nationalist and Progressive Front.

As a member of the Progressive Front at home, and as a member of the International Peace Movement abroad, he was to a certain degree attached to the Iraqi Communist Party. The expulsion of the communists from the Front seems to have annoyed him. That, however, was not the reason for his defection, because he remained in his official position following the expulsion. He even took on new duties, including membership of the higher committee overseeing the legislative council for Kurdistan and membership of the higher commission which recently supervised the first elections to take place in Iraq since the fall of the monarchy 22 years ago. One outcome of these elections was the election of the current national assembly (parliament) in which Ba'thists won by an overwhelming majority.

If 'Aziz al-'Aqrawi had assumed all of these sensitive roles during the past 6 years, why did he choose this time to defect? In fact, why did he defect at all? Why did he pick Syria in which to seek asylum?

According to communist sources, al-'Aqrawi's defection is a protest against the presidency of Saddam Husayn himself, "because he brought Iraq into the U.S. sphere of influence." The communists seem to be basing this on al-'Aqrawi's own words at a press conference he held in the Syrian capital upon his arrival. At the press conference, he accused Saddam Husayn of trying "to destroy the Ba'th Party by liquidating its most fundamentalist and patriotic militants and leaders." He was referring to the executions in July of last year of persons accused of complicity in a Syrian-backed conspiracy to overthrow the government. Al-'Aqrawi also claimed that there is a tacit alliance between Saddam Husayn and Anwar al-Sadat against Syria, the Islamic revolution in Iran and the PLO.

But Kurdish sources in Iraq are saying that what al-'Aqrawi said was a political pretext for his defection, not the real reason. According to these sources, the reason was that al-'Aqrawi felt that his role had come to an end, and that after getting all the use it could out of him, the Iraqi Government was going to discard him. He chose to beat them to the punch as a "hero" by taking advantage of the current state of tension between Damascus and Baghdad.

The Syrians consider al-'Aqrawi's defection a propaganda gain in their tense relations with Baghdad. If time for a reconciliation came, they would have (somebody they could exploit?). In this context, al-'Aqrawi's defection to Syria balances Mahmud al-Shufi's defection to Iraq. A similar thing happened during the Iraqi-Palestinian dispute, which spread to Europe, when certain dissident groups of the two sides were used as scapeboats in the settlement which is still in effect. One of the prominent Iraqis who have sunk into oblivion is Hasan Mustafa al-Naqib who was commander of the Iraqi forces in Jordan before the events of September 1970. He enjoyed close relations with the Palestinians, and had a good reputation in Ba'th circles. Prof Michel 'Aflaq, the secretary general of the Ba'th Party, even said that he was worthy of being the commander of a united Arab army. But Hasan al-Naqib was soon dismissed from his position and appointed to an ambassadorial post. He served for 3 years as his country's ambassador to Madrid, and held that post when Saddam Husayn visited Gen Franco in 1974. He then defected, went to Beirut, and sought asylum with the PLO. He is now said to be living in Damascus.

There is, however, another aspect to al-'Aqrawi's defection to Damascus: the Kurdish aspect. The Kurdish movement is currently made up of several different factions. A major one is that of Jalal al-Talibani who now leads his movement from Syria. During the heyday of Mulla Mustafa al-Barzani's movement, al-Talibani split away, and cooperated with the Iraqi authorities on occasion. The followers of al-Barzani called any Kurd who cooperated with the Iraqi authorities at that time as one of the "government mules." That is what al-Barzani's followers used to call al-Talibani and his followers. The followers of al-Talibani in turn applied the epithet to al-'Aqrawi before his defection. There are those who believe that al-'Aqrawi will join the al-Talibani faction to intensify the Kurdish rebellion against the Iraqi Government in the north, even if the remaining followers of al-Barzani still maintain their opinion of al-Talibani and al-'Aqrawi.

The al-Talibani faction of the Kurdish movement maintains that the Kurdish people must resume their revolution in Iraq on a new footing, avoiding the pitfalls which Mulla Mustafa's movement fell into. They must, therefore, make peace with the Islamic revolution in Iran, where a fierce war is now raging between the Kurds and Iranian Government forces in Mahabad, which was the capital of the first Kurdish republic established by al-Barzani right after the Second World War. The republic fell as soon as the Soviet forces withdrew from Iranian territory. In recent years, while there has been peace in northern Iraq, the al-Talibani faction has carried out several limited military operations in the area near the Syrian-Turkish borders. But the Turkish Government has kept this region under control through harsh measures, instituting martial law. This has had a dampening effect on these operations. Two years ago, when these operations were at their peak, Saddam Husayn was asked about them. He said that they posed no danger of erupting into a wide-scale rebellion, and that Iraq was able to endure them and contain them for many years.

The faction which opposes al-Talibani's faction, including the remnants of al-Barzani's faction, says that the Kurdish revolution cannot achieve victory through certain leaders changing from "mules of one government" to "mules of another government." They say that al-Barzani's experience proves that such a situation is doomed to failure, if an agreement such as the one signed in Algiers by the shah and Saddam Husayn takes places. This faction calls for an all-out revolution in all of Kurdistan, including Iran, Iraq and Turkey. When that comes about, Syria can be used as a rear base, because of the large number of Kurds in its northern districts.

There is also a third faction which believes that the Kurdish revolution has a chance to remain active in Iran. There is even an opportunity for the Iranian Kurds to achieve a good position from which to improve the Kurdish situation in the neighboring countries. Logistically, this requires taking advantage of the Iranian-Iraqi conflict so that Iraqi Kurdistan would become a rear base for the Kurdish revolution in Iran.

There is also a fourth faction, though not very numerous, which consists of Kurdish intellectuals and students in Europe. This group calls for a new Kurdish movement. As they put it, this movement would shake off the "traditional conservative leadership which has been burned up by its ties with various governmental agencies in the nations which have divided up Kurdistan and the Kurdish people." This faction says that although the traditional leaders differ with each other, they form, as a group, "a party of mules."

According to observers, 'Aziz al-'Aqrawi's services to the Ba'th regime in Iraq, while he was part of the government and an official in the autonomy administration, far outweight any harm that could be caused to Iraq by his defection and association with the followers of al-Talibani. According to these observers, al-'Aqrawi has only propaganda value now.

PURCHASE OF FRENCH COMBAT PLANES UNDER NEGOTIATION

Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Jacques Isnard]

[Text] Discussions in progress between Paris and Baghdad have to do with the purchase by Iraq of 150 Alpha-jet combat planes which will be partially produced locally. While these negotiations are taking place, in November Iraq is to receive the first of the 60 Mirage F-1 air defense interceptors ordered from France.

Relations between France and Iraq in the field of aviation go back over 3 years. In July 1977 Baghdad ordered 36 Mirage F-1 interceptors from France. At the time, it was understood that Iraq would later announce an order for 36 more Mirage F-1's. In December 1979, however, an agreement was concluded for 24 more of the same interceptor.

Apparently, after acquiring the 60 Mirage F-1's, Iraq chose to set its sights on the creation of a local aviation industry with the aid of French companies. Long dependent on an exclusive supplier, the Soviet Union, the Iraqis wanted to set up their own sources of supply to cut down the risks of foreign dependence.

This is why, in its own interest, Iraq has resumed work on the main lines of a still-born project. Actually, several years ago Egypt, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait had drawn up a plan to create an Arab Organization for Military Industrialization--known under the acronym OAI--with the aim of setting up the basis for an aviation industry in Egypt which was to have been financed by the three other Arab partners to the agreement and was to appeal to France for the mass production of a combat plane, the Alpha-jet, designed as a trainer for local personnel and to beef up several Near Eastern air forces.

The OAI disappeared following many a mishap, in particular due to pressure from the United States at the time of the Camp David agreements, which normalized Israeli-Egyptian relations.

Since then, Iraq has for its own reasons reexamined with France the possibility of setting up aviation plants near Baghdad and Mossoul where the Alpha-jet would be assembled. This twin-jet aircraft,* was designed by French and German companies but the two manufacturers have agreed that, in the event the plane is exported, each of them would be free to sell it by buying back that portion that has been coproduced from the other manufacturer.

All in all, 150 Alpha-jets are involved, in the advanced training models for the training of other than beginner pilots and for the tactical support of ground troops.

The first machines will come from the French plants. During a second phase, Iraq will, with French assistance on the basis of already-approved plans, proceed to the assembly of the most important Alpha-jet components. Later, production will be farmed out to local plants for most of the plane's components, including the jet engines.

Not counting France, which plans to buy a total of 200 planes, the Alpha-jet has to date been ordered by the FRG (200), Belgium (33), Morocco (24), Nigeria (12), Ivory Coast (6), Qatar (6) and Togo (3). The Emirate of Abu Dhabi is also negotiating with France for the purchase of Alpha-jets.

In the present case, the conclusion of a contract with Baghdad would have the effect of breaking the Soviet monopoly in the Iraqi Air Force, chiefly equipped with Mig-21's, Mig-23's, Sukkoi-7's or 20's, Tupolev-22's, Ilyushin-28's and a few rare British planes, already obsolete. Iraq has promised France 23.3 percent of its oil supply.

CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS--Iraq has recently been devoting attention to construction activity, following its belated opening up to western contractors, whose revenues from Iraqi construction projects have reached a billion dollars. Iraq has signed several contracts amounting to 1.1 billion dollars with one company for the construction of a government center in Baghdad. Another contract with the company has been signed for 700 million dollars for improvements to the Basra airport. A 500 million dollar contract with a Japanese firm has been signed for building renovations. Iraq has also signed a 340 million dollar contract with Korea for the construction of a medical center in Baghdad. [Text] [Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 13 Aug 80 p 13] 9123

LOAN TO INDIA--It was announced in Baghdad yesterday that Iraq and India have signed a long-term loan agreement under which the Iraqi Fund for Foreign Development will provide the government of India with a 104 million dollar interest-free cash loan. The Iraqi News Agency quoted an offical of the Fund, who said that the loan was equivalent to the increases in the price of Iraqi oil supplied to India during the second half of last year. The official noted that this was the 10th loan provided by Iraq to several developing countries. The loan was signed for Iraq by Dr 'Abd al-Amir al-Anbari, chairman of the board of the Fund, and for India by its ambassador to Baghdad. The official said that the loan would be paid back over a 20-year period. [Text] [Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 29 Aug 80 p 15] 9123

IRAQI LITERARY FIGURES KILLED--Beirut--The Association of Democratic Iraqi Writers, Journalists and Artists issued a statement today on the martyrdom of Jihad Majid, an Iraqi storyteller. The statement said that some time ago, 84 Arab intellectuals signed a memo calling on the rulers of Baghdad to release Jihad Majid and to account for the destiny of Dr Safa' al-Hafiz, Dr Sabah al-Durrah and Jihad Majid following reports on their grave condition due to torture. The statement added that on 30 September, Lebanese newspapers published the statement issued by Amnesty International which called on Iraq to open an investigation into the killing of political detainees by poison. The statement mentioned Jihad Majid. The statement referred to the execution of journalist Isma'il Khalil in Baghdad. It denounced these actions and called for sending cables of condemnation, revealing the facts to world opinion and having the masses of the people sign memos of objection against the Iraqi regime. PERES DISCUSSES MIDDLE EAST PEACE PROCESS

TA050917 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 5 Oct 80 p 8

[Article by Shim'on Peres, Labor Party chairman: "War or Peace?"--translation of an article appearing in OCTOBER magazine]

[Text] The choice before all of us, Arab and Jewish residents of the Middle East, is sharp and clear: Will we let the Palestinian problem blast the entire region into another war? Or will we strive towards a new regional alignment through which a solution can be found for the Palestinian problem as well as others?

The first option calls for another war; the second opens the gate to peace. I believe that President as-Sadat accurately perceived this choice. And, as the president of the largest nation in the area, he took the historic initiative towards a peaceful solution.

Egypt has always been regarded as the "big brother" in the family of Middle Eastern nations. Its achievements and its shortcomings have always been extremely significant for other states in the area. I believe the past--and the future as well--justify this assessment. There were four wars between us. Each had a clear military outcome, but none solved the problem that brought the armies out.

The wars of 1948, 1956, 1967 and 1973 only increased the number of human casualties, the property damage and the number of refugees, and deepened the feelings of hostility and bitterness. But no permanent solution followed. On the contrary, the wars opened the region to Soviet infiltration, aroused fanatical elements, retarded social development and halted economic growth. It would be naive to address ourselves only to the causes of the wars and to ignore their results. Any future belligerency would only benefit foreign powers--weapons-suppliers or status-seekers. And the human and economic development of the region's inhabitants would suffer.

The Palestinization of the conflict was thus a basic error. On the other hand, a comprehensive regional view brings with it a chance for a peaceful solution to the Palestinian problem. The regional approach takes into account that lack of progress in the Middle East derives in part from geographical and historical factors. These international "givens" are the deserts, mountains, seas and climate. All these have kept the peoples apart and inhibited development. Isolation, competition, hostility, and the domination of narrow interests intensified the effects of a harsh environment.

As far as I have understood from my conversations with President as-Sadat, he, like us, is interested in an honest and historic pooling of forces to overcome those obstacles--turning deserts into fields, linking mountains in ways that will allow for initiatives in industry, research and tourism; cleaning the seacoasts and opening the seas themselves to free passage; conquering the climate; cooperating to keep out foreign forces and transform blind fanaticism into cultured, intelligent, tolerant exchange.

If nature in the Middle East is harsh, the people of the region are blessed with imagination and ability which, from time to time in their long history, took them to the zenith of scientific and spiritual achievement. The goal of regional alignment must be to bring back the rule of wisdom despite the many difficulties arising from habit and terrain.

I believe in such a possibility. I also believe we can find a just solution to the painful problem of the Palestinian people. Within such a context of renewed trust and far-reaching cooperation, the problem can be viewed without the added burden of suspicion and hostility.

I know this "burden" cannot be eliminated in a single day. The split in the Middle East between the "rejectionist front" and those who favour dialogue necessitates a great deal of patience in striving for a solution in stages. How, therefore, do we Israelis describe to ourselves the solution of the Palestinian problem?

To solve the problem, we believe, we have to ask where the Palestinians are. This is only a matter of statistics, but it's sometimes surprising to see to what extent people tend to ignore them. Nearly half of the Palestinian people live in Jordan, and they comprise a majority of the Jordanian population. (We must remember that Jordan itself was in the not-too-distant past a part of Palestine.) About 700,000 other Palestinians live in Judaea and Samaria. About 100,000 live in Jerusalem, about 450,000 in the Gaza Strip, about 600,000 are Israeli citizens, and about 200-300,000 are refugees in Lebanon.

We must see the problem and the solution in a unified, complete context. All of the interim solutions must derive from a view of the comprehensive solution at the end of the road. We must decide, then, first of all, what the comprehensive solution is. Will it be a single solution, or two or three?

A single solution means one political framework, one army, one flag. Two solutions means two stages, two armies, two flags. We contend that more than one solution is not in fact any solution, merely a change of venue, date and reason for further conflict.

If, for example, a Palestinian state based on the Palestine Liberation Organization is established, alongside Jordan, Yasir 'Arafat's unceasing attempts to take over Jordan as well (as called for in the Palestinian covenant) will give rise to constant terror and tension. King Husayn would respond accordingly. And Israel would find itself involved, willingly or unwillingly, in this perpetual tension.

A Palestinian state with an army equipped for offence would pose a threat to its neighbors on both the east and west. But it isn't even clear if such a state would be stable enough to withstand the competition which already exists among the various PLO factions. Katyushas would fly in all directions and the response to them would be continuous escalation of the confrontation in the entire area.

Anyone prepared to see the region in its full context and reach a logical solution to the Palestinian situation must seek a complete, single solution, despite the difficulties. There is no divided solution to a problem which isn't divided. For these reasons, Israel favours the establishment of a Jordanian-Palestinian framework which would include all of the more than three million Palestinians living today in Jordan, Judaea, Samaria and Gaza.

If we agree to this view, we can begin fashioning bricks for the political structure under the existing conditions and agreements in the Middle East. The first brick can be the Gaza Strip, which can be given autonomy without delay, for the period defined in the Camp David accords. At the end of that period, we can examine, along with the Gaza residents, ways to link the Gaza Strip to the Jordanian-Palestinian framework.

The second brick can be an Israeli invitation to the Jordanian Government to conduct negotiations for a solution to the Palestinian problem on the basis of UN Security Council Resolution 242, which was formally adopted by Egypt, Jordan and Israel.

We may not be able to reach a full and permanent agreement on Judaea, Samaria and Gaza in one leap. In that case we would have to seek interim agreements, such as those reached with Egypt, before arriving at a permanent peace.

The difficulty of the single leap to peace is described convincingly enough in one of the formulas the Egyptian delegation brought to Camp David: "...In determining the future boundaries of the West Bank, the two main considerations will be the aspirations of the Palestinians and the security call of Israel."

And in fact, we must not only face the problems of Egyptian expectations, but also those of Israel's security. Israel believes it was unjustly attacked twice by the Jordanian Army--in 1948 and in 1967--and is convinced it must not be vulnerable to more errors of the same sort. There is a contradiction formulated in the Egyptian statement, but I believe it can be bridged in serious negotiations.

It is not inconceivable that such negotiations may lead to solutions no one can imagine today.

A third brick in the political structure can be the establishment of a suitable Israeli policy in the territories. As the development of local leadership is encouraged through free elections, even on the municipal level, the military government will withdraw from the territories, clearing the way for an independent authority, as described in the Camp David accords.

The fourth brick in the structure must be a solution of the problem of refugees in Lebanon. That would relieve Lebanon's agony and permit those refugees who wish to return to the Palestinian-Jordanian framework to build their permanent home.

In my opinion, this brick can be made, again, only in the context of a Jordanian-Palestinian solution. If there are two states, the larger of them, Jordan, will not necessarily want to absorb the refugees and the smaller of them is likely to want to absorb them but not have the room. Israel, like the rest of the nations in the region, can extend various kinds of help to carry out this programme.

The fifth brick in the solution would be Jerusalem. In this area there is some agreement and there are some differences between Israel and Egypt. Egypt agrees with us that Jerusalem must remain a united city and that religious rites must be performed there in dignity by all of the sects for whom it is a holy city (and we must not forget that the Christians, not only Jews and Muslims, consider Jerusalem a holy city). But Egypt argues for division of sovereignty in the city, which Israel cannot accept.

I believe we must take the two points of agreement--unity of the city and free approach to the holy places, through administration by the relevant religious authority--and develop them, with the symbols necessary to increase the degree of agreement concerning the status of Jerusalem.

When we have finished baking those five bricks, we can get on with building the entire structure. That might take a long time, but isn't it preferable to build peace slowly rather than slip into war for lack of patience?

If we solve the Palestinian problem, we can all commit ourselves to the central goal of the policy President as-Sadat has embarked upon, and in which we are full partners. That goal is to turn the Middle East into a region whose economic, scientific and social development is as advanced as that of Europe, or even America; a region in which there will be cooperation, despite the differences of religion and language, such as that found in the European community--with its open borders and its flourishing culture.

The fact that we are ancient peoples should not prevent such a regional renaissance. A Middle East without conflicts will no longer be a grazing ground for foreign flocks. We can all devote our human energy, based on an ancient culture, to the service of the coming generation--of the Arab nation, the Jewish nation, and the other peoples who live here.

The key to that is an intellectual, not only political, cooperation between Egypt and Israel. Politicians, writers, artists, farmers, and workers already have the green light. Let us not be daunted by the difficulties that face us and let us not fall prey to excessive suspicion, to the rumours that bloom, to the hatreds of the past. We met as human beings, and we were surprised to each find a desire in the other to have today's civilization succeed yesterday's strategy. These are the days for great decisions and wide-ranging vision. We are not nations of peddlars. We were brought up on the laps of prophets. That was our strength yesterday; that will be our strength tomorrow.

BEGIN INTERVIEWED ON IMPLICATIONS OF MIDDLE EAST WAR

LD121320 London SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 12 Oct 80 p 19

["Exclusive" interview with Prime Minister Menahem Begin by Gordon Brook-Shepherd in Jerusalem; date not given]

[Excerpts] Three points stood out in talks lasting in all two and a quarter hours which I have had here with Israel's controversial and beleaguered prime minister, Mr Menahem Begin. These are: 1) Grave concern that the Gulf war may spread, coupled with a pledge that Israel will not meddle in it; 2) withering criticism of Western Europe in general and of Tory Britain in particular, for kowtowing to Arab oil power; 3) uncompromising rejection of any form of Palestinian state under any leadership and of any attempt to tamper with the status claimed for Jerusalem as Israel's undivided capital.

His sombre words about the Iran-Iraqi conflict came when I suggested that his generals must surely be delighted that two of Israel's bitterest enemies were now draining each other's strength. He shook his head briskly and said: "My friend, there is an ancient precept in the Bible, 'Don't rejoice in the downfall of your enemies.' It is true that both Iran and Iraq are our implacable foes, yet we do not rejoice that they are fighting each other. When a war starts, you never know how it will end. It is like a conflagration. The flames can reach far away from the battlefield. Therefore we are very perturbed, and the situation in the Persian Gulf is very dangerous also for the Western powers."

The week I was in Jerusalem had seen both the visit of King Husayn of Jordan to Baghdad to discuss Jordanian aid to Iraq in the battle, and the visit of the Syrian President al-Asad to Moscow to sign a so-called "friendship" treaty with the Soviet Union. It was difficult to know which event troubled Mr Begin more. On Jordan he said:

"We want peace with her as a neighbour. But now she allies herself with Iraq--the most radical of all our enemies, who has always fought us and never signed a ceasefire, although we have no common border. Jordan puts the Port of Aqaba at Iraq's disposal and we know that more Soviet ships with arms and military supplies for Iraq are now on their way there." (I later learned that Israel has pinpointed 12 more Soviet vessels bound for Aqaba.) This co-operation is very serious for us. Look, Iraq has more than 3,000 tanks. Let us say that, in gratitude, they give Jordan 500 of them. That would mean Jordan would have, counting your British Centurions and her other armour, something like 1,500 tanks to mass against us."

As for Syria, he could find little comfort in the fact that she was at loggerheads with Iraq in view of the treaty just signed in Moscow. This seemed to him to presage the re-entry of the Soviet Union in force into the Middle East arena from which she was excluded eight years ago after the breach with Egypt.

"The important thing will be the secret clauses in such a pact, and those will not be published. There are even reports that Soviet military units may be stationed in Syria--right on our door-step. We are not frightened but this whole development is serious. Syria has 3,000 tanks, too; and I can tell you that the number of Soviet advisers in that country has already recently doubled--from 2,500 to 5,000. Nonetheless, Israel cannot intervene, and allegations of our intervention in the Gulf war are baseless. We just don't want to interfere but we have to watch very carefully."

If there was one positive aspect of the Gulf war for Mr Begin, it was the end of what, in his view, was a Western illusion about the Arab world. He obviously relished ramming this particular point home.

"For years there was a myth in the West that if only the Arab-Israeli conflict could be solved, more or less in the Arab sense, if Israel could be so persuaded, then there would be peace and quiet in the whole region. No more war or strife, and supplies of oil assured to every-one. Now this myth is exploded completely. Two Arab oil states are fighting each other and the Arab world is divided. What has the Arab-Israeli conflict to do with all this?"

We now got on to Britain and, more particularly, Tory Britain, which came in for some fierce broadsides. In the morning, when we had touched on the outbreaks of anti-Semitism in France, he had spoken sadly of "the two Frances--the France of liberty, equality and fraternity and the France of the Dreyfus case and the horrible face of racial hatred." Were there, I asked, two Britains as well?

Well, he replied, of course. There was on the one hand the Britain of Balfour and Lord Passfield--great friends of Zionism--and he himself had been brought up by his father (who was a great devotee of Disraeli) to admire Britain.

Though he did not exactly specify that Britain's other face reposed in the patrician features of Lord Carrington, it was our foreign secretary who got most of the stick that now followed. Mr Begin had already accused the whole of Western Europe, including Britain, of "vying for the favour of the Arab world, trying to sell arms to them at the highest price and buy oil from them at the cheapest price." But it was our behaviour over the "Death of a Princess" TV film which aroused his particular wrath.

"Suddenly, Saudi Arabia became very angry with you and threatened to take her money away from the city and her oil, which is still important to you; and first your Foreign Office minister, Mr Hurd, and then Lord Carrington went to Riyadh and humiliated themselves--I don't hesitate to say so--with abject apologies, bowing deeply to a corrupt ruling clique simply because in your free country there are free media."

I pointed out that it was regrets and not apologies which had been tendered, and it was precisely the freedom of the British media which had been stressed and upheld throughout the incident. As far more distinguished interlocutors of Mr Begin's have discovered, however, he is harder to deflect than a charging bull. I had no better luck later on when trying to persuade him that, important though Arab oil and trade were to the Western world, we also had a genuine political motive in trying to help along a Palestinian settlement.

The so-called "justice of the Palestinian cause," he retorted, amounted simply to the blunt fact that there were now 21 sovereign Arab states in the world determined to create a 22nd, "on the neck of the Jewish state."

Lord Carrington "was no friend of Israel's at all, as long as he repeats that we should negotiate with the PLO." (Sir Ian Gilmour--whom Mr Begin also met on his visit to London last year--got even lower marks: He was described as "absolutely hostile.")

I picked Mr Begin up on a point he had made earlier that the Middle East was unpredictable and full of paradoxes. Just supposing that a reasonable and peaceful Palestinian leadership were to emerge one day, would he still oppose a Palestinian state? He brushed aside even possibility of such moderate leadership.

"A Palestinian state is out of the question. In any case it would be a mortal danger to Israel."

It was, he went on, "sacrilege" to compare the dispersal of the Palestinians to the Jewish Diaspora. The Palestinians were living among their own Arab peoples with the same language and culture. The solution for these dispersed Palestinians was "resettlement in the countries where they live." After all, nobody had tried to send back all the Moslem and Hindu refugees created by the partition of India. As for those Palestinians living in Judaea and Samaria, the solution proposed by Israel herself was the best--to give them complete administrative autonomy to run their lives. "But security we must reserve for ourselves."

Ideas such as those floated by his Labour opposition opponent, Mr Peres, that Jordan might be associated in a political solution, he dismissed as an attack of the illness he called "Husaynitis."

"How can you have a territorial compromise with Jordan when Husayn said 'I want Jerusalem'?"

It was the status of Jerusalem which produced his final blast at Lord Carrington. He told me: "I said to Lord Carrington in London when he gave me some unsolicited advice on East Jerusalem, 'When King David transferred his capital from Hebron to Jerusalem, nobody at that time had ever heard of London but would any Englishman have asked anyone about making London his capital? Don't give me unsolicited advice! There is no Arab Jerusalem. There is only Jerusalem!'"

ISRAELI ANALYSTS COMMENT ON SOVIET-SYRIAN FRIENDSHIP PACT

TA101235 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 10 Oct 80 pp 1, 2

[Report by David Landau, diplomatic correspondent: "Pact Seen as Threat to Israel and West"]

[Excerpt] Top analysts in Jerusalem said yesterday the Syrian President Hafiz al-Asad had agreed to sign the treaty with Moscow as a direct consequence of the Iran-Iraq war.

These analysts noted that al-Asad had hesitated for a very long time over repeated Soviet urgings to enter this type of close relationship with the Kremlin. It was the war, these analysts believe, that persuaded him to take the plunge.

Al-Asad apparently perceived the war as increasing Syria's isolation in the Arab world. Most of the Arab states are backing Iraq--a few, like Jordan, overtly, and the majority less openly. Only Syria and its new partner-in-union Libya have come out in favor of Iran. Syria also has longstanding grievances against Iraq.

Al-Asad may also have feared that the war would inevitably strengthen the bonds between the Soviet Union and Iraq--and therefore he decided to respond to the Soviet proposals to strengthen Syria's own client-patron relationship.

The Israeli analysts say active Syrian involvement in the war on the side of Iran seems highly unlikely at this stage. They point out that Iraq has succeeded to a large extent in portraying the war as an "Arab" struggle against a non-Arab enemy. With his minority Alawite regime under pressure from Moslem fundamentalists within his country, al-Asad could hardly afford to be viewed as taking an anti-Arab side in the conflict.

Nevertheless, Syria has sought to aid the Iranians in behind-the-scenes diplomacy.

Pondering Jordan's open logistic support for Iraq, the Israeli analysts said Jordan plainly hopes to be rewarded by Iraq and by other Arab hardliners once the war is over. In part, King Husayn is apparently moved by sentiments of Arab solidarity. But he is also seeking to better his own standing in the Arab world at the expense of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The PLO has been ambivalent on the Gulf war.

This purpose would accord with Jordan's steady attempts during recent months to regain preeminence on the Palestinian issue. A special ministry dealing with West Bank affairs has been set up in Amman recently, and more money has been made available to the West Bank.

Jordan seems to be shaking off the constraints imposed on it by the Rabat resolutions of 1974 in matters pertaining to the Palestinians. Israeli analysts feel that Husayn sees himself resuming a central role as spokesman for the Palestinians. His support for Iraq in its war is one way, he seems to feel, in which he can advance this aim.

Husayn's warlike rhetoric against Israel this week coincides with this assessment. Husayn has been moving steadily away from his traditional "moderation" ever since Camp David. But his bald threats this week of war against Israel to "purify Jerusalem" registered a new note of stridency with analysts here.

When the rhetoric is set in the context of the burgeoning strategic relationship between Jordan and Iraq, as well as with Husayn's immiment visit to Moscow, Israeli policymakers understandably view developments on the eastern front with disquiet.

Deputy Prime Minister Yiga'el Yadin warned Husayn publicly yesterday that it would be a "grave error" to "jump on the Iraqi bandwagon." Yadin said Husayn had gravely erred at least twice before: when he entered the war alongside Egypt in 1967, and when he failed to enter the peace process with Egypt in 1978.

'JERUSALEM POST' COMMENTS ON RABIN'S CANDIDACY FOR PREMIERSHIP

TA121018 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 12 Oct 80 p 8

[Editorial: "The Rabin Challenge"]

[Text] It would be a vast exaggeration to assert that the country has been awaiting Yitzhaq Rabin's formal decision to throw his hat in the ring for the Labour Party leadership and his candidacy for the premiership with bated breath.

Now that Rabin has taken the plunge it should, however, be clearly stated that the mounting of such a challenge to Shim'on Peres, is entirely legitimate. For what more appropriate time is there for such a race than in conjunction with the convening of the party's quadrennial national convention?

This is all the more true in view of the fact that the convention will represent many new members who have joined Labour since its 1977 defeat at the hands of the Likud in the expectation of taking part in fielding a new Labour in the next elections.

The less than mass enthusiasm accompanying the announcement of the Rabin candidacy is a reminder of the fact that when those supporting him today decided to mount their challenge to the Peres leadership at the beginning of the year they passed over the former prime minister and chose instead the late Yig'al Allon.

That choice, with which Rabin concurred at the time, was to a large extent a comment on the lacklustre nature of the three-year Rabin premiership and on his disastrous inability to assume the mantle of party leader.

Be that as it may, the choice between Peres and Rabin is a matter for the Labour Party to make. But the country has a right to expect some clear talk from both men on two matters.

The most disastrous aspect of the last Labour government was the poisonous relationship between Prime Minister Rabin and Defence Minister Peres. It is essential that the Labour Party guarantee that it will not propose a government that will again include both men, which can only lead to paralysis at a time of growing troubles for Israel, both on the international and the domestic fronts.

Since neither of the two candidates has proven himself to be an electrifying leader the electorate has a right to know what leadership team Labour will propose to challenge the Likud. Internal party and personal considerations may temporarily militate against the naming of such a shadow cabinet at the present time. But it is the least that the electorate has a right to demand immediately upon the resolution of the race for the party's leadership.

GULF WAR MAY CAUSE U.S. REAPPRAISAL OF ISRAEL'S VALUE

TA101914 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 10 Oct 80 p 14

[Commentary by Yosef Harif: "Strategic Clarifications on the Lessons on the Iraq-Iran War To Be Conducted During Begin, al-Sadat Washington Visits"]

[Excerpts] On Prime Minister Begin's instructions Israel's ambassador to Washington warned the U.S. administration of the dangers inherent in Jordanian involvement on the Iraqi front, even if for the moment this involvement is a passive one. This time the United States was not, as it usually is, indifferent to Israel's warning, and assured it that it was aware of the dangerous situation evolving in the region.

What is it that worries the prime minister?

No great imagination is needed to guess what is worrying Begin: He is afraid that Jordan will, despite itself, find that it is rolling downhill, into Iraq's arms, even though its initial intention was to stay on this side of the line and not step over it and be dragged into the depths of the growing conflagration whose end no one can foretell. But regardless of what the outcome may be, from Israel's aspect the danger of an arranged match between Jordan and Iraq is extremely grave: Obviously--Begin thinks--Iraq will have to requite Jordan's good deed with a favor of its own, meaning that Iraq will form a united front against Israel with Jordan.

As is its custom, Washington might perhaps have taken the Israeli evaluations lightly, but this time it is starting to sense the danger; it is beginning to feel it where its interests are concerned and this is a very tangible danger indeed: If the Iraqis win, Baghdad will become the greatest oil power in the world, with all that this implies to Western economy and security. If Iraq does not win and Iran succeeds in dealing Iraq a decisive blow, then the Soviet Union could step in. Either way, the damage to U.S. interests could be considerable.

For weeks the United States has been acting as though struck by lightning and has not even begun to know what to do. Its warnings to Jordan, rather than being an expression of power, only underline the weakness of the U.S. administration, and most, if not all, of its political truths are collapsing day by day on the Iranian battlefield.

The question of whether the United States, which in this case is availing itself of Britain's assistance, will be able to extricate Jordan from the trap threatening it is a highly important one from the U.S. aspect; since Jordan, because of the move it chose to take, could reluctantly fall into Soviet hands. This is a U.S. question, yet it is far more serious from the Israeli aspect.

The fact that this development makes the idea of a "Jordanian option"--the Alignment's idea for an arrangement with Jordan, based on territorial compromise, even in the form of a continuing interim agreement--unrealistic is of secondary importance. The government autonomy idea cannot be fulfilled now either; even those who believed that it was fundamentally viable are agreed on that score. After all, according to the Camp David accords, Jordan has a role to play in the future arrangement once a permanent settlement is up for discussion; and according to Camp David, Jordan--together with Egypt and the representatives of the Palestinians residing in Judaea and Samaria--is supposed to be a partner in the autonomy negotiations. Its merger in the Iraqi Alignment excludes Jordan from any possible negotiations with Israel on a peace treaty on conditions that any Israeli government, even under the Alignment, could accept. If Husayn refused to talk to Israel before, and Jordan was not prepared to cooperate with either Israel or Egypt in the peace process previously, then now that Jordan has crossed the lines, counter to pronounced U.S. interests, can it be expected to change its mind and sit down at the negotiating table? If Iraq emerges the strong power from this war, will Husayn be in a position to defy it?

At first glance, the idea of a "Jordanian option" as the basis for a settlement appears to be an "Iraqi option," and no one here would venture to even entertain it. (Saddam Husayn, Iraq's bloodthirsty ruler, said that not only must an Israeli Jerusalem be opposed, but Tel Aviv, too, should be razed to the ground with bombs.) The emerging reality also makes al-Sadat's idea of a summit and the actual autonomy talks seem somehow other-wordly. The United States appears to recognize this fact as well, even though its entire policy in the region was based on the recognition that without a solution to the Palestinian problem there can be no peace and the United States will not be able to realize its hope of curbing Soviet expansionism in the Arab-Islamic world.

So far the United States has not brought Israel into its thinking; either because it is pretty confused these days and incapable of influencing to any real extent events that could well prove decisive for the future, or because its president is fighting for his political life in an election campaign in which, at this point, he has nothing to draw on that could give him courage. But from the little that reaches us from various sources it can be assumed that immediately after the presidential election, a reassessment of U.S. Middle East policy will be conducted, and in all likelihood those who already believe that it is not the Arab-Israeli conflict that should be at the center of things will predominate. With all its importance, it has been demonstrably proven that this complex conflict was not to blame for the lack of stability in the region.

If that is the approach taken, Israel's importance could rise side by side with that of Egypt, which has become an important part of U.S. strategy in the Middle East.

We do need a "summit" attended by the president of the United States, the president of Egypt and the prime minister of Israel. Such a planned summit can serve the interests of all three sides if it facilitates a more factual assessment of the situation and helps to establish a more realistic scale of priorities. Obviously such a summit cannot become a forum for strategic discussions without appearing to be an American-hatched "imperialistic plot," arranged with the connivance of Egypt and Israel. That is of course inconceivable, but there can be no doubt that when they visit Washington in the near future, Begin and al-Sadat respectively will attend bilateral talks (between the United States and Israel and the United States and Egypt) on developments in the region and on the real lessons that must be learned from them. Perhaps that is what Begin meant when he said that there would soon be a strategic dialog between Israel and the United States and that it would be conducted at the most senior level.

The U.S. inclination to ignore Israel, as displayed by the policy-shapers in Washington, naturally derived from the concept that since Israel--for lack of an alternative and due to its near total dependence on the United States--is in the Western camp anyway, the ones to be courted are the Arabs, even if that means hurting Israel.

This tendency might now become weaker. The fact is that when times were bad Washington wanted a dialog with Israel. There were two conspicuous such cases: After the Iraq revolution in 1958 it was the United States that held strategic consultations with Israel on how to act. Moreover, it asked Israel for its encouragement in Congress, to enable it to land Marines in Lebanon that year. And in 1970, when the United States accepted Israel's assistance to combat Syrian and Soviet intentions in Jordan. (In effect, it was proven in 1970 just how badly the United States needed Israel. Moshe Dayan, who was then defense minister, once recounted how U.S. generals came to Tel Aviv from Europe with old and obsolete maps, and showed themselves less than familiar with the terrain....)

At the start of the Iran-Iraq conflict many voices predicted a gloomy future: Whatever happened, it would be bad for Israel. Now second thoughts are being expressed. Perhaps, after all, things are not totally doomed for Israel. Perhaps the opposite is true. Perhaps at long last the United States will open its eyes and leave the world of illusion behind it.

Jordan did not follow Iraq into the latter's Iranian adventure because of Israel. The same holds true for Saudi Arabia, which is not treading the U.S. path. Senator Jackson once developed the theory that thanks to Israel both Jordan and Saudi Arabia continued to survive. This recognition, which could lead to a change of attitude toward Israel among Washington's policy-makers--no matter who they are--after the election, may not for the moment be forthcoming from the administration, but at least it cannot be passed over. From this aspect Israel is not all that pressed. The United States is more pressed, and that is why it immediately agreed with Israel and hastened to warn Jordan.

COMMENTATOR ON U.S. WILLINGNESS TO ACCEPT ISRAELI INITIATIVES

TA071700 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 7 Oct 80 p 5

[Commentary by Yehoshu'a Tadmor: "Washington Is Updating Its Stances: It Will Not Abandon Israel But Will Expect Israeli Initiatives"]

[Text] Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir could not have gone to Washington at a worse time. The U.S. elections are due in some 4 weeks and until 4 November there is simply nobody to talk to. The senior officials are also keeping silent because they know they might lose their jobs, even without saying anything out of the ordinary. This is known to anybody who has recently visited the United States and to anybody maintaining contact with the U.S. Embassy in Israel.

The feeling is that after the elections, if Israel comes up with a properly formulated plan on security issues in the West Bank, the U.S. administration officials will be prepared to listen and discuss it. Naturally, this would have to be a plan guaranteeing security for Israel but which would not deprive the autonomy plan, as formulated by the Israeli Government itself, of its key content. Yet even if such a plan were not acceptable to the Americans, Israel could still try to fight for it with Washington, for the sake of Israel's security. This, at least, is what senior level U.S. officials between one administration and another tell Israeli visitors.

On the autonomy issue, too, the Americans are not making any a priori repudiation of Israeli ideas. They have objected to most of the draft proposals submitted by Israel's autonomy delegation, but not every idea was turned down outright. For instance, over the weekend, an unofficial U.S. reaction was heard that the alternative suggested by Yitzhaq Rabin in his newspaper interview to the effect that Israel would be willing to examine the possibility of Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank if Husayn rejects all the initiatives, was "an interesting idea, worthy of examination" (it must not be ruled out that this reaction came from Washington). Even if this plan meets with Palestinian opposition, the very fact that the Americans have favored it is of significance, although it is noteworthy that the Americans are only referring to a temporary solution, until the final negotiations are conducted.

The United States expressly wants Jordan as a partner in the negotiations. In Washington they say that they will accept any settlement by Israel that will be also acceptable to Husayn, and the United States obviously prefers Husayn to al-Sadat in resolving the West Bank problem and they consider Jordan a senior partner in any Palestinian settlement. They will recommend a settlement with the Palestinians only if there is no other choice and when Israel reaches the conclusion that this is the best solution. As previously mentioned, this pertains only to an interim agreement within the timetable determined in the Camp David accords.

If no settlement is achieved, it is doubtful whether Washington will try to force a settlement on us. This is so utterly foreign to American tradition that it is difficult to imagine that Carter would risk such a move even if he were reelected. It is even more unlikely in view of the fact that any forced solution would entail U.S. responsibility for the agreement and for Israel's security. On the other hand, one must not delude oneself into believing that Washington would consent to bear for long the damage resulting from the conflict, of which both public opinion and both houses of Congress have grown tired.

The outgoing [as published] administration officials are surprised that Israel has not as yet come up with an initiative for making Washington side with Israel. Foreign Minister Shamir made a sort of last-minute effort to bring about a dialog between the United States and Israel, but his intentions, though good, came too late. No U.S. leader will start any kind of negotiations or real commitment 4 weeks before the election. Begin's government has forfeited in an unpardonable manner its chance for an early rapprochement with Washington and no matter what Shamir might do he will be unable to change this.

The Americans were also surprised at the fact that the Israeli Government has not attempted to come up with a serious plan for a settlement with Jordan. After all, it is a well established fact that the autonomy plan has been aground for a long time and there are some Israelis, including several cabinet ministers, who would have been willing to explore the Jordanian option. No such plan has reached the Americans, not even a nonbinding draft. The Americans claim that Israel preferred to first "finish business" with the Egyptians, and only then to concentrate on Jordan, but even in the negotiations with Egypt there was a lot of stalling which enraged the Egyptians. These Americans argue that Israel had two options at the time: to implement what was agreed upon with Egypt based on the Camp David accords or to immediately make alternative proposals that can advance the talks. Israel has done nothing to realize either of these two alternatives, nor has it shown any real initiative on the Jordanian issue. It did not submit any plan to the United States for discussion to advance the Washington-Amman talks and prevent the strengthening of the PLO.

Even now, the Americans do not reject the concept of "security borders" in the Jordan Rift Valley. What they are saying is that such a border, and any settlement with Jordan, cannot be considered as an ultimate solution. They see no harm in Israel and Jordan reaching an interim solution that will last several years, so that the bitterness can be mitigated in the meantime and the severity of the conflict reduced--all this provided that no attempt is made to devoid the Camp David accords of their original content, the Americans argue.

These comments indicate the Americans' adherence to the framework of the agreement, while showing readiness to be flexible toward different initiatives and their implementation, and indicates their determination to bring Jordan into the agreement almost by force. The United States shows some willingness to accept

Israeli plans for a unilateral evacuation of certain sections if only in order to force Husayn to join the agreement. This means that the Americans are putting the onus back on Israel, saying: We are ready to accept any arrangement that the Israelis and the Arabs agree upon and that will dissipate the hostility. We are not interested, nor can we be dragged again and again into delicate tests, which will oblige us to take a unilateral stance, sometimes in Israel's favor, other times with the Arabs. If you assist us in ridding ourselves of this burden, we will even help Israel become an integral component of the strategic fabric of the region. In the meantime you had better know your place, and we shall talk in more concrete terms after 4 November.

PERES VIEWS IRAN-IRAQ WAR, KING HUSAYN

TA081215 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1105 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] Labor Party Chairman Shim'on Peres [words indistinct] at a meeting with correspondents on party affairs today, about the war between Iran and Iraq.

[Begin Peres recording] The picture of the eastern front, which is becoming clearer, looks like this: Because of the relations between, let us say, Syria and Iraq, al-Asad is going to Moscow in November [as heard] and they themselves, the Syrians, have already leaked that they are going to sign an unusual treaty with the Russians--one that contains an element of much deeper Soviet involvement than we have ever known anywhere else. Now a set of relations, which it is still hard to define, is about to be established between Iraq and Jordan. Jordan says Iraq is its strategic rear. What interests us is not whether Iraq is Jordan's strategic rear, but whether Jordan is Iraq's strategic rear. We have always said we would not be able to simply accept it if, for example, Iraqi forces enter Jordan. Incidentally, from our point of view there is a difference between Jordan sending forces to Iraq and Iraq sending forces to Jordan and this must be clarified. Now, in my view, King Husayn must be asked what he wants. If he wants war, then, first of all, this must be brought to the knowledge of the public and all the required conclusions must be drawn. [Words indistinct] we have to know if he is preparing for a war with Israel. If this is so then do not let him appear in the United States or Austria or Europe as a peace-lover. If this is true then he is a man who is preparing for war and then, in my opinion, we must also appeal to all the countries of the world and say, here, once more this man is preparing for war. This must not be simply accepted. Of course the following should also concern the United States: that al-Asad is going to Moscow, King Husayn is going to Moscow, King Husayn is making an agreement with the other Husayn, Saddam Husayn, and all of a sudden a Soviet zone of influence will be created here which will include Iraq, Syria and Jordan; if this is the case. 'HA'ARETZ' COMMENTS ON ISRAEL'S ATTITUDE TOWARD JORDAN TODAY

[Commentary by Ze'ev Schiff: "The Red Line in Jordan"]

[Text] A Middle Eastern absurd play is being performed in al-'Aqabah at the moment. The actors are Iraq and Jordan and the silent, indifferent spectator is Israel. Right under our noses, within the range of artillery fire, military equipment and ammunition are streaming in for the Iraqi Army and its war in the Persian Gulf, a war defined by both Jordan and Iraq as the first stage in a war against Israel, to liberate Palestine.

Israel does not generally need to intervene in wars between Arab countries and there is nothing bad in the fact that they are spilling each other's blood. However, it should be recalled that this rule does not always apply; as witnessed by the military aid Israel gave both to the Kurds against Iraq and to the Christians and others in Lebanon, against the PLO. There have been other instances in which we did not keep our fingers out of the dish, beginning with the Yemen war in the 1960's and going on to our intervention (by concentrating forces) when Syria invaded Jordan. The trend has always been to defend Israeli interests by weakening and distracting the militant Arab factor, by supporting minorities and moderate factors in the region.

The Iran-Iraq war and the Jordanian involvement in it are different from the cases previously mentioned. However, it is important to stress that had this war developed in 1975, when the shah imposed the partition of Shatt-al-Arab on Iraq, Israel would have taken an active stance at Iran's side. Conditions today have changed not only in Iran, but also in Jordan (which at one time enjoyed Iranian military aid in the form of F-5 planes and engines for them). The change has been expressed not only in King Husayn's statement that when the war in the Persian Gulf ends, it will be Israel's turn, but, first of all, in the latest remarks by the head of the intelligence branch of the General Staff, Maj Gen Yehoshu'a Sagi, to the effect that "it is clear that Jordan is making thorough preparations for the next war with Israel," this is a most grave statement to which, for some reason, no attention was paid.

Now, after the absurd play in which Iraqi ships have been unloading weapons under our very eyes, we ask the question: What country that respects itself and looks after its long-term security as it should would accept such challenges? I am trying to imagine how Ben-Gurion would have reacted if Israel had confronted such a situation when he was alive. From his vigorous reaction to the possibility of Iraqi forces being stationed in Jordan (during the period of retaliation actions on the eve of the Sinai campaign), it may be assumed that Israel, which was then very much weaker, would have flexed its muscles and shown its teeth. Israel's reaction to the development of the Jordanian-Iraqi axis and the other events in the area teaches us that we have become the good child of the Middle East. We are the too sane party, all of whose moves may be evaluated with absolute precision. We are a something over which there is no need to take any trouble.

It is right now, when the Arab world has experienced a grave polarization, when several of its flanks have been over-exposed, that it is obvious just to what extent we do not know how to take advantage of an opportunity. If Israel had aggressive aims, it would have taken advantage of al-Asad's regime's weakness a long time ago and struck it. Nor does it take the advantage it should of the PLO's weakness in Lebanon. And when Jordan is dragged into militantism defined by the head of the intelligence branch as a preparation for war, we are as surprised by this development as though it was a question of a war against someone else, not us. I am not trying to claim that taking advantage of opportunities always takes the form of using force. There are also other channels, primarily political ones. For example, this is the right time to speed up the atuonomy negotiations with Egypt, by making mutual concessions. With a more credible show of muscles in certain sections of the eastern front, we could achieve rapid compromises in the autonomy negotiations with Egypt.

The Iraq-Iran war could also lead to Iraq finding it difficult to send forces and resources westward, to the front with Israel, for a long time. But even such a possibility, which is positive from our viewpoint, should not release us from setting ourselves a red line in Jordan. When the Syrian Army penetrated Lebanon, Yitzhaq Rabin, who was prime minister at the time, claimed that this would weaken Damascus and make things more complicated for it. Nevertheless, this evaluation did not prevent a fairly clear red line, from our viewpoint, from being laid down. This red line was that Israel would not suffer Syrian units to be stationed in southern Lebanon.

This should also be the case in Jordan. As long as the Jordanian-Iraq effort is aimed eastward, at the Persian Gulf, fine. Nor will the rift between Jordan and Syria be harmful. But we must not agree to Iraq, under the guise of a war in the Persian Gulf, beginning to build up a new military infrastructure in Jordan. This, in my view, is Israel's red line in Jordan. This is very much more grave because Iraq is aiming at a military nuclear option. It would be an error on our part to make short-term judgments and evaluations of the situation, based on only the low efficiency of the Iraqi Air Force today.

The development of the Iraqi infrastructure in Jordan began a long time ago, but now is the time to stop or delay it, while Iraq is busy with its war in the Persian Gulf. The military and other aid Jordan is receiving from the Baghdad Pact countries, and primarily from Iraq, is quadruple what it is receiving from the United States. There are reports that Iraq is even paying for weapons Jordan is purchasing from the United States and France. Visits to Jordan by Iraqi Army leaders, defense ministers, intelligence leaders and air force commanders have been known for some time. All the signs indicate that, parallel with developing the al-'Aqabah port and the network of highways leading to Jordan, both countries are trying to achieve intelligence and air coordination (directed, first of all, against Israel).

The cat was let out of the bag when the war in the Persian Gulf broke out. The danger, as stated, is that under this guise, Iraqi emergency reserves will be set up in Jordan. It is reasonable to assume that Husayn will opt for the maintenance of equipment for Iraqi armored divisions instead of having the entire division stationed there. Such an infrastructure could disrupt Israel's early warning system and make it easier to move Iraqi forces to our border. In other words, Israel must oppose not only Iraqi forces being stationed in Jordan, but also the establishment of Iraqi military equipment and ammunition stores in that country.

For this reason, it was an error on our part to have accepted the stationing of Iraqi aircraft in Jordan with understanding and unspoken agreement. As soon as we discovered this, we should have signaled Husayn that this was a precedent likely to jeopardize Israel's security. What disrupted and misled both Israel and Jordan was the U.S. intervention in this matter. As soon as Washington took the trouble to let us know about the appearance of the Iraqi aircraft in Jordan, it could be understood that Washington had authorized this. But even if this is Washington's position, it does not fit in with Israel's interests. We should have reacted more sharply and clearly. It would then have been apparent to Husayn what Israel's red line was on the Iraqi issue.

Because we did not make our position clear, matters developed rapidly. Husayn declared that this was the first stage in the expected war against Israel, and ships carrying Iraqi weapons began to arrive at al-'Aqabah. Nor can we dismiss the possibility that at the same time Iraqi troops came to Jordan in the framework of the transfer of the military equipment from al-'Aqabah to their country. Husayn is too exposed to provoke Israel on this issue. In this Iraq cannot come to his aid, nor, certainly, can Syria. It is clear that imposing an Israeli blockade on al-'Aqabah would have aroused the Security Council, which is helpless as concerns the Persian Gulf war. Imposing an Israeli blockade on a country's only port is not something simple, although almost the same thing is happening in the Persian Gulf. But Israel could make it plain to Husayn, who regards the current war as a stage in the war against us, that we will not suffer the entry and anchoring of Iraqi ships laden with weapons in the Gulf of Elat. This signal would be understood and would prevent other precedents.

COMMENTATOR ANALYZES JORDANIAN SUPPORT FOR IRAQ

TA101223 Tel Aviv YEDI'OT AHARONOT in Hebrew 10 Oct 80 Sabbath Supplement p 4

[Commentary by Arye Avneri: "Israel Warned--But the United States Belittled Husayn's Coming Out for Iraq"]

[Excerpts] The leaders of Jordan and Iraq view the war against Iran as a kind of commencement of a political and military struggle against Israel and against American imperialism, in an effort to liberate Palestine. King Husayn, for example, constantly reiterates that the Iran-Iraq war is aimed at redeeming all Arab land--and he makes no distinction between Iranian-held Arab land and Israeli-held Arab land. Husayn even takes the trouble to say, albeit in the form of not very subtle hints, that whereas the PLO is hesitating and is avoiding the adoption of a clear stance on the Iraq-Iran war, Jordan has decided to mobilize all its resources in Iraq's aid.

The PLO is in fact politically embarrassed. Its leaders have declared neutrality on the Iran-Iraq conflict, and this finds expression in the PLO press. A recent editorial in AL-FAJR was entitled "Neutrality--Our Concern." But this fence-sitting by the PLO is not strengthening its standing in the Arab world. The PLO has been weakened, at least politically, in the war's wake.

The PLO leaders are aware of the fact that the Iran-Iraq war has done away with one of their most effective advertising slogans, which they have succeeded in inculcating into many heads worldwide. This war has demonstrated clearly that it is nonsense to say that the Palestinian issue constitutes the main and central cause of the instability in our region. Following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, after the struggle between Syria and Iraq and after several other similar developments, the war between the two Muslim states has shown that the Palestinian issue is on the fringes of the region's problems, not at their center.

Moreover, precisely the Iran-Iraq war has demonstrated clearly, in contrast to assertions by the PLO and its supporters, that in the wake of the Camp David accords Egypt is today the most stable country in the Arab world, both politically and militarily. It has also shown that, above and beyond all the talk and showiness of the Saudis and Kuwaitis, the United States is the only country capable of guaranteeing their well-being and their future.

The question that is preoccupying the Israeli defense establishment's heads who are following the partnership being forged between Jordan and Iraq, is whether that partnership will lead to the establishment of an actual alliance between the two countries. Jordan, at least, believes that its backing of Iraq imposes on Baghdad a large degree of commitment vis-a-vis Amman when it will require Iraqi assistance. Nor does the problem end here. The United States, for example, could support such an alliance on the assumption or hope that they would have influence over it. A parallel calculation could be made from the other side, by the USSR.

Israel cannot acquiesce in the current U.S. approach to the Iran-Iraq war, and certainly not in Jordan's involvement in that war. It has warned Washington that it will not be able to accept the arming of Jordan, which declares publicly that its policy, including its rapprochement with Iraq, is aimed at liberating Jerusalem "from the Zionist contamination" and the soil of occupied Palestine from the Zionists.

One of the molders of Israel's security policy, Deputy Prime Minister Prof Yiga'el Yadin, said within the past few days: "It must not be forgotten that the declared policy of the Alignment government stated that an Iraqi presence in Jordan constitutes a security threat to Israel. If this was true in the past, this truth is all the more valid today, for what is involved is an emerging alliance between Jordan and a different and new Iraq which is developing, among other things, also nuclear arms." Yadin added that Iraq's ruler had even stated in these days that this nuclear weaponry is directed against Israel. "A situation in which Jordan, which receives U.S. arms, officially supports Iraq, is a new reality in the region which must be of concern to Israel."

The fear is that Husayn's joining the Iraqi camp--which ultimately may prove to be a fatal mistake on his part--changes Israel's situation. Husayn is liable to bring disaster on his own nation--before that, however, he will seriously embroil the regional state of affairs.

At the same time, no far-reaching conclusions should be drawn too quickly, and the present situation, which is still not the final picture, requires a thorough and close examination by Israel and by the entire Western world.

WEST BANK, GAZA ARABS SAID TO SUPPORT KING HUSAYN'S GULF POLICY

TA101747 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 10 Oct 80 p 15

[Commentary by Dani Rubinstein: "'Knight of Arab Nationalism'"]

[Excerpt] The Amman monarch has now forged friendship and all alliance with one of the most radical and revolutionary regimes in the Arab world. For him this is unparalleled patriotic legitimation. The Jordanian regime is now presenting itself as one of the knights of fighting Arab nationalism. To anyone who accuses him of sidestepping the campaign for Palestine, Husayn replies: The war for the Arab territories on the Iranian border is a stage in the struggle to purge the contamination from holy Jerusalem and to liberate the road to Jaffa (quotations from two of his speeches). True, Husayn has reined his relations with Syria, but against the shaky regime in Damascus he now has the backing of Iraq, which can also offer him massive monetary aid.

King Husayn's maneuvers over the past year have strengthened him considerably. Ever since the start of the Arab summit conferences, no one imagined that Amman would host any summit meeting. This is a contribution to the prestige of the host ruler which no one ever thought to accord to Husayn. Just 2 years ago or less people would have laughed if anyone had raised the idea of a summit meeting in Amman. But now for the first time Amman has been selected for a summit meeting—though it is doubtful whether it will be held because of the war on the Iranian border. One way or the other, the selection of Jordan for the summit is a milestone on King Husayn's path, and in the intra-Arab labyrinth of rifts and chaos he finds himself stronger than ever before. This strengthening enables him to gamble on the alliance he has entered into with Iraq.

Against this background it is interesting that Jordan's aid to Iraq is enjoying quite a bit of sympathy in the West Bank and Gaza. In the past it could be asserted with certainty that any action by the Jordanian regime would encounter criticism and abuse among the radical Palestinians residing west of the Jordan. This time, too, a little criticism was leveled at Husayn's involvement in the Iran-Iraq war, but it was minor and quiet. It is quite difficult to come out against the Jordanian monarch, who is about to visit Moscow and who i aiding Iraqi revolutionism. Are these not manifestations of loyal Arab nationalism? Most of those who are termed "national circles" in the West Bank and Gaza are maintaining a quiet neutrality in the Iran-Iraq war, and an Arab journalist from East Jerusalem told me: "In such a case, neutrality or standing aside means support for the side that attacked and conquered." The lawyer Zuhayr al-Ra'is, who is considered a PLO supporter, published in his paper THE NEW WEEK (AL-USBU'A AL-JADID) an editorial entitled "Arabism Comes First" (that is, not Islam). In this article he asserts that Iran should have recognized the rights of the Arab minority in its territory and given up its expansionist ambitions in the Gulf. It was in the same spirit that Ziyad Abu-Ziyad, an editor of AL-FAJR, wrote a few months ago when he expressed his appreciation for the goals of the Khomeyni revolution.

Obviously, the traditional West Bank leadership immediately expressed its support for Husayn and his aid to Iraq, as did the Muslim religious establishment, one of whose spokesmen a week ago preached a sermon in al-Aqsa expressing support for Iraq and sharply condemning Iranian Islam which, he said, is built "on an American model." The youth and students in Nabulus, Ramallah and Gaza find it difficult to say even one word in favor of Husayn, and during the sermon at al-Aqsa there were even outbreaks of anger at the shaykh who condemned Iran. However, when I asked acquaintances to evaluate the attitude toward Husayn today in the territories, I was told that this is perhaps the first time in a long time that fairly broad support exists for Amman's policy, support based also on the enhancement and strengthening of Jordan's standing in the Arab world.

In the near future we shall be able to judge whether King Husayn has succeeded in directing his steps well. In the meantime, he is benefiting from the distress of the PLO, which has been paralyzed in Lebanon, from al-Asad's troubles, from al-Sadat's isolation, from the fears about internal stability in Saudi Arabia; and he is positing himself as a solid strategic rear for the war which Iraq is presenting as the war of the Arab nation and Arab nationalism against the aliens who harm it.

ADDITIONAL 10 MILLION SHEKELS ALLOTTED FOR GOVERNMENT OFFICES

TA190926 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 19 Oct 80 pp 1, 2

[Report by El'azar Levin, economic affairs correspondent: "In the Midst of the Deliberations on Government Budget Cuts, the Treasury Decided To Allocate an Additional 10 Million Shekels To Build Offices for Government Officials in the Capital"]

[Text] The treasury has recently decided to spend 10 million shekels beyond the budget allocation to build offices for government officials in Jerusalem. This was approved by the Knesset Finance Committee in the midst of the deliberations on cuts in the government's budget.

Among other things, this involves an expenditure in excess of the estimated 2.8 million shekels for the office building in al-Shaykh Jarrah designated for the prime minister's office. It now appears that the construction of this building will cost 16.8 million shekels and not 14 million shekels, as called for by the original plan. Also, further expenditure involving several million shekels will be necessary in order to rent an office building on Mamila Road from the "Karta" company and renovate it for the office units to be transferred to Jerusalem. It is not known which units are in question.

The following are the special extra expenses recently approved by the Knesset Finance Committee at the request of the treasury:

--A dormitory in Bet Al: Private individuals have been building a 20-room dormitory in Bet Al near the Hesder Yeshiva there. The dormitory will cost 2 million shekels, or 100,000 shekels per room. This is heavy expenditure given current market prices. Treasury Director General Ya'aqov Ne'eman personally approved a government allotment of 500,000 shekels to finance part of the construction work. (This he did jointly with the Construction Ministry's director of the rural building and new settlements department.) The rest of the money will be raised by donors in Israel and abroad. The Finance Committee was not told why the construction work is so expensive.

--Commemorating [Irgun leader turned communist] Moshe Sne: On 4 November 1979, a few days before he resigned from the treasury, Simha Ehrlich approved a government allocation of 5 million shekels for the establishment of a fund to commemorate Moshe Sne. Contrary to this pledge, the funds for this were not included in the state budget as presented to the Knesset. Now the treasury is asking the Knesset committee to approve the transfer of half the sum, or 250,000 shekels. The nature of the commemoration fund, the name of its director or that of the person who would be responsible for the money were not provided.

--The Sede Boqer College: The college encountered a deficit because the Ben-Gurion University at Beersheba did not fulfill its promise to transfer 660,000 shekels to finance the college's Negev Studies Institution. The college approached the treasury with a request for aid and the Finance Ministry agreed to provide it with all the necessary funds.

--Fencing at Qalandiyah: Stones have been thrown at cars driving along the road near the Qalandiyah School. It was therefore decided to build a fence to prevent disturbances. How much erection of the fence will cost is not known, but the coordinator of activities in the territories is known to have allocated 25,000 shekels toward it.

--Patrols in the territories: It was decided to set up a patrol comprising three supervising teams--six people altogether--to guard state land in Judaea, Samaria and Gaza since there was constant penetration into those plots for the purpose of cultivation and residence [by Arabs and Bedouin]. The establishment of the patrol will cost 400,000 shekels annually, but this includes its communication equipment costs.

--Savings in the police force: Now that al-'Arish has been returned to Egypt, police activity in northern Sinai has been limited. It was subsequently decided to freeze 15 Israeli positions and 62 local positions. The 1.3 million shekels that have been saved will be kept in reserve. This sum may, in the future, be returned to the police budget.

DISPUTE OVER DEFENSE BUDGET UPDATED

[Report by military correspondent Ze'ev Schiff: "New Dispute Over Updating of the Defense Budget: Defense Ministry Demands 5 Billion Shekels, the Treasury Is Willing To Allocate Only 3 Billion"]

[Text] A new dispute over the defense budget occurred recently after the Defense Ministry demanded an additional 5 billion shekels from the treasury to compensate for this year's price hikes. The treasury recognizes in principle the demand for covering the price hikes but argues that the Defense Ministry is demanding some 10 billion Israeli pounds [as published] beyond the estimate, and this may cause the economy to once again enter an inflationary spiral.

When the 1980 defense budget was determined, the Defense Ministry and the Finance Ministry agreed on an arrangement according to which the IDF and the defense system would be compensated for the rising prices in the economy. According to the agreement, the defense establishment will be compensated during the first 6 months of the year for all the price hikes. It was also decided that compensation for the last 6 months will be for 80 percent of the price hikes. According to Defense Ministry calculations estimating that this year's inflation will reach 137 percent, the ministry demands an additional 5 billion shekels. In addition, the defense establishment is requesting 220 million shekels--which it claims it is entitled to--for the project of IDF deployment in the Negev.

Contrary to this demand, the treasury is offering the defense establishment a sum of 4 billion shekels for the price hikes. The treasury intends to subtract 900 million shekels from this amount that have been cut from the defense budget by a cabinet decision, so that the amount the treasury is willing to allocate to the defense establishment is 3 billion shekels.

As regards the demand to pay 220 million shekels for the Negev deployment project, the treasury officials replied that the project in question has not yet been realized, and they will be willing to discuss this topic only after the IDF starts implementing the project.

RELIGIOUS AFFAIRS MINISTER ISSUES STATEMENT

TA082013 Jerusalem Domestic Television Service in Hebrew 1900 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Religious Affairs Minister Aharon Abu-Hatzera was interrogated today at National Police headquarters for 5 hours. It is not yet clear whether the minister will be summoned for another interrogation. On this, our police reporter Dan Semama:

[Semama] For 5 hours Religious Affairs Minister Aharon Abu-Hatzera was interrogated today in an office at National Police headquarters in Jerusalem. The religious affairs minister arrived in his office about 2 hours ago, and, following a consultation with several of his advisers and with his lawyers, he issued the following statement for publication. I shall now read the statement.

For some months now a campaign has been conducted against me in the media, entirely based on gossip and slanders. This campaign, which is totally unprecedented in the annals of the country, and for which there is no place in enlightened states, included character assassination, deliberate leaks and a witch hunt, nor did any of this fail to omit my friends and the members of my family.

I saw no point in reacting to all the reports in order not to adversely affect the investigation, despite the suffering which was my lot. I have much to say on the manner and content of the investigation and on its character, on being judged before being tried and on the search for libelling state's witnesses at any price. But even now, this is not the time to say everything I have to say on this subject.

After my legal advisers were told that the police wanted to question me as a suspect. [as received] Like any other citizen, the law accords me the right to refuse to reply or respond to the suspicions. But I chose to appear, nonetheless, before the police and to respond to all the accusations. I appeared before a team of police investigators, which included Deputy Commander Binyamin Ziegel, in two meetings which together lasted for 9 hours. I requested and was given details concerning the accusations, and in these meetings I reacted to all the accusations.

During these many hours I gave my version and my explanations for all the accusations raised against me. I also replied to many questions on various and diverse subjects. Following these many hours of interrogation, I informed the interrogators that since we were dealing with questions that contain only gossip, I see no point in the continuation of these talks.

That is all from the Religious Affairs Ministry.

COMMENTATOR DISCUSSES GOLAN HEIGHTS ANNEXATION

TA051041 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 5 Oct 80 p 9

[Article by Dan Margalit: "The Golan Heights Syndrome"]

[Excerpts] Today a new round--perhaps the final, decisive round--opens in the struggle for the application of Israeli law to the Golan Heights. The timing of the meeting in Upper Galilee is not accidental. A week before the opening of the new Knesset session the [Golan Heights] lobby wishes to remind most of the MK's that they signed a petition calling for the annexation of the Golan. They are now being called upon to support by legislation the circulars they signed.

There is a difference between the parliamentary struggle that preceded passage of the Jerusalem Law about 2 months ago and the campaign over the future of the Golan. Jerusalem is focused at the heart of the national consensus. The Golan Heights is a borderline, perhaps even a fringe issue, within the framework of the general agreement. The Jerusalem Law showed that the debate among the Zionist parties was not substantive but centered on matters of formulation and timing. With respect to the Golan Heights, a substantive dispute is possible. No less important is the fact that the struggle over annexation of the heights is getting underway after Israel's experience with the Jerusalem Law. True, if annexation is decided on there will not be 12 embassies pulling out of Majdal Shams; but international activity at the United Nations and in other institutions will be similar to that which accompanied the passage of the Jerusalem Law.

Even the lineup of legal-historical arguments is not identical. Prime Minister Menahem Begin reminded the State Department that it was the United States alone that determined the location of its capital, and the same goes for Israel in Jerusalem. He cannot base himself on this kind of reasoning when what is involved is the unilateral application of Israeli law to a territory like the Golan Heights. The Americans, who unwillingly confirmed Begin's legal argument on Jerusalem, disagree with him when it comes to unilateral annexation.

In certain ways the Golan issue is more interesting than the Jerusalem Law. Internally, it will focus attention on the Alignment faction, because the political forces and the economic interests participating in the current struggle derive their inspiration from political events in the Labor Party and from various sections in the Moshav and Kibbutz movements. The Tehiya movement's Ge'ula Kohen is no longer the "national leader" on the Golan issue, as she was on the Jerusalem Law issue, but only a detonating fuse.

The majority of the Labor Party establishment committed itself to supporting the annexation of the Golan, and all its leaders are bound (imprisoned) to documents confirming this. Now a Labor Party group has arisen that believes there is no need to annex the Golan, but because of previous commitments finds itself unable to contest the issue employing arguments of principle. It must justify its retreat from its original position with the awkward claim that the timing for the Golan's annexation is inconvenient. As party political debates in Israel have demonstrated, the timing argument constitutes a narrow base, which is not always sufficient to curb political initiatives based on popular demands.

The difficulty is that the internal relations in the Labor Party do not allow its MK's to reformulate their stand and to object to the annexation in unison. Shim'on Peres may oppose the Golan's annexation, but will Yitzhaq Rabin, who depends on the support of the Kibbutz Hame'uhad movement? It is precisely the Kibbutz Hame'uhad movement that is conspicuously represented in the agricultural settlement on the Golan. It is clear that if the Golan annexation issue slides into the vale of tears of the Labor Party's internal debate the Alignment faction will not be able to come out against the proposed move, and this may even lead to the opposite result: that both camps will be quick to support the annexation on the assumption that it is popular, and they cannot "allow themselves" to be on the other side.

Clearly, considerable opposition to the annexation is to be expected. The doves will call for the settlement of the Golan, not its annexation. The position of the Druze there is not uniform. It is probable that the Foreign Ministry and other institutions dealing with the problems of the Middle East will seek to take into account Syria's delicate position in its hostility to Iraq and Damascus' indirect influence on the Baghdad-Tehran conflict. The discussions on the Golan's annexation will take place not only in the Knesset's Constitution, Law and Justice Committee, but also in the Foreign Affairs and Security Committee, which will gauge the effect of the annexation on the relations developing in the Middle East subsystem in the context of the conflict between Iran and Iraq.

When all is said and done, even those favoring the annexation realize that its implementation at this time is liable to create a new anti-Israel focus of tension, precisely in the midst of the conflict in the Persian Gulf in which Israel has no part.

At this stage the prospects of the opposition to the annexation are unclear. They will apparently depend on the energy and effectiveness involved and on the ability to constantly bring up the results of the Jerusalem Law.

'MA'ARIV' ON WEST BANK'S ECONOMIC PROSPERITY

TA051328 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 5 Oct 80 p 15

[Article by 'Amos Levav: "The West Bank: a Taxless Land Bursting With Money"]

[Text] "It is good to be an Arab resident of the West Bank today. They pay (virtually) no taxes and pay no municipal taxes (at all). Every order or law relating to taxes is accompanied here by political calculations," explained military government personnel who are in charge of tax collection in the territories. "The law prevailing in Judaea and Samaria is the Jordanian law, and where taxation is concerned, it is easier."

In the West Bank you will find goods at half price. People will tell you that they pay no taxes, that their businesses are flourishing and they have food in abundance. If you win their confidence they will reveal to you that many stolen goods find their way from inside the green line to the territories, that black capital can easily be exchanged with Nabulus money-changers (who do not balk at trading in stolen gold, either) and that a house can be built on any hill overnight.

About 4 years ago, when VAT was introduced inside the green line, an added customs tax was introduced in the West Bank. More precisely, an attempt was made to introduce it. "International law bans the imposition of taxes in administered territory, but allows the expansion of existing taxes," the military government personnel explained. Therefore, an added customs tax was decided on, but the attempt to impose it on the residents of the territories was accompanied by violent disturbances. The result, the military government personnel admitted, was "minimal application."

The law was applied gradually. First of all its existence was made public. Slowly, the businesses were registered--14,000 all told. Then taxes began to be collected from them according to declarations and calculations. And then came the Camp David peace talks, and the application process was frozen. Today, too, full tax is not collected. "We also have manpower problems," the military government personnel explained and refused to state the number of tax collectors in the territories.

The other two taxes that are "collected" in the territories are income tax and municipal property tax. Income tax is, by Jordanian law, very low. But even this little bit goes virtually uncollected in the territories. The entire income tax is supposed to be transferred to the military government. Property tax is "collected" by the military government, 90 percent of it going to the municipalities and 10 percent to the military government as administrative fees.

"This system is problematic," the military government personnel reiterated frankly. "The tax rates have hardly been raised, but the main problem is the low motivation of the local clerks to collect taxes for the military government. The local clerks are afraid and are considered by their brethren to be collaborators with the authorities." The tax collectors in the territories are local Arabs. The result: negligible collection. "We are going to have Jews do work in the field also, and not just in administration," the military government personnel promised.

In the past 6 months the tax collectors in the territories have succeeded in collecting 60 percent of the estimate. How much money is involved? What was the estimate? Silence. "Delicate political considerations accompany tax collection in the territories," the military government personnel explained. "It is difficult to check the tax evaders. Declarations of capital may not be demanded in the West Bank, and the vast sums of money flowing in to the West Bank from the United States, South Africa and the Persian Gulf states make any examination of the 'assessees' difficult. Therefore, there are no examinations. The West Bank is bursting with money," the military government officials stressed.

The key question is: What happens to a relatively small place that is "bursting with money"? Does the money flow into Jordan? Into Israel? Or does it perhaps remain in the West Bank?

"We have full control today over the money that comes in via the bridges. There is no emergent tendency of the money being drained from the West Bank into Jordan," the military government personnel asserted.

Nor does the money enter Israel in any significant amount. Thus it remains in the West Bank, awaiting an opportunity to burst out. In the meantime it is waiting, mainly in dollars, gold and Jordanian dinars (the Jordanian dinar, a relatively hard currency, is legal tender in the West Bank). Israeli security men carrying out a search in a poor-looking house in some remote village are often surprised to find tens of thousands of Jordanian dinars inside a door serving its owner as a bedboard. "Hiding dinars in doors is a usual method," said security men.

Once a month the official rate of the dinar in the territories is published (not every day, as is the case inside the green line). The residents of the areas have come to know that their shekels buy fewer dinars at the end of the month. Therefore, when they receive their wages, they rush to the money-changers to exchange their shekels for dinars. "Money-changing is legal in the territories. Therefore, it is flourishing. The money-changers deal also in stolen gold. This is a dark business," said the military government personnel.

The banks in the territories have been closed since the Six-Day War. Although Bank Le'umi and the Israel Discount Bank have opened a few branches, the residents of the territories are afraid to deposit their money in a Jewish bank.

There has recently been an increase in the number of residents of the territories who deposit money in Jewish banks but the number is still negligible.

Finance Ministry officials heard about the "Vaduz Paradise" in the West Bank and held their breath. They knew about the existence of a legal loophole which enabled an Israeli firm to shift its location from Tel Aviv to Nabulus and enjoy extensive tax benefits which are enjoyed by firms in the territories. "Surprisingly, the West Bank did not become Vaduz. Apparently, the place is not safe enough. After all, it is not a country," say the military government officials. In 1978 the loophole was sealed: A law was instituted saying that what applies to an Israeli firm within the bounds of the green line applies also to an Israeli firm in the territories.

But the possibility exists--and there is proof of its application in practice--of "silent partnerships." A wealthy Jewish contractor, investing a vast sum, places it in the hands of an Arab in the territories, who sets up a plant in his name alone. The risk is that the Arab will disappear after the plant's establishment; but a Jew entering into such a deal does not exactly solve his problems in a court of law, as the Arab well knows.

Only 25 percent of the tax potential is collected in the territories, and the military government personnel admit frankly: "There is no strict application of the tax laws in the territories. It is easier to arrest the treasurer of the Tel Aviv municipality than the treasurer of the Nabulus municipality."

The treasury understands the problem and forgoes much money. Experts have calculated that if the treasury were to apply Israeli tax laws in the territories, the collection would decline even more, and possibly nothing at all would be collected. "The collection would cost several times as much as the amount that would be collected," the military government officials say. "This is a storm, but this storm does not affect the country as a whole. If an aquarium in an apartment has storms and waves does that affect the entire apartment?" they ask, and themselves reply with a resounding no.

Nonetheless, the storm in the aquarium is liable to cause damage to the apartment. Water could spill on the carpet and splash on the walls. It is possible that the storm in the "Vaduz of Israel" is not yet being felt but its effect is great and penetrating and the Israeli underworld has discovered the treasure hidden 20 km from Netanya.

PUBLIC UNDECIDED ABOUT BEGIN'S STRENGTH

[Pori public opinion poll: "Forty Percent: Begin Is a Strong Man; 40 Percent: He Is Weak, Gives Way to Pressure"]

[Text] The Israeli public has divided opinions about the personality of Prime Minister Menahem Begin. About 40 percent think that Mr Begin is a strong man who knows how to insist on what he wants and about 40 percent hold views to the contrary, that he is a weak man who gives way easily to pressure. This emerges from a Pori Institute nationwide public opinion poll conducted at the request of HA'ARETZ.

When asked: "What do you think about Prime Minister Menahem Begin: Is he a man who knows how to insist on what he wants when this is necessary, or does he give way easily to pressure?" 41.8 percent said he is a man who knows how to insist on what he wants when this is needed and 40.7 percent replied that he is a man who gives way easily to pressure.

Another 6 percent said this depended on the "situation," the "circumstances" and the "strength of the pressure."

The remaining 11.5 percent said they "did not know" what sort of a man the prime minister is.

An analysis of the findings according to the class of people interviewed proves that it is the younger generation born in Israel or originating in the Asian and African countries who are more prominent among those who think that Mr Begin is a strong man, while it is the older people, those who have lived in Israel since before the state was established and those originating in the countries of Europe and America, who think that Menahem Begin is a weak man who gives way easily to pressure.

The poll covered a representative sample of 1,200 men and women interviewed personally throughout the country.

POLLS SHOW MORE CITIZENS BELIEVE GOVERNMENT SHOULD RESIGN

TA031731 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 3 Oct 80 p 18

[Fifth in a series of pollster Hanokh Smith's "Election Forecasts": "The Number of Persons Who Believe the Government Should Resign Has Increased"]

[Text] As the public opinion polls of the Smith Research Center published in the four preceding articles indicate, the public has expressed increasing dissatisfaction with the functioning of the government.

In the period between May 1979 and September 1980 the Alignment's support has increased considerably compared with the Likud. Among Jewish voters the Alignment leads with 40 percent, compared with 18 percent given to the Likud, while among the public at large 37 percent prefer the Alignment, compared with 15 percent for the Likud. Throughout this time the number of voters who have not decided, however, is still 15 to 20 percent of the total and this remains the decisive vote. The percentage of persons who believe Prime Minister Begin fulfills his duties well has also dropped over this period, from 59 percent in May 1979 to 40 percent in February-March 1980. In our latest poll in August-September Begin's popularity slightly rose to 41 percent.

Still, the dissatisfaction is more profound than that reflected in these public opinion polls. While in our latest poll 30 percent said they would vote for a coalition party (the Likud or the National Religious Party), only 17 percent maintained that the government was functioning well at all or rather well. This means that the voters who will vote for a coalition party will do so notwithstanding the fact that they believe the government is not successful. This fact, combined with the high percentage of voters who remain undecided, obliges us to examine further questions.

In view of the relative dissatisfaction with the government's functioning, a question is asked: How is this fact reflected in terms of the voters' will to replace the government?

The data providing an adequate answer to this question are those referring to the public's willingness to continue with this government or wishing for its resignation. In the past three polls a question was asked: "Do you believe that in view of the recent developments the government should resign or continue in its office?" Three alternatives were suggested: The government should continue until the next elections: the government should continue but more ministers should be replaced; or the government should continue but more ministers should be replaced; or the government should resign. Here are the results of these polls:

Should the government continue or resign? [figures in percentages]

Date of poll	Government should continue as it is	Government should continue but some ministers be replaced	Government should resign	No opinion
September 1979	28	31	34	7
February-March 1980	28	31	34	7
August-September 1980	30	17	48	5

In the light of the other findings, these results seem somewhat surprising. This is not a typing error. The polls of September 1979 and of February-March 1980 show identical results and they show clearly that to a certain extent the public is not inclined to replace his current government. In spite of the fact that only one voter out of four in the September 1979 poll and only one voter out of five in the February-March 1980 poll thought that the government was successful or rather successful, only just over one-third of all the voters in the polls thought that the government should resign. Almost as many among the voters thought the best solution would be replacing several ministers in the existing government.

What is the cause of this trend among the voters? If the government is functioning so badly why, at least, do people not want to replace it?

A partial answer to this seeming contradiction in the national Israeli political character could be accounted for by the voters' conservatism. We have a long tradition of stable governments. We may like it. Though the political structure resembles that of Italy, where cabinets fall at the rate of one a year, we may actually prefer the U.S. system in which administrations are replaced at predetermined dates.

The data may also point to another eventuality. The Likud has in fact more support than meets the eye, and many of its supporters in 1977, though disappointed with its functioning so far, still hope things may improve. However, this explanation may account for just a small fraction of the vast discrepancy between the public's dissatisfaction and the wish for the government to resign.

The explanation is largely due--and we have no means of weighing the alternative causes--to the unwillingness of the voters to support existing alternative parties. Regarding the small existing parties there is a clear evidence of that: In spite of the present degree of dissatisfaction with the cabinet, none of the small parties attracts more than 2 to 3 percent at the most and some do not even attract the minimum of 1 percent required for the representation in the Knesset. A good case in point is Professor Yadin's party, the Democratic Movement for Change: At this point in time the voters opted not to see it as an alternative.

There is an obvious trend to see the Alignment as the only feasible alternative. It appears, however, that the main reason for this moving toward the Alignment, is the opposition to the existing government, not the attractiveness of the alternative. As pointed out in the second article in this series, this is normal reaction in years in which elections are not held. The opposition enjoys the mistakes made by existing government without having to be very active in enlisting support.

Yet the polls in September 1979 and February-March 1980 showed that a considerable number of the new supporters of the Alignment at that time did not then want to bring down the existing Likud government.

In the recent poll however, a sharp change on this issue is seen. All of a sudden there has been a tilt when 14 percent of the voters who considered the change of ministers as a solution, moved over to the camp of those who think the government should resign. At present, about half of the total number of voters want the government to resign. The alternative that the Alignment is representing has not only more votes but has more persuasiveness as well.

It is obvious that something has changed and it is worthwhile to examine, according to the data emerging from the Smith Research Center, what could have produced such a change now that we are entering an election year. Many variables that have not been examined in public opinion polls may account for the change in attitudes. One thing is clear and simple: We all know that we are entering an election year and it is too late now to solve fundamental problems by replacing more ministers. It may be better to replace the entire government.

Yet the data indicate that there may be some other explanations. The most important data refer to the assessment of the government success in foreign affairs. From the February-March poll to the August-September poll of the current year, there has been a decline in the percentage of those who thought that the government was successful or largely successful in foreign affairs from 31 percent to 20 percent (compared to 59 percent in May 1979). Although Prime Minister Begin has not sustained a loss in his personal popularity as prime minister other data have indicated that only 16 percent of the total number of voters agreed with the prime minister on foreign affairs; there were more voters who agreed with Dayan, and almost an identical number agreed with Weizman, Eban and Rabin. Only 20 percent thought that the new foreign minister, Yitzhaq Shamir, was doing a good job. Another major event that occurred in the period under review was the approval of the Jerusalem Law. Some of the reactions to this law, including the transfer of embassies to Tel Aviv, occurred during the period when that poll was conducted. The reaction of the respondents to these events was twofold. On the one hand there was an angry reaction of the public, and as a result a toughening of the positions regarding a settlement in the territories and a closing of ranks of the prime minister's faithful supporters. On the other hand there was a reaction against the government that was considered to be responsible for what appeared to be a worsening of Israel's international position. The result was that many of those who formerly considered the replacement of ministers as a possible solution, went over to the camp of those who wished the government to resign.

But there is another aspect to the situation, namely, the socioeconomic aspect. The percentage of those who thought that Yiga'el Hurvitz will succeed or partly succeed in his plan for curbing inflation and for the recovery of the economy, has dropped by 15 percent in the period between the two polls from 50 to 35 percent. The personal popularity of Hurvitz and of Minister David Levi, who is active in the same fields, has also dropped considerably. Part of this public may have reached the conclusion that Hurvitz' chances of success were nil.

Two major changes in public opinion regarding the evaluation of the government's success, as measured in these two polls, the decline in the percentage of people who think that Israel's foreign affairs policy is successful and that Hurvitz' economic policy is effective, should be seen as compatible with the increase in the number of persons who want the government to resign.

Whatever the complete explanation, there is still a discrepancy between those who believe the government's work has been unsatisfactory and those who want the government to resign, a feeling prevalent among many voters who are undecided, and among other voters.

How does the picture appear as presented in this series of articles, as we enter an election year? Do these polls indicate what could happen during the election year?

The polls show us what the opening positions would be, and a little more than that. The Likud popularity has declined as well as the popularity of its ministers. But this party is still holding power and Prime Minister Begin is still enjoying considerable personal support. This fact gives the government a chance to try and reverse the trend. It may be a very difficult task but it is not impossible.

Notwithstanding its large lead the Alignment is encountering difficulties as well: 1) Because it is in the opposition it is unable to control events, and 2) it has to begin attracting new supporters by positive actions, plans and personalities. Many persons among these new supporters have given the Alignment their provisional support mainly as a reaction to their disappointment with the existing government. Unless it significantly increases its attractiveness, the Alignment will find it difficult to continue enjoying its present rate of support or attract voters from the large group of voters who are undecided.

The religious parties have the most constant success. The voting for these parties seems to remain stable, irrespective of the political climate.

Little change is expected in the voting for the religious parties, which was an average 14 percent in the nine Knesset elections. These parties encounter new difficulties as well, particularly those stemming from the Abu-Hatzera affair. It seems however, that their position was less undermined by the recent events.

The small parties are facing a difficult situation. Those represented in the Knesset will continue to exist but the obtaining of more extensive support will not occur. The promise of "the new look" in Israeli politics that the Democratic Movement for Change held up proved to be nothing but sand in the wind. The scattered remnants of Yadin's movement do not have even one seat in the Knesset, according to public opinion polls. The "inheritance" of the Democratic Movement for Change was that the voters are very careful now in supporting new parties. A new party, if it wishes to be successful, will have to work much harder than just to present new faces, or old faces in different locations.

Finally, there are the undecided voters, whose proportion of the total remained throughout the year at almost one out of four. In the recent elections many voted for the Likud; others, who represent a factor that does not wish to vote for the Alignment now, voted for the Democratic Movement for Change. A smaller number of undecided voters came from among religious parties, the small parties or are new voters. There are even people who voted for the Alignment in 1977 who have not decided how to vote as yet because of the internal conflicts in the party.

This group will determine more than any other the final results. It may turn the 1981 election into a close run or give the Alignment a smashing victory. It may also develop new parties, which will serve to tip the scales one way or another. Persons who believe the 1981 election has already been decided are deluding themselves.

'HA'ARETZ' COMMENTS ON ATTEMPT TO MUZZLE IDF GENERALS

[Commentary by Ze'ev Schiff: "Who's Afraid of an Argument About the IDF"]

[Text] Anyone juxtaposing the verbal barrage from some of our ministers and leaders with the criticism by one of the IDF's most important generals, Dan Shomron, of the size of the standing army and the inflated dimensions of the general staff and how the defense budget is being used is making his work easier if he does not understand the substance of what is going on. Although these may appear to be similar, this is not the case. The leadership's verbosity is not new. It typifies the current administration. But its predecessor was also not notable for reticence. It is sufficient to remember the wave of criticism leveled at former Prime Minister Yitzhaq Rabin, following an interview in HA'ARETZ about the interim agreement he signed with Egypt, as being intended to lead to a split between Syria and Egypt; incidentally, a move proved to be correct. Begin loves telling about Israel's aid to minorities and the underground links we have maintained with these bodies. He also made public details of the dimensions of the aid we are giving the Lebanese Christians. He is not the only one doing this. Was it not former Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan who disclosed--without having coordinated this with the prime minister--that we were supplying the Ethiopian Army with bombs? (And it was immediately after this that the Israeli delegation was expelled from that country.) In the same way, Begin has now revealed the matter of the aid given at one time to the Kurds. I do not think Begin said this on the spur of the moment. A proof of this is the fact that foreign correspondents and television crews were also invited to the tour of the educational institution [where the remark was made]. This was intentional; it is only a pity that practically nothing was said about the educational activities in the IDF.

If the disclosure of the aid to the Kurds and the Christians can be explained as being a single trend, it is hard to understand the contradiction between the various statements about Iraq's nuclear reactor. At one time Deputy Defense Minister Mordekhay Tzipori came out with an inflated declaration that Israel would do all it could to stop Iraq from implementing its intentions in this field and, if political moves would not help, we would consider other ones. Begin did not like this statement and even commented on this to Tzipori. There was silence for several months until the Iran-Iraq war broke out. In the course of the fighting there was an attempt to hit the reactor from the air and it was only natural that after such statements there would be those who would try to hint that Israel had had a hand in the affair.

The fact that the chief of the intelligence branch, Maj Gen Yehoshu'a Sagi, invited the Iranians three times to hit the Iraqi reactor did not detract from the suspicion and perhaps even reinforced it. But a completely contradictory Israeli statement followed the accusation against us. That is a libel!--official spokesmen said, including Deputy Minister Tzipori. They almost added, a blood libel. It may be that Israel's spokesmen do not understand what they say--even in Hebrew!--but, in any event, the meaning is that a strike at Iraq's nuclear reactor is inconceivable, it is not nice.... It will be interesting to see what they are going to say now, after Iraq's official paper has written that the reactor is in fact aimed against Israel, not Iran.

To combine these statements with the important argument over the future of the IDF and what our army will look like in the 1980's is an insult to logic. Unfounded things have been said about the circumstances of the interview with Maj Gen Dan Shomron, but before we deal with them, I would like to recall a period when the IDF was considered to be a "sacred cow" and it was forbidden to even argue about what was going on in it.

After the Yom Kippur War, Israel was washed by a wave of criticism of the various blunders and the way in which various negative phenomena developed. Criticism was leveled at the military censorship which had not permitted things to be published; at the press for not having been courageous enough to violate the censor's orders and let things out; at former, regular and reserve army personnel for not having told, not having raised doubts and not having argued about why we did not know in advance. Why was there no argument about vital security issues, as there is about political and economic ones? (By the way, in these fields, where there is not censorship, I did not, for example, read anything about the expected oil embargo or Israel's expected political downfall in Africa and elsewhere.) It was claimed that the public needed to know about the argument over the Bar-Lev line and the defense of Sinai. The public certainly needed to know more about the state of the emergency depots, for example, or the level of supervision and strategic-political issues. The opinion was that in the future the IDF was not to be allowed to be treated as a sacred cow and there were even proposals to cancel military censorship altogether. These voices were raised again after the Litani campaign.

However, it transpires that many people prefer to deal in slander and gossip about the IDF, to quote something they heard from a son in the army or a friend on reserve duty, but not to check the sources. Many people do not want an argument about the IDF and prefer not to deal with substantive security issues. They feel these things should be dealt with in inner sanctums. The Yom Kippur War and its circumstances have been forgotten. The military censorship is generally more liberal and open than it was in the past, but there is almost no argument. We are standing at the beginning of a nuclear era in the Middle East, but even on this fateful topic, argument is marginal and restricted.

There is no better example of this than how the defense budget was dealt with. Despite Israel's sorry economic situation and the fact that the defense budget is Israel's heaviest burden, the sides did not succeed in conducting an efficient argument about the IDF's structure and the security views dictating our large outlays. Even a provocative comment by Minister Sharon that the defense budget could be cut by 20 billion Israeli pounds was left without a genuine answer. To this day the treasury claims that it does not know from where the IDF intends to cut the 9 billion decided upon and that it is not true that the standing army will be cut, it will be increased by thousands of men. Instead of an argument, we have heard from the chief of staff and other generals that before arguing about the defense budget it would be preferable for the country's captains to tidy up their own homes as to the way they conduct the economy.

It is clear that the longer the argument is postponed, the more pointed and painful it will be. Because of this I found it very important that an IDF general was prepared to speak about the process of making decisions connected with enormous expenditures (the Lavi plan), the size of the standing army and the number of officers in the IDF. It is not the professional details of the ground forces headquarters that are important, but comments about the danger to our will to fight and the fact that we should know details about what use is being made of the enormous funds the state is putting at the disposal of the defense budget. This is also important because the remarks represent a sort of platform of a general who is one of the candidates for the post of chief of staff and it is good to know that there are different approaches and proposals in these vital fields. From this viewpoint, the interview with Major General Shomron was a welcome precedent and the same thing applies even if another paper, not HA'ARETZ, had aired his remarks. Dan Shomron did not speak about political issues, nor was he interviewed without permission. In the interview with him, he dealt with professional, security issues.

For reasons best known to themselves an IDF decision was made to permit several army generals to be interviewed before the holiday. This is not a new phenomenon. Generals have also been interviewed in the past, although this was generally done in groups and all at one time. It seems to me that proposals to interview seven or eight generals were submitted to the defense minister's office, but the minister only approved four of them (the interview with the chief of intelligence is an affair on its own). My request to meet with Major General Shomron for a short background talk was coincidentally incorporated into this program, without my knowing about the other interviews. Anyong who thought he would hold a discussion about marches and acts of valor, or the Entebbe campaign, was either naive or lacking in professional knowledge.

It was not an underground interview. It was not to be compared with interviews granted by generals after the Yom Kippur War to foreign and Israeli correspondents without permission (some of whom were later rebuked). The interview with Major General Shomron was approved by the IDF spokesman, the chief of staff and the prime minister and defense minister. Furthermore, a representative of the IDF spokesman was present at the interview. It was recorded and the transcript was given to the IDF; and I happen to know that it found its way to either the chief of staff or his deputy.

The article was passed on to the military censor, as the law requires. The censor made five or six corrections to it. Other than one erasure about which I have doubts, the censor was correct in all the other security erasures; and the censor does not normally have scruples about erasing. In other words, those at the top echelons of the security establishment who are involved in this were not surprised by Shomron's remarks as published in HA'ARETZ; therefore the prime minister's and defense minister's surprise at statements made by IDF generals is amazing. This surprise, if it really is his and not that of his aides, only proves either a blockage in the establishment or a lack of control. Basically, Major General Shomron's remarks are a contribution to and a positive precedent for a genuine argument about issues essential to our very being. They represent an opening for the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Security Committee to hold a more thorough debate on vital issues in its field.

PLAN SUBMITTED TO STRENGTHEN GREEN LINE SETTLEMENTS

TA090853 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 8 Oct 80 p 4

[Unattributed report: "New Plan Submitted for Beefing Up Settlements Along Green Line"]

[Text] A new settlement plan, designed mainly to strengthen and beef up the green line, was submitted by the director of the Jewish Agency's Land Settlement Department, Prof Ra'anan Weitz, in a discussion held yesterday by the department's directorate.

According to Professor Weitz, the new plan is designed to posit a new challenge to the Jewish Agency, as he did when he put forward the plan for the Galilee lookouts about 3 years ago. In line with its experience, the Jewish Agency will be able to meet the new challenge if it mobilizes for it--as it did in the establishment of stage 1 of the lookouts.

Drawn up by the department's deputy director, Mr Me'ir Shamir, and by the Land Settlement Department's regional directors, the new plan deals with filling in the settlement gaps along the entire length of the green line, from Galilee in the north to the slopes of the Hebron hills and the Negev in the south.

According to the plan, 21 new lookouts will be set up in Galilee and along the northern part of the green line. Two lookouts will go up in the central region, and 10 additional settlements on the slopes of the Hebron hills and in the Negev.

At the meeting it was decided to commence the planning stages in line with the principles of regional planning. Also at the meeting, Professor Weitz announced the crystallization of another plan for the continued development and strengthening of the lookouts which the Jewish Agency has already set up in Galilee.

POLL SHOWS PUBLIC DISSATISFIED WITH HURVITZ

[Pori public opinion poll: "There Are 28.4 Percent Who Are Satisfied With Hurvitz and 44.8 Percent Who Are Dissatisfied"]

[Text] Finance Minister Yiga'el Hurvitz' popularity remained stable in September. At present 28.4 percent are satisfied with him as minister of finance, compared with 44.8 percent who are dissatisfied. This emerges from the Pori Institute nationwide public opinion poll conducted at the request of HA'ARETZ.

It is true that the percentage of those satisfied with Mr Hurvitz did drop by 2.4 percent (from 30.8 percent in August to a current 28.4 percent) but the percentage of those who are dissatisfied with Mr Hurvitz also dropped by 2.5 percent (from 47.3 percent in August to a current 44.8 percent).

In contrast to this, the percentage of those who are not sure what they think about the finance minister have increased (from 15.9 percent in August to a current 19.1 percent).

It should be noted that the figures for those who are satisfied with Mr Hurvitz are almost as high among people with higher education, people with academic and administrative professions and the higher income brackets as they are for those who are dissatisfied with him.

The finance minister's highest popularity is among people in the high-income brackets (37.2 percent) and highly educated people (37 percent).

The finance minister's lowest popularity is among people with low educational standards (50.6 percent) and the low-income brackets (49.7 percent).

The poll covered a representative section of 1,200 men and women who were given private interviews in their homes throughout the country.

BEGIN CONSIDERS FIGHT AGAINST ARAB TAKEOVERS OF WESTERN FIRMS

TA051202 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 5 Oct 80 p 1

[Economic correspondent report: "Begin To Initiate Political Activity Against Arab Takeover of Western Financial Firms"]

[Text] Prime Minister Menahem Begin will hold consultations with Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir to decide on possible political activity in view of the danger of the Arabs taking over financial firms in the West. Israeli ambassadors in various capitals may be employed to acquaint governments and public opinion with the danger expected to the free world. This was stated by Prime Minister Begin in a letter he sent to Knesset Economic Committee Chairman Gad Ya'aqobi.

MK Ya'aqobi recently sent a message to the prime minister in which he warned against the gradual takeover by Arab governments and companies of well-known firms in Western countries. Among other steps, the Arabs have acquired 10 percent of the stock of Volkswagen's daughter-company in Brazil; the Kuwaiti Government has acquired from a Swiss metals firm in Zurich 10 percent of the stock in the well-known German firm (Metallschaft); Kuwait is now completing the purchase of the fifth largest bank in Arizona for $40 million.

MK Ya'aqobi noted that through these takeovers, the Arab states' influence would grow over the West's foreign policy and its economic calculations. Grave security dangers are also involved, since some of these firms and plants are engaged in manufacturing for the Western countries' defense systems. He suggested that Israel expose this process in the international arena and augment Western awareness of its ramifications and perils.

WEST BANK EXPORT LICENSES--Jordan has made another move to strengthen its status in Judaea and Samaria, obliging all farmers and agriculturalists in the region to obtain export licenses only from its agricultural associations. Our correspondent Pinhas 'Inbari said this will strengthen these associations in contrast with the pro-PLO municipalities since they will thus gain control over agricultural produce marketing in the Arab countries. Our correspondent said this move has also directly affected the chambers of commerce, which used to approve the export licenses. The heads of the chambers of commerce are supposed to meet in East Jerusalem today to discuss the matter. [Text] [TA021139 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1100 GMT 2 Oct 80]

COAL SUPPLY AGREEMENT--The managing director of the Israeli Electricity Company, Yosef Tulipman, has signed an agreement in the United States for the supply of 1 million tons of coal a year for 30 years to the Israeli Electricity Company. This agreement supplements earlier accords, signed with firms in Australia and South Africa for the supply of 2.3 million tons of coal a year for 30 years. All the contracts contain options for increasing the amount of coal, should the Israeli Electricity Company so desire. [TA082120 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 8 Oct 80 p 5 TA]

TOURISM INCREASE--In September 1980, 99,000 tourists entered Israel, an increase of 9 percent over the same period last year. These statistics, which were released by the Central Bureau of Statistics, do not include visitors from Lebanon. In the first 9 months of 1980, about 919,000 tourists entered Israel, an increase of 6 percent over the same period last year. [TA082120 Tel Aviv HATZOFE in Hebrew 8 Oct 80 p 3 TA]

DEAD SEA SOLAR POOLS--The Energy Ministry has signed an agreement with the (Solmat) Company, a subsidiary of the (Ormat Turbines) Company on building solar pools for producing electricity along the Dead Sea coast. The project involves some $20 million and will be implemented between 1980 and 1983. The government decided to sign that agreement today rather than wait for reports on foreign investment in the project because of its significance. In the first stage, the pools will operate a 5-megawatt turbine and the idea is to later produce 20 megawatts of electricity. The plant will be incorporated in the sea-to-sea project, which is in the planning stages. The spokesman for the Energy Ministry reported that many investors, including the U.S. Energy Administration, have expressed interest in financing the project. This is currently the Energy Ministry's largest development project. [TA112045 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1500 GMT 10 Oct 80 TA]

REAL WAGES DOWN--In the first half of the year there was a significant decline in real wages. This emerges from a survey conducted by the Manpower Planning Authority in the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare. According to this data, the average monthly salary for wage-earners was 2,030 shekels for the January-May period, a rise of 102 percent over the same period last year. However, the consumer price index rose during that same period by 112 percent, so that real wages in fact decreased. [TA112045 Tel Aviv YEDI'OT AHARONOT in Hebrew 10 Oct 80 p 2 TA]

ARAB UNEMPLOYMENT--No change has been marked in the September employment statistics for employees from the territories working in Israel through the employment service offices. They numbered 43,957 as against 44,255 in August--a decline of 298--even though September was the month of the Jewish holidays and as a result the demand for labor decreased by 2,107. Of all the employees, 14,578 worked in the construction field, 17,286 in the industry, 7,769 in services and 4,324 in agriculture. Of them, 2,089 were women. FOOD PRICE INCREASE DECISION--The economic minicabinet decided to raise the prices of several foodstuffs whose prices are government-controlled, such as frozen beef, milk and dairy products and eggs. On the other hand, it was decided today not to raise the prices of subsidized foodstuffs such as bread, flour, cooking oil, frozen poultry as well as public transportation fares. The decision not to raise these commodities' prices was made because of a confrontation between Finance Minister Yiga'el Hurvitz and Housing and Construction Minister David Levi. At the prime minister's suggestion, the decision on these goods was transferred to the entire cabinet plenum for decision. At the end of the session, the finance minister said he would continue to fight for the principle of not subsidizing goods. He said that anyone who believes that inflation can be controlled by subsidizing commodities is wrong because ultimately the results are the same. He added that he is determined to operate within the confines of the state budget. Minister David Levi said that the treasury's policy of initiating price hikes has been proven sterile and added he would request a thorough cabinet debate on this policy. He welcomed the decision to postpone the decision to raise the prices of subsidized foodstuffs. [Text] [TA131031 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1000 GMT 13 Oct 80]

NO W. BANK LAND SHORTAGE--There is no shortage of land for the expansion of most settlements in Judaea and Samaria. This emerges from a comprehensive land survey recently compiled by the Defense Ministry. There is a particularly difficult land problem in the 'Ofra and Qedummim settlements. Our correspondent Yig'al Goren has learned that the government has purchased vast tracts of land in Judaea and Samaria in the last few weeks. These lands will be put at the disposal of the settlements. Deputy Defense Minister Mordekhay Tzipori toured the settlements today. He told our correspondent that no Israeli government would in the future be able to ignore the significant fait accomplis established by this government throughout Judaea and Samaria. [Text] [TA132112 Jerusalem Domestic Television Service in Hebrew 1900 GMT 13 Oct 80]

RIFT VALLEY SETTLEMENT LAND--For the first time since the beginning of Israeli settlement in the Jordan Rift Valley, the military government is now permitting the Rift Valley settlers to cultivate land on the bank of the Jordan River, on the eastern side of what is called the system fence [Gader Hama'arekhet]. This new development now gives the Jordan Rift Valley settlers a chance to expand their land reserves. Our settlement affairs correspondent Avraham Ben-Melekh says that up to now the IDF has banned visitors from entering territory beyond the system fence. [Ben-Melekh] Now, too, the IDF is restricting entry to this closed area in several security zones; however, for the first time since the Six-Day War, it has placed a large tract of land between 1,000 and 2,000 dunams at the settlers' disposal. This is a tract close to the Jordan River, in the eastern sector of the Jordan Rift Valley facing the Moshavim (Fatza'el) and Tomer. Teams from the military government and the Ministry of Justice have been examining the question of the ownership of the lands over the last year and they have decided that the entire 1,200 dunams belong to the state. NO CUTS IN IDF TRAINING--The chief of staff has issued orders not to cut the IDF training program under any circumstances, even with defense budget cuts. He has only allowed cuts in the equipment acquisition and research budgets. This was reported today by the chief of staff's financial adviser to the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee. The adviser has turned down the Bank of Israel governor's arguments that there was no real cut in the defense budget. According to the adviser there has been a 5 percent cut. The chief of the planning branch in the general staff reported to the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Security Committee about details of how the IDF would be deployed in the framework of autonomy. COST OF LIVING UP--The consumer price index rose last month by 7.3 percent. The increase in the index reflects price rises in all the consumer groups, especially food, education, transportation and postal services. In the first 9 months of the year the index has risen by 81 percent. The Finance Ministry explains that the source of the high increase in the index lies in a strengthening of demand pressures in the economy. These pressures were generated because of surplus money held by the public. The treasury spokesman holds that the cuts made in the state budget are insufficient. In another 5 days the finance minister is to submit to the Knesset the budget proposal for the second half of the fiscal year. [Text] [TA151525 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1500 GMT 15 Oct 80]

130 PERCENT INFLATION RATE--The consumer price index published yesterday was 7.3 percent, and Finance Minister Yiga'el Hurvitz believes that only with the help of next year's budget can any change be effected in the economy's negative trend, as reflected in the index. The Finance Ministry has accepted the fact that the price rises this year will total 125 to 130 percent. One day after publication of the index: A report by Gid'on Zelinger. [Begin recording] Yiga'el Hurvitz admitted that the inflation rate this year would be 125 to 130 percent. This fact cannot be changed in the remaining half of the fiscal year. The treasury believes that an atmosphere of collapse must be prevented now and that preparations must be made for the next fiscal year, which begins in April. This year was a particularly unsuccessful year of containment, but the treasury hopes to change this trend next year. Such a change is liable to cost the public dearly, but the treasury believes, as does the finance minister, that it is preferable to make things difficult than to bribe the electorate, especially since the treasury is empty. Yesterday Finance Minister Hurvitz warned Shim'on Peres and David Levi in the same breath against election bribery. This is also the reason that the finance minister will insist on implementation of the approved budget and will oppose a general sale of reduced goods. He and his staff believe that the existing compensation apparatus is sufficiently sophisticated to answer to the genuine needs of the underprivileged. The finance minister's wars have not ended. COPPER MINING RESUMPTION--Mining has been resumed at the Timna' Copper Mines north of Elat after an interval of several years. GAZA MAYOR TO PUBLISH PAPER--Gaza Mayor Rashad al-Shawwa intends to publish a daily paper with the approval of the military government. This will be the first daily paper published in the Gaza Strip. The name approved for the paper is (AL-HODA) which means the guidance in Hebrew. Al-Shawwa has already purchased modern, improved printing equipment for the establishment of an independent printing house--an investment of about $3 million. This includes the latest photo and offset printing machines. This will be one of the largest and most modern types of printing press in the Middle East. The military government has not yet given its approval for the printing press to be set to work. Al-Shawwa submitted his request to publish a paper to the previous defense minister, 'Ezer Weizman, when the latter was visiting the Gaza Strip. His request was discussed and approved by all those involved in the matter. The assessment by military government elements is that although al-Shawwa superficially shows relatively moderate positions in comparison with other Palestinian leaders, he is close to the PLO "and no less dangerous than others." JORDAN PLANNING NEW TOWN IN SAMARIA--Jordan is planning the establishment of a new town near 'Anabta in Samaria which will include 365 housing units, a mosque and public buildings. Our correspondent Pinhas 'Inbari points out that this will be the first Arab settlement to be established in the West Bank since the Six-Day War. The town will supposedly be erected by the Construction Association of Tulkarm Civil Servants. The association has already discussed the issue with the military government. However, no specific plan has yet been devised. Our correspondent points out that another construction association in the West Bank wants to build a new community on land belonging to the village of Rujayb near Nabulus. The community would be located on the former site of the settlement of Elon More which was evacuated in the wake of the ruling by the High Court of Justice. NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL FAVORED--Deputy Defense Minister Mordekhay Tzipori said that he supports the establishment of a national security council which would hold deliberations on matters pertaining to the IDF--its organization and ways of operation. Mordekhay Tzipori reiterated his belief in the necessity of establishing the ground forces command within the framework of the reorganization of the IDF. As for the IDF operation in Lebanon, he said there is no chance that quiet would prevail in that region in the near future. Some 15,000 terrorists can be found there whose aim is to kill Jews. There is no government in Lebanon that can enforce order and therefore Israel has to do it. Regarding the possibility that 'Ezer Weizman would return to the Likud leadership, Tzipori said that it has already happened that disputes were settled in political life and subsequently Weizman's return is possible. PRIVATE CONSUMPTION--The private consumption per capita in fixed prices has gone up by 2 percent in the second quarter of 1980. Private consumption in the first half of 1980 was lower by 9 percent per capita than the rate for the second half of 1979, when the annual rate of the decline reached 17 percent. The private consumption per capita declined in a year--from the first half of 1979 to the first half of 1980--by 8 percent. This was reported by the spokesman for the Central Bureau of Statistics in Jerusalem. There were marked decreases in per capita consumption of foodstuffs, drinks and tobacco, amounting to 9 percent, in the first half of 1980 as compared with the second half of 1979. Especially conspicuous was the fall in fruit and vegetable consumption--12 percent; in dairy and meat products--12 to 14 percent; fish--19 percent and soft and hard drinks--20 percent. The per capita purchases of nonperishable goods such as furniture, household wares and cars--items marked by great fluctuations--diminished by 29 percent with the fall being especially sharp in car purchases: 60 percent. The per capita consumption for clothing, footwear and personal goods also went down by 15 percent during that period. [TA190958 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 19 Oct 80 p 8 TA]

SEPTEMBER MONEY INJECTION--Last month the government printed 8.2 billion Israeli pounds. The treasury accounts for this large injection by the drop in tax collection and sale of government bonds. There was also large government expenditure as well as deviations from the state budget framework last month. [TA050819 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 0900 GMT 2 Oct 80 TA]

POLL SHOWS CONFIDENCE IN DEFENSE--An overwhelming majority of the country's residents are certain that Israel can defend itself should the need arise. Only an insignificant minority fears that Israel is today incapable of defending itself. This emerges from a countrywide Pori Institute public opinion survey, commissioned by HA'ARETZ. Asked, "To what extent do you believe at this time that Israel can defend itself should the need arise," 64.3 percent replied that they are "to a large extent" certain that Israel could defend itself, while another 21.1 percent believe "to a certain extent" that Israel can defend itself. All told, then, 85.4 percent believe that Israel can defend itself. Another 5.8 percent said that they "do not believe so much" in Israel's independent defense ability, and a minority of 1.4 percent said they "do not believe at all" that Israel can defend itself. The remaining 7.4 percent said they "do not know" whether or not Israel can defend itself should the need arise. An analysis of the results shows that the most optimistic are those with a high level of education, persons in the academic or administrative professions and those with high incomes. The most pessimistic are persons aged 60 or more and those with low educational and income levels. The poll covered a representative sample of 1,200 men and women who were personally interviewed throughout the country. [Text] [TA051027 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 5 Oct 80 p 3]

JUDAEA, SAMARIA SUPREME COUNCIL--Our correspondent reported that Jordan has again set up the Supreme Council on Judaea and Samaria Affairs, thus taking the wind out of the sails of the Joint Jordanian-PLO Committee. All the issues that were the responsibility of the joint committee have already been transferred to the Jordanian council. [Text] [TA050743 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 0500 GMT 5 Oct 80]

BEGIN CALL TO WORLD'S JEWS--Prime Minister Menahem Begin has called upon the Jews in the Diaspora to defend their lives, their honor and their property against terror attacks. He said that an evil wind of antisemitism, recalling the Nazi period, is now blowing in France. This is not the same France that gave us the encyclopedists and emancipation, the prime minister said: This is the other France. [Begin Begin recording] There is the France of the revolution and progress and liberty, equality and fraternity and there is a France where antisemitism is rampant; that is the second France. After what happened to our people, after 1.5 million small children were slaughtered there is an explosion at a synagogue, murder and bloodshed. Now we see the evil wind blowing in the second France. As long as the Jew is in the Diaspora, he must not cede his right and his duty to defend himself and his children and his national and human honor. The 1930's and 1940's have passed; they must not return. If anyone attacks Jews, the Jews are not only entitled to but must defend themselves and anyone who wants to react to this can react however he wants. This is our position and we will tell it to all our people until, with the Lord's aid, as many of them as possible, as we hope, return to their historic homeland of their own free will and live here as free men. [end recording] The prime minister was speaking at the annual rally of IDF disabled persons and our military correspondent brought us his remarks. BEGIN REJECTS GOLAN WITHDRAWAL--The prime minister said that under no circumstances will we withdraw from the Golan Heights and as far as the proposal to assume sovereignty over it, this is currently under discussion in the cabinet and will later be dealt with by the Knesset. He refused to give any more details. Touring the Bet Shemesh engine plant, Mr Begin expressed his hope that an agreement will be reached with the U.S. companies to manufacture the engines for the Lavi fighter aircraft in this plant. DEFENSE MINISTRY BUDGET INCREASE DENIED--The Finance Ministry does not intend to grant the Defense Ministry's demand to increase its budget by an additional 1 billion shekels as compensation for price hikes during the first half of the year. The head of the budgetary department of the Ministry of Finance, Yisra'el Arqin, reported that according to an agreement between the minister of finance, the prime minister and defense minister, it had been decided to compensate the defense establishment for 80 percent of the 1980 price hikes, as was being done for the other ministries. The gap between the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of Defense springs from differences in assessments of the price hikes expected in the second half of the budgetary year. But the Ministry of Finance does not intend to compensate the defense establishment with a higher sum than that set in the proposal to update the state budget. The DAVAR correspondent comments that the defense establishment's budget was increased from 21.09 billion shekels to 27.3 billion shekels and the Finance Ministry fears that an even greater increase would broaden the economic activity and cause a further acceleration of the inflation rates. They estimate that a decision will be made when Finance Minister Yiga'el Hurvitz returns from the United States. [Excerpt] [TA081227 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 8 Oct 80 p 3]

W. BANK CHARITY CONTROL--Jordan is now trying to take control over the charity organizations and the public clubs in the West Bank by means of financial pressure. Our correspondent Pinhas 'Inbari noted that at present elections are underway in these organizations and clubs and Jordan has pledged huge allocations only to those bodies that vote for the people it backs. In some institutions communist representatives had been elected but were later forced to resign because of the Jordanian financial pressure. POLL SHOWS AUTONOMY TALKS SKEPTICISM--A clear majority of Israel's population does not believe that the autonomy talks will be successfully concluded according to a poll conducted for the JERUSALEM POST by the Modi'in Ezrahi Applied Research Centre. RISE IN EXPORTS--Exports in the first nine months of the current year were 24 percent higher than in the same period last year. In September, however, the level of exports was only 3.8 percent higher than in September 1979, according to data released yesterday by the Central Bureau of Statistics. The data are all in current values, which means that after taking account of the fall in the value of the U.S. dollar, in which exports are recorded, there has been a fall in real terms. Total net exports in January-September 1980 amounted to $3,781 million, compared with $3,054 million in the same period last year. While total exports thus rose by a nominal 24 percent, industrial exports increased by 26 percent, diamond exports by 18 percent, and agricultural exports by 7 percent. (Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 14 Oct 80 p 8 TA]

DECLINE IN INVESTMENTS--Investment was down some 9 percent in the first half of 1980, compared with the second half of 1979 and 11 percent lower than in the last quarter of 1979, according to estimates released by the Central Bureau of Statistics. The 11 percent fall in investments in the first 3 months of 1980--with no change in the second quarter of the year--is equivalent to an annual contraction of 36 percent, the bureau says. All the data are seasonally adjusted and in constant value terms. [Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 14 Oct 80 p 8 TA]

PERES REFUSES TO RUN AGAINST RABIN--Labour Party chairman Shimon Peres last night declared that he would not "run" against former Premier Yitzhaq Rabin for the party leadership if the party convention scheduled for mid-December insists on a showdown. Peres explained that for a showdown to take place an earlier decision by the Labour Central Committee naming him as the party's number one man would have to be overturned. If this is done he would refuse to take part in a leadership race, he said. Peres was speaking at a closed party meeting. His aides explained that trying to avoid an actual showdown with Rabin, Peres wants to force the convention into a vote of confidence by asking it either to support him or overturn the previous Central Committee decision and open the convention. Spokesmen for the Rabin camp last night accused Peres of trying to "blackmail" the party. Peres also said that he would never serve in a Rabin government and added that should a showdown for the leadership actually take place, Labour unity would be irrevocably shattered. 'JORDAN TIMES' ON RATIONALE FOR BACKING IRAQ

JN300726 Amman JORDAN TIMES in English 30 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Setting the Pace"]

[Text] In its statement Monday on the Iraq-Iran dispute, the National Consultative Council covered all the subjects of concern to the Arab nation in general and to the Jordanian people in particular, with regard to the fighting in the Gulf.

Jordan has set the pace with its forthright national stand in support of brotherly Iraq's campaign to restore Arab rights and dignity in the territories, waters and islands usurped by Iran.

From the beginning, Jordan has voiced this stand not out of any antagonism to the Islamic people of Iran, but out of this country's firm and longstanding conviction that the usurpation and occupation of Arab land in any part of the Arab nation must be resisted and opposed to whatever extent is necessary.

The NCC has reiterated this point by stressing that aggression against any part of the Arab nation must be treated as aggression against the whole of that nation. Considering Jordan's position on the front line against Zionist aggression, no other national stand is either desirable, logical or possible--quite apart from the paramount commitment of this country to both the principle and the practice of Arab unity and its steadfastness in the defence and pursuit of Arab interests.

These are all the elements which go into the Jordanian stand at the side of fraternal Iraq at this moment. The National Consultative Council has articulated the people's strong support of this stand.

Quite correctly as well, the NCC statement stressed the element of brotherhood in appealing to the Islamic people of Iran to recognise Arab rights and open themselves to the establishment of good-neighbourly relations. Such a realistic and correct move on the part of the Iranians would do so much towards restoring the region's precarious balance of forces, and towards keeping the region free of outside interference or intervention.

We would add, in the same spirit, that it is time for the rulers of Iran to set aside their narrow chauvinist pursuits and throw their full weight, as they had been expected to do, behind the just Arab and Islamic struggles; only this course will allow the Iranian people to accept the out-stretched hand of friendship extended to them by all Arab and Muslim peoples.

The council was likewise quite correct in putting out an appeal to all Islamic states in the present instance to pledge themselves to the cause of averting internecine disputes and quarrels, keeping in mind the constant aims before us.

These aims extend from the mobilisation of Arab and Islamic resources in the battle for Palestine, to which the NCC statement specifically referred, to the continuing struggle for social and economic self-fulfillment. With the present diversion of resources, that ultimate battle is being forced to take a back seat, and no one really stands to gain from that.

ANTI-KHOMEYNI SERMONS IN WEST BANK--As of yesterday, sermons against Khomeyni are being preached in Judaea and Samaria and East Jerusalem mosques. Our reporter says that it is very probable that the orders in this matter came from Jordan. Our reporter notes also that the new line in the sermons is arousing displeasure in the mosques because Khomeyni's Islamic revolution has so far gained sympathy there. In the al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem and in a Nabulus mosque there were even fistfights among the worshippers as a result of these sermons. 'GREATER AMMAN' RADIO--Jordanian broadcasting station sources have said that preparations are underway to transform the current Amman station into a popular local radio that will deal with all levels of the Jordanian society's activities. It will use direct contact with the people and will openly discuss social and development issues. This step is being taken because radio is the primary disseminator of development information and is easily accessible to all strata of society. A special board is expected to be created to direct the station, with the participation of responsible authorities from the departments of development, planning, national guidance, labor and education. The Greater Amman station will begin transmission within the next 4 weeks and will work to project Jordan's activities and development plans abroad. INVESTMENT BUREAU BUYS INTO SHAKY BRITISH FIRMS

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 17 Sep 80 p 16

/Article: "The Kuwait Investment Office in London Is Buying Shares in Failing British Companies"/

/Text/ "Investment has become a science and an art. It is a science with general rules and an art with special touches."

These words are repeated when one asks, "Why does the Kuwait Investment Office in London sometimes buy the shares of failing companies?" Kuwait has a big share in the Shop and Son Company, which announced an unenviable financial status this year; nonetheless Kuwait recently added thousands of shares to its holdings.

The Mortal Blow

In the report, it was stated that the company's profits were dealt a mortal blow in the first half of this year. These came to 2.2 million pounds sterling, as compared with 8.3 million pounds sterling in the same period last year. Last year's profits also dropped 50 percent, totalling 7.22 million pounds sterling as compared with 15.26 million pounds sterling in 1978.

Most of the losses arose from the flow of capital in the commercial sector and the production sector of the computerized cash register known as Gross.

Computer Losses

The cost of this equipment is extremely large, whereas sales of it are dropping in significant fashion; the company, which had 20 percent of the distribution market in Britain in 1976, has started facing serious competition from Japanese companies, which offer cheap, attractive products.

In spite of that, the Kuwait Investment Office bought several thousand shares in the company recently.

The Successful Model

The observer stated, "Thus some people deliberately prefer failing investments. However, do not forget that those people, including the Kuwait Investment Office, possess and also buy shares in successful companies.

The closest example of this is the General Accident, Fire and Life Assurance Company, whose profits in the first half of this year increased to 40 million pounds, as compared with 30.5 million pounds in the same period last year.

The company report stated that profits on insurance policies increased in Britain at a lower rate than in Canada and Brazil and faced losses in the United States and European countries.

The Power of Sterling

The report said that the power of sterling helped increase the company's profits. Investments in Canada also increased from 21.7 million to 47.6 million pounds sterling. This led to an increase in revenues.

Profits also rose to that point because of an increase in the value and prices of insurance on cars.

The question now is, why doesn't the Investment Office concentrate on this type of company?

The observer stated, "Certainly there are reasons for choices of this sort. They are all subject to the laws of the science of investment, and its arts."

Why Weak Companies?

The basic rule is, choose a strong company and strong stocks. The art is sometimes enticed into choosing weak stocks, because demand is low and stirring up interest may lead to a rise in their prices. However, it is not an ordinary investor but rather a strong investor who can play this role, possessing big resources which clearly tell the market "I can save this company from bankruptcy and destruction. My choice of these stocks is not just caprice--it is the choice of a professional who knows what he wants."

This psychological suggestion certainly plays an important role in the company's status in the market. It also helps attain profits at various rates through the process of purchasing shares and reselling them at higher prices.

DAIMLER-BENZ BUYOUT--Will the Daimler-Benz automobile empire be saved from the tribulations the world automobile industry is passing through? No one can offer a sure answer. All answers depend on the word "perhaps," or consideration of probabilities mixed with optimism, for two reasons: First, Kuwait's 14 percent contribution can help the company market its products. Second, the company has rid itself of the complex of being located in Germany and has brought factories out into the third world. The company's 1979 report states that sales increased by 12.8 percent and their value came to 30.4 billion marks, or $17.4 billion. Sales of cars alone increased to 10 percent, and transport and truck production increased 7 percent, totalling 256,467 units. Production of passenger cars increased 7.4 percent, totalling 422,159 units; 67,695 units were assembled in Brazil and Argentina. Exports increased to 234,000 units. Their profits increased last year to 592.8 million marks, as compared with 445 million marks in 1977 and about 392 million marks in 1976. The report said that the company has many export contracts for 1980. Another report published last July stated that the company's output has increased, in contrast to all /other/ German companies, by 2 percent in the first half of 1980, and that the capital passed on from the previous fiscal year rose by 8 percent, totalling 14.8 billion marks. The report stated that the company is committed to exporting 430,000 units, as compared with 422,000 last year. The company therefore relies on a store of success to cope with the three-dimensional crisis grinding down other companies. namely drops in profits, increases in costs, and competition. Observers say that Kuwait can play a role in increasing distribution and has plans to back up its public transport fleet with $400 million. It also has companies and investments in various parts of the world, all of which can be converted into clients of the German company, if the Kuwaiti government so agrees. However, these available resources are suspect because Daimler-Benz hastened to sign a contract last year to export buses to Israel. [Excerpt] [Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 16 Sep 80 p 14]

INTEREST RATE RISE--The weekly financial bulletin issued by the National Bank of Kuwait described the Kuwaiti dinar market as contracting in terms of the liquidity level. The bulletin said, "The state of contraction lasted through the past week and reached the point where interest rates on short-term deposits in the local market exceeded similar rates in the United States." The bulletin said, "The prevailing state of contraction in the market in past weeks may be explained by the presence of a general tendency to limit the rate of economic growth which according to preliminary data have realized great leaps since the end of Ramadan." It added, "In spite of the enormous balance of payments surplus, the process of transferring dinars to high-yield foreign assets in addition to covering import activities exceeds the pressure on reserves within the banking system. This disturbance generally arises as a consequence of concentrating import activity basically in the hands of the private sector, while receipts from oil exports, which account for 85 percent of total exports, are concentrated in the hands of the government. The rise in local interest rates has arisen from this, as well as from the contraction in economic activity through the flow of capital abroad for investment purposes." The bulletin anticipated that the short-term interest rate would remain at its current levels in coming weeks. On deposits committed for a 1-month period, it is expected that the increase will recur this week along with a stabilization in interest rates for other periods at their current levels. In the local market, gold prices have surged to 5,850 dinars per kilogram. The bond market valued in dinars is still suffering from fluctuations in American interest rates. Bonds have become extremely sensitive to interest rate movements since investors remain in a state of cautious expectation, waiting for specific new trends in the interest rate. Bond prices valued in dinars have retrenched in the past week. /Excerpts/ /Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 15 Sep 80 p 14/ 11887

ISRAEL'S PREPARATION OF NUCLEAR BOMB AS BLACKMAIL DESCRIBED

Rabat L'OPINION in French 17 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by J.K.: "Nuclear Blackmail"]

[Text] The Israeli leaders no longer have any illusions! They are now conscious of the fact that time is working against them. The Arab-Muslim world, whose foreign affairs ministers are meeting tomorrow in Fez, has become a power that is being listened to more and more: because of its human potential, its oil and financial power, and despite the differences. The power struggle is now different on the international scene. The Western world is no longer a bloc, and European and American interests, if not in contradiction, are at least increasingly divergent.

The United States itself is no longer in a position to impose its point of view as it did in the past. That is to say that Tel Aviv, which has survived heretofore because it was a politico-military instrument in the hands of the West, will not fail to become awkward for the economic and strategic interests of that same world. What is to be done, then? What blackmail is to be used? The Israeli leaders have opted for nuclear blackmail.

They have also launched a program to manufacture an atomic bomb jointly with South Africa. And taking advantage of the privileged ally situation they procured the technology and uranium they needed, from Europe as well as from the US.

Israel has known since 1973 that it has become very difficult, if not impossible, for it to repeat its 1967 victory. And the fact of the change occurring in international relations, Sino-American rapprochement, Euro-Arab rapprochement and the fact that the Arabs have much better mastery of armament technology. Also, the atomic weapon is the only possibility for the Zionist state to practice blackmail on the US as well as on the Arab world.

It is this blackmail we are confronting today and which we must react to, at the risk of seeing Zionism maintain its occupation.

FRENCH DELEGATION'S SUPPORT FOR MOROCCO ON SAHARA REPORTED

Rabat L'OPINION in French 20 Sep 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] The delegation from the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee of the French Senate, which has been visiting Morocco since Tuesday evening, is "convinced" that the Moroccan thesis on the Western Sahara is well-founded.

"I believe," Roger Poudonson (UCDP) [expansion unknown], the head of the delegation, stated Thursday evening at a press conference in Rabat, "that Morocco's argument is solid, and solidly rooted in history."

Mr Poudonson, who is vice chairman of the Senatorial Committee, affirmed, "We are pleased to find that the situation is better now than it was a year or two ago." He told of his "admiration for the moderation of the policy conducted by King Hassan II, who is trying very hard not to insult the future," notably by not exercising the right of succession.

"I believe," Mr Poudonson added, for the benefit of the Moroccans, "that you have the right for yourselves...that the populations are broadly self-determined, that you are not holding them in Laayoune forcibly, that one may come and go in that region. I am not at all convinced that there is an entity (Saharan)."

The vice chairman of the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee "does not rule out the possibility that the Algerians have other motives (than the creation of an independent state)," but he thinks they "may change. One already notes," he said, "that the blows with the fist have become blows with a pin."

The members of the senatorial delegation, who were received on Wednesday by the president of the Moroccan Chamber of Representatives, Dey Ould Sidi Baba, surrounded by the leaders of all the political parties--majority as well as opposition--, declared themselves struck in particular "by their faultless unity on the problem of the recovered provinces."

According to Mr Poudonson they regretted "that French public opinion is perhaps not as well informed as would be desirable on this unanimity on the part of the Moroccan people behind their king." The head of the delegation stated in that connection that he would inform the president of the Republic and the minister of Foreign Affairs next Monday of the reality of the situation.

For his part, Louis Longequeue (Socialist) indicated that the delegation had received an answer to the question "Who is arming the Polisario?", that answer being "Algeria and nations east of Algeria." He also said he was satisfied with the limits of the military cooperation between France and Morocco. "There are no French soldiers in the combat zones and contested territories," he said.

"Personally," he wonders if self-determination is possible in the Sahara and if the Moroccan people are not already self-determined. "It seems that they are," he replies, even while recalling that the Socialist Party has come out in favor of self-determination.

The delegation, which also includes Louis Martin (RI)[Independent Republican] and Alfred Gerin (independent), was to leave Rabat on Friday for Meknes and Marrakech, where it is to visit the Flying School, the Royal Academy and the Gendarmerie School.

UGTM CHARGES ARBITRARY OFFICIAL ACTION AGAINST MEMBERS

Statement of Bureau Members

Rabat L'OPINION in French 16 Sep 80 p 5

[Statement by seven members of suspended bureau]

[Text] On 30 April 1980, the personnel of the OFPPT [Office of Professional Training and Labor Promotion], meeting at the UGTM [General Union of Moroccan Workers] headquarters in Rabat, decided to create a national bureau made up of nine brothers well known for their union activity and their devotion to the task assigned to them.

Intense activity of two months' duration, during which this young bureau earned the sympathy of several partisans, shook up the OFPPT leaders, most of all the phantom bureau of the UMT [Moroccan Labor Federation].

In accordance with the directives from the leaders of the UGTM group, the federal bureau ceased its activities for a period of one month, to grant the wish of the OFPPT board of directors.

During that month of calm the board caught its breath, enabling the pawns of the union center to juggle with the decisions for change.

We deplore this abuse of trust; if we have kept silent it was in order to allow the office's board plenty of time to think it over. Since this is the way it is, we remind the OFPPT leaders that these sanction measures taken counter to these agents, to have to belong to a legal union recognized by the authorities can only double our forces, for our struggle will last as long as we are in this organization.

UGTM Executive Bureau Communique

Rabat L'OPINION in French 17 Sep p 2

[Text of communique from UGTM executive bureau]

[Text] The UGTM, after studying the situation of the union activity of the Professional Training Bureau, after contacting the Labor and Professional Training Ministry as well as the leadership of the Professional Training Bureau in Casablanca, has become aware of the fact that the situation that institution is experiencing is due to a group that is engaged in serving its own interests to the detriment of the genuine objectives for which that institution was founded.

For this reason, and following the events of 1973, 1976, 1977 and 1978, which culminated in the expulsion or suspension of a large number of persons, this group undertook a series of arbitrary changes coupled with more ignoble measures against the UGTM militants. Among these militants are brothers Namrouch Khlafa, Haj Bedouz, Hallab Mohamed, Mimoun Abdessalam, Najm Mohamed and Rguig Ahmed.

It is strange to hear the leaders of this institution say--to defend themselves--that they are not hostile to "the union is a legal activity," but that they are undertaking these measures for the good of and in the interest of the institution.

Even as we denounce these acts we wonder if one can expect anything good from an institution that is afraid of the union and does not respect the legitimate rights of union activity.

The UGTM insists that the leaders intervene immediately to render justice to the union activity in the Bureau of Professional Training and asks all those concerned to return to their place of work.

The UGTM affirms that the staff of this institution have, for the fifth time in ten years, expressed their devotion to the UGTM and emphasized that persecution and constraint will in no way affect these employees' determination not to deny their membership in the UGTM. This also constitutes a condemnation of the administrative degeneracy and the labor union treason within the institutions of the OFPPT.

SIGNING OF HEALTH AGREEMENTS WITH FRANCE REPORTED

Rabat L'OPINION in French 19 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] Rabat (MAP)--The minister of Public Health, Dr Rahal Rahhali, and the French secretary of State for Health and Social Security, Jean Farge, signed, on Wednesday in Rabat, the ceremonial act providing for eight cooperation projects, after three days of discussion in the second session of the joint Moroccan-French Health Sciences Committee, under the joint chairmanship of Dr Rahhali and Jean Farge.

The first project concerns "postgraduate training" and provides for bringing to Morocco French physicians whose "duties will be to provide health care and supervise interns and doctors in specialized training." These physicians, whose mission will be for a minimum of four years which can be extended for one or two two-year periods, will be integrated into the Public Health system.

The general text also provides for organization of an emergency service consisting of a study and coordination mission of long duration (four years) and the cooperation of French specialists in the development of the emergency toxicology service recently created in Rabat.

The third project provides for bringing to Morocco French specialists who will be in charge (for a maximum of four years) of training personnel for upkeep and maintenance of bio-medical equipment, general equipment and buildings.

Both parties accepted the plan for creating two medical schools in Morocco; French teachers and specialists will collaborate in realizing and operating the schools.

Training of social welfare personnel constitutes the fifth project, the French part being to take charge of training future Moroccan staff members in this field and putting at Morocco's disposal the French teachers necessary to put in place and operate the project.

Lastly, the last three projects concern radio protection service, assistance in matters of management and the exchange of documentation.

The signing ceremony took place in the presence of the secretary general of the Public Health Ministry, the principal private secretary, the French ambassador to Rabat and the members of the delegations from both countries.

'ALI NASIR MUHAMMAD SPEAKS ON REVOLUTION DAY

LD132200 Aden Domestic Service in Arabic 1730 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Speech by PDR Supreme People's Council chairman 'Ali Nasir Muhammad to commemorate 17th anniversary of the 14 October revolution--live or recorded]

[Excerpts] Brother citizens:

At its extraordinary general congress our party considered and defined its principled attitudes toward the situation in the neighboring region in particular and the Arab and international situation in general. While emphasizing the importance of establishing equal and constructive relations with our neighbors on the basis of peaceful coexistence and respect for national sovereignty, we are anxious about American military moves which have exposed the U.S. military administration's tendency to reinforce its hostile military presence through its bases and spy aircraft. We appeal to the states in the region to halt the deterioration affecting security and stability in the region due to (?the dangers) threatening the future of the region's peoples and world peace. For our part we stress that we will never remain silent in the face of any hostile presence in the region (?harmful) to the security and stability of our Yemeni people and of our Arab peoples.

Our country, relying on its known principled attitudes, will continue to support all militants struggling for the liberation and progress of their peoples and the world's peace and security. In this respect, we will continue our solidarity with the Oman revolution, the Palestinian revolution and the Lebanese national movement and we will support heroic Syria, Libya, Algeria and revolutionary Palestine and stand with them in the same trenches.

(?We will support) the establishment by (?the Arabs) of the foundations of the National Steadfastness and Confrontation Front to enable it to do its duty of resisting the designs and conspiracies of imperialism and Zionism. We will also work to expand the scope of comprehensive cooperation with the countries of the socialist community, headed by the USSR, for whose support and backing of the struggle of our Yemeni people and the Arab peoples for national liberation and social progress words of appreciation and deep respect cannot suffice.

Once again, brother citizens, let me congratulate you heartily in the hope that the 18th anniversary of the revolution will witness further victories and successes in bringing the hopes and aspirations of our great people and our glorious party to realization. Peace be upon you all.

PAPER SAYS U.S. SENT TROOPS TO GULF SOON AFTER WAR BEGAN

NC051421 Paris AFP in English 1405 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Text] Damascus, 5 Oct (AFP)--The United States sent troops to Oman, Bahrain, Dubayy and Saudi Arabia soon after the Iranian-Iraqi war broke out two weeks ago, the ruling Syrian Ba'th Party newspaper AL-BA'TH said today.

Quoting "reliable sources in the Gulf," AL-BA'TH added that Egyptian President Anwar as-Sadat had "contacted several powers in the region in view of cooperating in the American military set-up."

The newspaper said that the armed forces of Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Qatar and Saudi Arabia were on full alert and that guard of oil wells had been stepped up. AL-BA'TH also said "Iraqi planes and warships are in Bahrain and in the emirate of Ra's al-Khaymah."

Again quoting "informed sources," the newspaper said "U.S. Phantoms, at first mistaken for Iranian aircraft, have been carrying out regular high-altitude patrols over the region."

AL-BA'TH warned that "several Arab and foreign companies" were seriously considering winding up their interests in the Gulf after fears increased that the war could drag on even if the United States "intervened officially."

In another, more conciliatory article, the party newspaper called on both Iraq, an "Arab country," and Iran, as a "strategic ally of the Arab nation," to accept their responsibilities and end the war.

AL-BA'TH wrote that Iraq should save its strength to fight "imperialism, Zionism and the Camp David agreements (between Israel and Egypt)" while Iran should "stand by the Arab side."

The party daily called for an urgent reconciliation, noting that the Arab world needed "Iraqi strength and Iranian support."

The Syrian newspaper said that the war could end up pushing Iran into American arms by putting too heavy a strain on it, concluding that this would be "neither in Iran's nor the Arab nation's interest."

DAMASCUS RADIO COMMENTS ON SYRIAN-SOVIET TREATY

JN101440 Damascus Domestic Service in Arabic 1230 GMT 10 Oct 80

[Station commentary]

[Text] The friendship and cooperation treaty signed between Syria and the Soviet Union within the framework of the historic visit leader President Hafiz al-Asad is paying to Moscow is a large victory for the forces of liberation and progress in the region. It is also a new consolidation of the Arab revolution movement's capabilities in the confrontation of the Camp David schemes and the Zionist and imperialist forces' plots, which are aimed at liquidating the Palestinian issue and imposing the conditions of capitulation and defeatism on the entire Arab nation.

The extraordinary Arab and international interest in this treaty reflects to a large extent its strategic value concerning the Arab liberation struggle at this stage. Balance in the region will shortly be achieved, and this will inevitably lead to the deterrence of the Zionist aggression, the encirclement of the Camp David accords from all sides and the creation of new and practical realities for the Arab masses so that they can exercise an advanced role on the level of deepening their pan-Arab steps and mobilizing their self-potentials on the liberation battle arena.

All this embodies the historic meaning of President al-Asad's visit to the Soviet Union. For Syria, which has always cared to consolidate the friendship and cooperation with the forces of liberation and socialism in the world, is now behaving on the basis that it now high time to step up these relations by the qualitative factor, which is embodied in the friendship and cooperation treaty with the Soviet Union.

The hostile forces' reaction to this treaty stresses this treaty's importance and seriousness as regards the whole prevailing situation in the Middle East. Terrorist Menahem Begin, prime minister of the Zionist enemy, has expressed his deep concern over the conclusion of a friendship and cooperation treaty between Syria and the Soviet Union. He expects that large repercussions will occur on the world level. As for Egypt's ruler Anwar al-Sadat, he described the treaty as very serious because, in his opinion, it will lead to a new defect in the balance of powers in the region.

It is understood from these comments that the Zionist and imperialist forces will as of now try to undertake some aggressive moves in the Middle East with the aim of placing the region before a grave state of aggravation and deterioration. These forces will then proceed to direct attacks against the positions of the Arab liberation movement.

This indicator can be detected in more than one place in the Middle East.

The United States is reinforcing its military presence in the Gulf region under the pretext of protecting the oil supplies against havoc and sabotage attempts. The colonialist forces in general are, in turn, trying to employ the circumstances and interactions of the Iraqi-Iranian war to rebuild their fallen positions in the region and to further loot the Arab nation's material and human wealth. However, these imperialist calculations will not, from now on, go according to plan because the qualitative leap of the Syrian-Soviet relations will completely foil such calculations and will basically reformulate the general situation in the region in the interest of Arab rights.

The welcome with which the friendship and cooperation treaty between Syria and the Soviet Union has been received by the forces of liberation and progress in the Middle East and the world simply means that the forces of colonialism and imperialism have been stricken by a new defeat in the Arab region, something which constitutes in itself the other face of the justice of the pan-Arab struggle being waged by the Arab nation to liberate its occupied territories and restore its usurped rights.

The next few days will witness further positive changes on this level. From now on, the Middle East will not remain the captive of imperialist and Zionist control. It will find itself all at once in a position of complete freedom from this grave control. Thus, Syria has returned the crisis of the Arab-Zionist struggle to its correct historical framework and has reorganized the pan-Arab home in a manner that will enable the entire Arab nation to overcome all the obstacles impeding its required liberation and to directly enter the comprehensive confrontation of the enemies.

RESPONSE TO LIBERIAN FOREIGN MINISTER STATEMENT

LD031055 Abu Dhabi AL-ITTIHAD in Arabic 30 Sep 80 p 6

[Editor's column: "With the Events"]

[Text] The recent developments in the area in relation to the settlement between Egypt and the Israeli enemy have enabled Israel to reap the fruits of its diplomatic victories at every level. The Liberian foreign minister's recent statement calling for a rapprochement between the African states and Israel is a very serious statement and implies many things. If we go back to the not too distant past, we discover that the African states, after the 1973 war, severed their diplomatic relations with the Israeli enemy in solidarity with the Arab nation. The African states adopted that firm stand when Arab solidarity was almost complete.

But now that the Arabs are split and lack leadership, Israel has begun to take advantage of this situation in order to implement its hostile policy. The Israeli information media have been distorting the Arab image in the African states. We are aware that Israel needs markets to sell its goods and products and that the African states are the only market for Israel. We are also aware that the Israeli goods were reaching Uganda after the 70's and that the Ugandan Government later became aware of this matter and, under concerted Arab pressure, banned Israeli goods from its territory. Now, however, the situation is completely different. Israel is now safe and unaffected by Arab surveillance, especially in the wake of the Egyptian-Israeli rapprochement engineered by the imperialist states, which has led to the detachment of Egypt from the Arab ranks and from the Arab confrontation of Israel and in view of the serious developments that are taking place in the area.

The Liberian foreign minister justifies his call by the fact that Egypt has established diplomatic relations with Israel and that Egypt is an Arab state and therefore, why should the African states, which have nothing to do with Arabism, not do the same. Israel seized this opportunity and welcomed this "blessed" African initiative, thanking the Arab states for being the cause for such an initiative to be made.

In view of all this, what will the Arab states do to counter this African step? Will they issue strong resolutions like the ones they issued at the time when Jerusalem was annexed and the sanctions they imposed on the states which recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital? We seek stronger resolutions than those in order to counter this step and to check Israel and prevent it from taking advantage of any opportunity that might present itself in the absence of Arab solidarity.

OIL EXPLORATION AGREEMENT--The heir apparent and chairman of the Executive Council, Shaykh Khalifah ibn Zayid, signed today two franchise agreements on oil exploration with U.S. and Canadian companies. Petroleum and Natural Resources Minister Dr Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utaybah, who attended the signing ceremony, said the contracts for the first time stipulate new terms at the instructions of the heir apparent. The companies are to explore for potable water. Gas explored in the franchise area will be the property of the government. The companies must pay any taxes levied by the government. He said that these new terms are among the best reached by any OPEC country or other organization. ALPS CLAIMS WIPING OUT OF ELITE FAR UNIT IN SAHARA

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 19-20 Sep 80 p 5

[Article: "An Elite FAR Unit Wiped Out in South Morocco by the ALPS"]

[Text] Two hundred ninety-seven monarchist soldiers killed and 24 others taken prisoner; 4 armored tanks destroyed.

SDAR [Saharan Democratic Arab Republic] (Liberated territories) (APS)--A communique of the Saharan Ministry of Information announced: "After the annihilation of the Moroccan elite troops, pompously named by the Hassan II government "Ouhoud," "Zellagha," "Badr," "Imann," our brave ALPS [Saharan People's Liberation Army] again realized a great war exploit within the framework of the "Houari Boumediene" offensive against aggressive Moroccan troops in the region between Seken and Abatih (South Morocco)."

"Thus fighting units of our heroic ALPS on 17 September 1980 engaged in battle against the "famous" Moroccan elite "Larak," supported by the 10th regiment. During violent conflicts that lasted 16 hours, our brave fighters disabled several hundreds of monarchist soldiers, wounded another several hundred, destroyed or recovered an impressive amount of military equipment, including armored tanks, various types of vehicles, as well as heavy and light weapons," added the communique.

"Several tens of monarchist soldiers were captured by our illustrious fighters during this battle," continued the document.

A second communique specified that "aggressive Moroccan forces experienced significant losses in human lives and materiel, estimated at:

- 297 dead, of all ranks, and as many wounded, and the destruction of the following materiel:

- 4 armored tanks, 23 Land Rovers, 11 "GMC" trucks, 4 "Unimog" trucks, 5 105-mm cannons, 3 120-mm mortars, 4 81-mm mortars, 5 12.7 mm machine guns,

2 14.5--mm machine guns, 3 23-mm bi-tube batteries.

At the end of this battle, the Saharan fighters captured 54 enemy soldiers, including 2 adjutants, and recovered the following materiel:

- 14 Land Rover vehicles, 4 GMC trucks, 1 crane, 1 tank truck, 2 VLRA trucks, 5 12.7-mm machine guns, 7 American-30 machine guns, 10 Mag machine guns, 3 anti-tank rocket launchers, 130 Fal guns, 11 Kalashnikov's, 1 mine detector, 7 transmitter-receiver sets, including 2 long-range ones, 83 tons of ammunition.

Thus this new defeat of the Moroccan elite "Larak," cream of the general staff of the annexationist troops of Rabat, which follows the preceding ones of the "Ouhoud," Zellagha," "Badr" groups, in more ways than one reveals the determination of our people to pursue and to generalize armed struggle everywhere on Moroccan territory as long as the Hassan II government confines itself to blind intransigence and continues to reverse the decisions and resolutions of the international organizations that acknowledge our people's legitimate right to national independence and sovereignty.

This very day, our brave fighters intensively rammed the Moroccan "Gour-Lehcheicha" garrison (on the SDAR-Moroccan border), causing very great losses in human lives and materiel to the monarchist occupation and invasion forces," the Saharan communique also indicated.

POLISARIO ESCALATING MARITIME OPERATIONS AGAINST SPAIN

Paris LE MONDE in French 4 Oct 80 p 11

[Article by Daniel Junqua: "Fifteen Portuguese Fishermen Captured by the POLISARIO"]

[Text] Algiers--On Thursday, 2 October, the POLISARIO announced that the "Saharan navy" had visited and inspected a Portuguese boat while it was fishing along the Western Saharan coast. Fifteen fishermen were captured and "will be freed at the right moment." The announcement was in contrast to the Saharan silence toward the 29 September attack at Dakhla of two Spanish trawlers, the "Sarita" and the "Costa Terranova," whose crews were arrested (LE MONDE, 1 October).

The difference in treatment is completely intentional. To obtain the release of 14 of its subjects seized under similar conditions in June, the Lisbon government recognized the POLISARIO as the "unique and legitimate representative of the Saharan people," and, in a communique published on that occasion referred to the SADR twice. Madrid's officials on the contrary have refused to take such a step to recover the 15 crewmembers of the "Gormonar," seized on 22 May. These last few weeks, they have carried out an active international campaign to denounce the "dealings of the POLISARIO.." At their institgation, the foreign ministers of the member countries of the Andean Pact have sent a telegram to the UN Commission of Human Rights protesting against the arrest of the Spanish fishermen.

The Saharan leaders have disliked this initiative. They counterattacked by sending one of their officials, Mr Mahfoud Laroussi, to Panama and publishing a message violently denouncing "Spain's hostile policy toward the Saharan people." The seizure of 25 new sailors, which brings to 40 the number of Spaniards arrested by POLISARIO, constitutes a new escalade and places the Spanish authorities in a difficult situation.

The increase of maritime operations against Spain also makes it possible for the POLISARIO to be talked about at the international level at a time when a UN session that will deal again with the Saharan problem is opening and it seems that the Saharan resistance fighters are clasing on the ground with a more effective resistance from the Moroccan army, at least in Southern Morocco.

ARAB ECONOMIC SOCIAL COUNCIL AGREES ON ECONOMIC ACCORDS

Joint Arab Economic Charter

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 12 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Accord reached on inter-Arab investment agreement.

Steps for admission of PLO as observer with IMF being taken.

Tunis--The 29th regular session of the Council of Arab Ministers of Economy, which concluded its deliberations on Wednesday, has adopted a plan for a joint Arab economic action charter designed to promote cooperation and economic reciprocity among the Arab nations.

This plan will be submitted at the First Arab Economic Summit Meeting, which is to be held next November in Amman (Jordan).

The council has also adopted an inter-Arab agreement on investments presented by Tunisia. It has retained the principle of Arab Economic and Social Development Fund (FADES) and Arab Monetary Fund (FMA) capital growth.

These two institutions, which have been meeting since yesterday in Tunis, are to particularly discuss the ways and means of producing this capital growth.

And lastly, the council has appointed a committee to study the draft of an agreement designed to facilitate trade among the Arab countries. This draft will be submitted at the council's next meeting, scheduled for 25 February in Tunis.

The Economic and Social Council has, furthermore, decided to take steps to admit the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) as an observer at International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank meetings.

Assistant Secretary General of the League of Arab States for Economic Affairs Abdelhassen Zelzela said that the council has reaffirmed its earlier resolutions on the need for granting the PLO observer status at IMF and World Bank meetings. The council, which consists of the ministers of economy of those Arab nations that are members of the League of Arab States, has decided to step up its efforts to achieve this objective.

Sources close to the council stress the fact that the Arab nations' request on behalf of the PLO is in accordance with IMF and World Bank statutes which provide for the admission of observers.

The same sources feel that, since most of the member-nations favor PLO admission, it should in principle be accepted.

Inter-Arab Investment Agreement

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 11 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by M.M.]

[Text] Last night, the Arab Economic and Social Council concluded the proceedings of its 29th regular session, which took place from 8 to 10 September at the Hotel Africa in Tunis and were presided over by Palestinian delegation head Walid Kamhawi.

At a press conference he held immediately after the conlcusion of the council's deliberations, Assistant Secretary General of the League of Arab States for Economic Affairs Dr Zelzela described this session as "the most positive and most effective of all the sessions in view of the importance of the issues that were dealt with and the interest it represented as a preliminary session for the coming Arab economic summit meeting."

Among the chief positive points of this session, Dr Zelzela emphasized the agreement of all council members on the pan-Arab economic action charter, whose most important principles are the neutralization of economic action, Arab economic citizenship, preferential treatment, economic solidarity and the freedom of workers to move about freely within the Arab world.

The league's assistant secretary general said that another important point adopted by the council was the inter-Arab investment agreement, which he felt constitutes "a big step" toward the strengthening of inter-Arab cooperation since it grants Arab investors legal and financial guarantees and treatment which, while not privileged, is at least equal to that reserved for local nationals in order to encourage these investors to let their capital grow inside the Arab world and benefit their sister nations.

The council also demonstrated its desire to favor the growth of FADES and FMA capital and to open special accounts in these two funds to come to the aid of the less advanced Arab countries.

Dr Zelzela, furthermore, admitted that the council had to postpone discussion of several items on this session's agenda until the next session, which will be held next 25 February. Among the chief items that were postponed was the draft of an agreement on inter-Arab trade.

Prime Minister's Address

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 11 Sep 80 p 4

[Speech by Tunisian Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali in Tunis on the occasion of the 24th session of the Arab Economic and Social Council; date not given]

[Text] Tunisia is fc the drafting of a uniform treaty for the protection of investments.

Let us make this a decade of overall Arab development.

Mr President, Your Highnesses, Your Excellencies, Dear Friends:

First of all, I would like to warmly greet you, to welcome you in the name of the president, the government and the people of Tunisia and extend to you greetings from his excellency President Habib Bourguiba and his wishes for a pleasant stay among us here and complete success in your deliberations.

I would also like to congratulate you on the efforts you have made these past 2 days to evaluate the Arab and international economic situations, to seek ways to consolidate cooperation among the Arab countries and to establish the sound basis for economic relations among our countries first and then between the Arab community and foreign economic and political cartels with the aim of preserving the interests of the Arab Nation and of strengthening its position in international forums.

Honorable Delegates,

We believe that the chief objective of any Arab action should be the mobilization of our energies and our potential to liberate occupied Arab territories and to achieve the desire of the Palestinian people, that is, the creation of their own state.

This oblige us to further affirm the might and invulnerability of the Arab Nation such that it will be able to deal with Zionist attempts to dominate us and to carry out plans for colonization aimed at Judaizing occupied Palestinian and Arab territories, including the holy city of Al Quds [Jerusalem] which the enemy is trying to empty of its Arab citizens and where it is applying a policy of fait accompli.

It is also indispensable for us to operate through the media to further enlarge the audience for the legitimate struggle the Arab Nation is engaged in, at the top of the list the heroic people of Palestine, the objective being to gain the support necessary for the triumph of our just causes.

Moreover, it is to our advantage to reactivate the north-south dialogue and the Arab-African and Arab-Arab dialogues through which the Arab community will work for the recognition of our inalienable national rights and of the PLO as a unique and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and for Israel's withdrawal from occupied Palestinian and Arab territories.

Firm Arab determination as regards the Knesseth's vote on Al Quds has produced a profound repercussion in international forums. All those countries that had diplomatic representatives in Al Quds have hastened to transfer their embassies to Tel Aviv, convinced as they are of the legitimacy of the Arab position following the Security Council's adoption of a resolution opposing recognition of Al Quds as capital of Israel.

Reduce Gaps Between Arab Countries

Honorable Delegates,

The realization of this strategy for joint Arab economic action, which your honorable council has approved at this special session in Amman will require of us a long-term effort for the construction of an Arab economy based on reciprocity, which will tighten our ranks and eliminate disparities.

Collectively and individually, the Arab nations are faced with serious challenges that threaten their existence and prevent them from following the path of economic reciprocity and political solidarity.

While Zionist aggression represents the chief challenge to our existence, our civilization and our future, economic, social and technological underdevelopment constitutes a threat to the Arab Nation's aspriations for prosperity and union.

Disparities of income and wealth in the Arab countries constitute a problem that has shaped and will continue to shape economic and political relations among the Arab nations.

To be sure, these nations have individually worked out plans aimed at limiting the gaps between the social classes and at achieving overall development within their respective countries. But the time has come today to work with determination on the basis of a sincere political desire to reduce the gaps between Arab countries by at least enabling certain favored ones among them to catch up with the main body of developed countries. This task is not difficult for a nation united by bonds of language, religion, civilization and common destiny.

Establishment of Joint Arab Projects

During the past decade, Arab countries with financial surpluses have made considerable efforts to speed up the process of growth in the developing countries, particularly in Arab countries. This aid has contributed to the realization of the development programs and plans of the countries involved and to the launching of reciprocal Arab economic action, put into practice by the establishment of joint Arab projects.

However, these efforts have not yet come up to the level of the hopes and aspirations of the Arab Nation, which has forced the deficit Arab states to borrow on international financial markets to finance their development plans and to bear the heavy burden of the terms they thus have to accept.

It in only natural for Arab states with limited resources to expect a regular and well-organized contribution from their sister nations with financial surpluses. Thus, through these investments, Arab capital will serve to strengthen the forward motion of our development.

Honorable Delegates,

Tunisia supports your efforts toward the drafting of a uniform treaty for the protection of investments. The object of this treaty is the judicious utilization of surpluses for profitable Arab projects that will benefit the entire Arab Nation and consolidate its joint economic interests, inasmuch as Arab capital invested in Arab countries poses less problems than foreign capital.

First of All Liberate Arab Spirit and Determination

In order to encourage investors of Arab capital, Tunisia has constantly granted them guarantees, privileges and even concessions. This is why we take the liberty of insisting on this point which, to our way of thinking, will represent the cornerstone of joint Arab action in the 1980's. So we join you in your praiseworthy efforts to make of this decade one of overall Arab development.

I also take my hat off to your agreement on the increase in funds to be allotted to national development funds and on the strengthening of the FADES and FMA through increases in their capital and improvement of their methods of operation in order to permit them to speed up the process of economic and social development in the Arab countries, to facilitate trade among them and to intensify them.

Honorable Delegates,

Future generations would judge us harshly if we failed to assure the development of the Arab citizen since he is both the craftsman of development and its ultimate objective.

This is why it is appropriate for us to first of all liberate Arab spirit and determination, which could not be achieved without the development of human resources and without improving the level of our technological acquisitions, which must be diffused on a large scale throughout the Arab world. This will be the price we have to pay to reduce our dependence on the industrial world in the different domains of development.

Pursue Action to Link and Associate Our Economic Interests

I have with great satisfaction noted that heading your list of objectives of the strategy for a joint Arab economic action program is the necessity of liberating the Arab and freeing his creative energies to get him to participate in the development program and to profit from its benefits.

We are convinced that the overall development that has motivated the efforts of generations of Arabs and which has pressed them to make sacrifices is based essentially on the necessity of satisfying the basic needs of our citizens, of assuring them dignity by affording all of them opportunities for learning and by creating productive and profitable jobs that benefit the whole community, which will make possible greater participation of the people in the effort toward development.

Honorable Delegates,

Overall Arab development will certainly profit from the development in progress in each Arab country and will also be strengthened by the joint Arab action plan.

This is why we must make an effort to gradually reduce the gap between the Arab countries and pursue our action to link and associate Arab economic interests. To our way of thinking, this is the best path to follow to realize the aspirations of the Arab Nation and the generations of Arabs who have been striving for well-being and union.

Aside from conducting joint Arab projects and promoting trade and capital investment among the Arab countries, we must grant the support necessary for the realization of each country's development plans, all the while working toward their integration into the framework of a pan-Arab plan for joint economic action. This support must above all be realized through participation in the financing of projects for the construction of economic and social facilities designed to create new opportunities for investment and profit.

In connection with this, permit me to remind you that the dean of Arab and African national struggles, that supreme fighter, Habib Bourguiba, has made all the problems we are discussing here together and all Arab concerns the focal point of his fight against colonialism and imperialism. It is he who has sung the praises of the promotion of people. He emancipated women and generalized education, making technological expertise one of the major objectives of education. He has made equitable distribution of wealth the foundation of our economy and he has never ceased to believe and to affirm that the union the Arab countries aspire to must first go through a phase of joint reciprocal economy.

Honorable Delegates,

Both political and economic joint Arab action has without any doubt benefited from the contribution of this meeting of your council. In fact, as have the earlier ones, this session of the Arab Economic and Social Council has contributed to the establishment of constructive and effective resolutions.

No doubt the agreement that prevails among Arab leaders will work in favor of Arab solidarity and spur our nation on to work quickly and resolutely to realize its aspirations for dignity and prosperity.

There can be no doubt that the president of this session has spared no effort to see to it that the results anticipated at this meeting were obtained within the deadlines set for them.

In conclusion, let me take advantage of this opportunity to express, before you assembled here, to the secretary general of the League of Arab States and his collaborator in the field of economic development, Dr Abdelhassen Zelzela, and to all the staff of the league our esteem and respect and our encouragement for the ongoing efforts they are expending to facilitate the task assigned to these institutions and organizations so that they can be assured of the success of the projects we plan to carry out.

Permit me, Excellencies, to thank you for your praiseworthy efforts these past 2 days and to greet our other brother delegates who are to join you in participating in the proceedings of the two special sessions to be held by the governors of the FADES and FMA.

On this occasion, I wish you complete success in your work and a pleasant stay in Tunis.

The president said to me that perhaps I was tired because of the job I just finished during the 2 days I spent in our sister republic of Algeria. I feel that the positive results we have achieved in our work constitute a reason for rejoicing and I hope that your work will achieve the same results.

May God help us in what we are doing for the well-being, dignity and invulnerability of our glorious Arab Nation.

Resuming the floor, Dr Walid Kamhawi thanked the prime minister and asked him to transmit a message expressing his esteem to the supreme fighter for the interest Tunisia has shown with regard to the different Arab issues.

Officials Speak at Governors' Meeting

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 12 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] A joint meeting of the FMA and FADES Councils of Governors was held yesterday morning in Tunis with Messrs Hanna Ouda, president of the Jordanian National Plan Council, Mansour Moalla, minister of finance and plan, Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the League of Arab States, Mohamed Imadi, director general of the FADES, and Jaouad Hachem, president of the FMA, attending.

At the start of the proceedings, Mr Hanna Ouda delivered an address in which he thanked Tunisia for its hospitality, then turned the presidency of the meeting over to Mr Mansour Moalla.

The minister of finance and plan delivered a speech on this occasion in which he said: "We are starting in on a new decade of development during which the Arab countries intend to achieve the launching of the Arab economy through mobilization of all Arab resources and in conformity with the overall socioeconomic development strategy outlined by the secretary general of the league at the recommendation of the 10th Arab Summit Meeting and approved by the Arab Economic and Social Council.

"The economic development of the Arab world," Mr Moalla added, "constitutes the essential basis of Arab solidarity and of the reinforcement of Arab positions in international forums. The Arab world is today in a state of economic dependence for its food and the satisfaction of its daily needs as well as for its equipment and defense."

After reminding us that this meeting was devoted to an examination of the resources, ways and means of financing Arab economic development, Mr Mansour Moalla noted that the Arab Nation has wealth which will enable it to realize its aspirations if the Arab countries know how to exploit it for the benefit of their development. In connection with this he called for the development of financial aid from those

Arab countries possessing capital for the other Arab countries to help the latter to finance their national development programs. "It would be desirable for the Arab countries to give up non-Arab financial aid and become autonomous in terms of financing."

The minister further emphasized the need for increasing FMA and FADES capital so that these two institutions would be in a position to satisfy the development needs of the Arab countries.

He also advocated expansion of the staffs of these two Arab institutions.

Mr Moalla called on these two institutions to act to get competent Arabs practicing their specialties abroad to return to the Arab countries and place their abilities at the service of the Arab Nation, which has great need of these abilities.

The minister of finance and plan recommended increased cooperation and exchanges of experience and information between these two institutions and Arab financial organizations.

He also advocated reform and revision of the methods of operation of the two funds to adapt them to the needs and realities of the Arab countries.

Noting that our problem most often lies in the choice of projects and their execution, Mr Moalla called on the FADES to aid the Arab countries in the domain of identification and conception of economic projects.

"The Arab countries," Mr Moalla added in conclusion, "are now being called on to rely on their own resources and to give serious thought to the realization of their objectives, which are the protection of their territories, property and independence under one and the same banner and within the framework of a reciprocal economy."

The Arab countries are also being called on to consolidate the various Arab funds so that they will be able to respond to the needs and economic and social aspirations of the Arab peoples.

In his speech at the joint meeting of the FMA and FADES Councils of Governors, Mr Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the League of Arab States, said: "We need solidarity and effective cohesion in the face of the challenges we are confronted with, the maneuvers of those who are actively engaged in imposing their domination on the peoples of the Third World, in exhausting their resources, in weakening their solidarity, in dividing their ranks, today when the community of this Third World has demonstrated its ability to change the balance of power and international relations.

But to gain for ourselves, for us Arabs, the freedom to choose and to set out options in motion to serve the interests of our nation, we must strengthen our unity and improve our relations on the basis of reciprocity among our countries."

He, furthermore, stressed the fact that each Arab country has, of course, been separately engaged in increasing its own resources and in improving the social and economic conditions of its population inside its borders independently of any pan-Arab vision, which has involved differences in growth rates and reduced the ability to mobilize Arab energies to strengthen pan-Arab security and social stability and to speed up the process of development.

After analyzing the Arab economic situation and stressing the importance of the role played by the FADES and the FMA, Mr Klibi said:

"We consider what your two institutions have accomplished or are getting ready to do to be a contribution to the edification of Arab power, enabling us to assume the responsibilities involved in overall development and to deal with Israeli acts of aggression, whatever form they may take, especially at this time when we are receiving information that gives us cause for concern.

"The Israeli prime minister, who constantly resorts to a fait accompli policy as far as the international community is concerned, whether it be in the form of the settlement of colonies, exactions from Palestinian resistance fighters in the occupied territories or the Judaization of Al Quds and proclamation of that city as the capital of the Zionist state.

"The day before yesterday, the Zionist leader announced that he had reliable information establishing the fact that Syria was getting ready to launch an attack on Israel in a few days."

Appeal for Vigilance

"This technique is classic," Mr Klibi added. "We have been stuck with the bill over and over again. Each time Israel decides to engage in an act of aggression against the Arab countries, it sets false alarms and blusteringly announces that it is certain that the Arabs are preparing to attack.

"From this rostrum," the secretary general of the League of Arab States said, "We declare that the responsibility for any act of aggression in the region must be assumed by the Zionist state. The latter would, in fact, like to take advantage of what it considers to be a vacancy in the government in the United States to engage in aggression in order to extend its territory, establish its domination, lay hands on Arab lands and violate holy sites revered by both Moslems and Christians."

He concluded:

"In the face of these designs, we can only direct to the United Nations, to all nations that love peace and justice, an appeal for vigilance and ask them to warn the Zionist government of the consequences of what it may be tempted to undertake against UN forces, against Lebanese territory, directly or through agents who have linked their fate with Israeli interests, or after all against any country whatsoever in the region.

KLIBI ADDRESSES LEBANON PROBLEMS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 20 Sep 80 pp 1, 5

[Text] It is up to Arabs to support Lebanon and it is up to Lebanon to work towards an Arab solution to the problem.

Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the League of Arab Nations left Beirut yesterday for Baghdad.

The secretary general of the league, who was seen off in particular by Fuad Butros, Lebanese minister of foreign affairs, said the following:

"The discussions I have had have helped me to get a better grasp of all the elements of the Lebanese problem. I can assure you that this problem is uppermost in the minds of the members of the Arab community and of the secretary general of the league.

"I have informed their excellencies, president Sarkis, Prime Minister El Hoss, and Minister of Foreign Affairs Fuad Butros of recent Arab decisions regarding Lebanon and aimed at strengthening the Lebanese state in all areas and in all ways to resist the Israeli enemy and to use the influence which Arab states have achieved to end the aggression against Southern Lebanon.

"We have explored what we ought to do to help Lebanon free itself from the painful situation it has been in for 5 years now and what we might attempt in order to begin a movement towards peace, to spread law throughout Lebanese territory, and to try to reestablish security in the country.

"I have also spoken with Ministers Jdeph Skaff and Ali Khalil and Brig Gen Sami El Khatib, commander of deterrent forces, particularly about reestablishing Lebanese rule and about Arab assistant in the reconstruction of Lebanon.

"I reassured them that the league would adhere to the unanimous decisions made by the Arabs, taking into account the changes which have come about in the geopolitical situation of the area in general.

"At the Chamber of Deputies meeting, I saw President Mounir Abou Fahdi and Deputies Abdellatif Bayahoun and Sheykh Amine Gemayel. They explained their opinions on the situation in Lebanon and particularly in Southern Lebanon.

"I assured them of natural Arab support of Lebanon and of the conviction among all Arabs that there is a permanent bond between the future of Lebanon and that of the Arab community.

"It is precisely from this Arab point of view," Klibi concluded, "that the recent decision by the league must be viewed which requests the secretary general to make whatever contacts might be necessary to put the question of Southern Lebanon on the agenda for the next Arab meetings."

ARAB JOURNALISTS ASSESS ARAB PRESS

Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 20 Aug 80 p 5

[Article by Muhammad Rashid al-'Awwid: "What Arab Journalists Have To Say About the Arab Press"]

[Text] AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM was blown up, Riyadh Taha was assassinated, and prior to all this, Salim al-Lawzi was murdered.

The word of the press has become a source of concern, resentment and indignation. But the persons concerned--the persons with this power to provoke concern, resentment and indignation, prefer not to discuss their own affairs, though they discuss all other matters

We asked them to address this matter and talk about their Arab press. We were like someone scraping the scab off their wound, for they talked like wounded people.

I have met with Arab jounalists at various conferences and political gatherings which we attended jointly and then wrote about; I took the opportunity to invite them to discuss the Arab press.

They asked me how reserved they should be in writing about this subject. My answer: "Write freely. Your work will be published in Kuwait, where the press is free from the coercion felt by the press in most other Arab countries.

Awaiting a Political Initiative

Yusuf al-Rafhi, chief of the foreign section of newspaper AL-KHALIJ: "The progress of journalism is related first to the theory of government and then to the consciousness of the masses. The theory of government reflects on the press. If the society lives in a democratic state, it means that the press is free.

"If the theory of government is one of controls, and the press is part of the overall entity, then it is also controlled.

"Arab sensitivities play a very large role in the political topics treated by the press. If the relations are good between two countries, it is difficult for one to write criticism of the other country's regime. When relations between two countries deteriorate, each government inspires the press to criticize, expose and provoke the other regime.

"In technology and artistry, the Arab press has made great strides. It has become nearly the most modern in the world of journalism. At times, this creates a contradiction between form and content. While form is advancing, content is lagging behind to a great extent.

"In any case, journalistic work is making progress. The future of the Arab press is favorable. Officials acknowledge that the press has a role to play, and they sense its influence. One can now see that the Arab press has begun to handle subjects which it was previously forbidden to discuss.

"Finally, the Arab news media constantly seek political initiatives with clear guidelines serving the Arabs. Whenever there is such an initiative, the Arab journalist promptly undertakes to perform his task as best he can. The Arab journalist is an Arab citizen who assumes his responsibility and works very hard at it."

Army of Mercenaries and the Prostitution of the Profession

Ghassan Sharbil of AL-NAHAR in Beirut: "Discussion of journalism requires a discussion of freedom. It is a discussion talking place throughout the Arab nation. Where there is no freedom, there is no journalism, because the press which echoes just one voice cannot respect truth and enrich the reader.

"Thus, a discussion of the Arab press leads us to certain situations where there are independent newspapers not forced to advocate this or that party, or to applaud one regime or another.

"Such cases are so few, they are rare in our Arab world. A journalist rarely has the opportunity to make effective criticism. He is usually given a conditional right to criticize, so that the right to criticize is transformed into an obligation to express approval and support.

"The problem does not just involve the press. It is a problem of the way the various regimes regard the Arab individual, who is still viewed as a quantity.

"In the short run, I do not expect the independent press to grow. On the contrary, I expect an increased campaign against the independent press, using 'smarter' methods.

"While I criticize regimes, I do not overlook directing criticism at institutions of the press and newsmen themselves, because an army of mercenaries has shared in prostituting this profession. The ordinary citizen has come to see the press as a mere mouthpiece, so often have certain journalists acted as servants.

"Finally, the development of a genuine, fress press which respects the individual depends on an increase in the progress or growth of democratic and secular movements in various Arab societies."

Press is the Captive of all Regimes

Muhammad al-Ashhab, former editor of the daily AL-MITHAQ AL-WATANI, which expresses the opinion of the parliamentary majority in Morocco: "The situation of the Moroccan press is something that affects me personally at present. It is a situation where it is difficult to find journalistic work free of the tyranny of the party press.

"It is true that the existence of pulpits of information through which the political institutions express their positions and proclaim their principles is a positive sign. However, the tyranny of party opinion over journalism clearly contributes toward not publishing the simple objective truth.

"Every morning these various political pulpits publish various opinions in line with their basic postulates. The reader does not try to seek the truth elsewhere.

"In other words, I'm saying that journalism in Morocco is the same as the profession of a politician. Thus, changing jobs from one newspaper to another is considered a switch from one line to another. Consequently, professional journalism is nonexistent.

"As for the emigre press, I think it has fallen into the same trap as the one into which the press in the Arab world has fallen.

"The basic problem of the Arab press in general is one of freedom.

"Allegiance to one regime or another confines the practice of journalism, whether publication is in Europe or the Arab world. For this reason, emigration is useless.

"In essence, journalism has remained the captive of all regimes, of anyone who pays the most. It has become like a commodity sold here and there."

Michel al-Nimri of the Lebanese AL-SAFIR: "Democracy is the necessary motive force for the development of journalism.

"With the utmost objectivity, we can say that Arab journalism has registered gains, both quantitative and qualitative, in recent years. The leap forward might have been greater and more significant, were it not for the barriers which have prevented and continue to prevent this. The most prominent of these factors are:

"1. The absence of democratic freedoms. Various forms of deep-rooted Eastern despotism and the lack of disposition to inform still prevail in the region.

"Democracy is the motive force for the development of journalism. Without democracy, we will continue to remain in place. It is democracy which allows all factions to surface, and members of the Left to express their opinions without members of the Right or Center being deprived of this right.

"The absence of democracy deforms not only the press, but also the individual Arab from within. Under programmed suppression, the individual becomes a freak who is completely powerless.

"I do not want to talk too much about this factor, which is well known to everyone. I will say only that those who think they can protect their political or economic positions by prohibiting freedoms make a great mistake.

"The absence of democracy creates its own antithesis. It creates a tendency toward conspiracy and terrorism. It generates violence. It causes a resort to arms. The mistakes of democracy may be corrected only through more democracy.

"2. The second factor is the obstacles and barriers raised against the press at the borders between Arab countries, making it a regional press with limited concerns. The destruction of these obstacles and barriers fabricated by imperialism is imperative for the development of the press, for the Arab nation to regain its unity, for the individual Arab to achieve prosperity, and for our nation to take its place in building a happier and more humane society.

"In this connection, I think the initial step lies in permitting the free transmission of ideas of all shades, so that every Arab field is transformed into a rich garden by the great diversity of the colors of its flowers.

"3. The third factor in the decline of journalism is the fact that certain wealthy persons have entered the world of newspaper publishing because of their tremendous funds in banks, not because of any particular interest they have in the press.

"The investment of funds in newspaper projects is not in itself objectionable, but what is objectionable is the capitalists who set themselves up as masters of a profession in which they have no previous experience or knowledge.

"The capitalists' invasion of the domain of the press, even if it has contributed toward the technological development of this press, has unfortunately transformed it into a consumer commodity not subject to the standards applicable to this commodity.

"As I mentioned, these are some of the basic factors. One can include scores of other reasons and secondary factors, but I preferred to stick to the basic ones.

"The greatest lie which has deceived some people for a long time is the claim of certain newspapers and magazines that they were forced to emigrate and publish in certain Western capitals for reasons connected with democracy.

"Despite all its tragedy and despite the war which has continued without a halt during the last 5 years, Lebanon is still the oasis of democracy compared to the Eastern despotism prevailing in most of the other Arab countries.

"The magazine AL-SAYYAD, for example, is primarily social in nature and does not suffer from political problems. Nonetheless, it is published where it has emigrated, even though its sister AL-ANWAR is still published in Beirut.

"AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWWALI is published in Paris, and its sister AL-NAHAR is published in Beirut. Why is the former published in Paris for reasons of democracy, while the latter is published in Beirut?

There are numerous other examples. The magazines involved are very well known to the reader. I do not want to disparage them, but let them permit me to ask them to stop claiming that the absence of democracy is a reason for their publication abroad.

"We do not reveal any secret when we say that their situation has not changed. Whether they are in Beirut, Paris or Sierra Leone, they are the captives of the governments which finance them."

[Unidentified opinion from] 'UKAZ, Saudi Arabia: "The Arab press today is in its most critical stage. Faced with a reader who no longer accepts everything written at face value, it is trying to improve its image, and to gain the confidence of the Arab reader who has become conscious, mature, and in a position to bring any newspaper either success or failure. The degree of awareness acquired by the Arab reader makes it impossible for any writer or newspaper to ignore his thinking. There are no longer any fallacies which find a place among his thoughts. The reader seeks nothing but the truth. He wants the opportunity to make up his own mind, and not have an opinion imposed on him.

"Also the Arab press today faces an apprehensive reader who is subjected to psychological pressure, and who feels that his nation is a center of attention, with the entire world staring at it. Perhaps his importance to the world has made him search himself for his proper place in the world, and has sharpened his thinking.

"These things taken together require the Arab press today to be a press of ideas, rather than a commercial publication adapting itself to the 'commercial' or 'political' market!

"An authentic, distinguished press reflects our culture and values, without narrow-mindedness, but with a bold intellectual receptivity and confidence in the strengths of a nation with a noble history.

"Our Arab press today must suggest guidelines to deal with our 'chronic' social problems.

"Our Arab press must play a role in molding a new responsible generation.

"Our Arab press must be honest with itself above all, and then honest with others!"

He Seldom Sees the Arab Press

Hisham Mansur of Tunis, correspondent of the Swiss News Agency and Swiss Radio:

"I do not have complete knowledge of the Tunisian press, because I have not lived in Tunisia for a long time. However, I can say that the problems of the Tunisian press are the same as those of the Arab press. There are certain differences reflected by the difference in regimes. The Maghrib [Moroccan] press is a partisan press where each newspaper is the spokesman for one party or another. However, in Tunisia there is one ruling political party; consequently the press there is a one-party press.

"[In Tunisia,] there are three newspapers published in Arabic and three in French. These newspapers are almost all the same, because Tunisian newspapers are more concerned with news than analysis. They reflect events on the surface without examining their background or dimensions.

"As for the freedom granted the Tunisian press, it is relative. We can criticize social and economic domains, but the Tunisian press is not allowed to approach or discuss the domain of politics.

"The opposition press in Tunisia includes the monthly AL-DIMUQRATIYAH and the weekly AL-RA'Y. Since they are not dailies, their influence on Tunisian society is negligible. Their readership is limited, and does not include the entire Tunisian society. I may add that Tunisian borders are open to Arab newspapers, except for the extremist newspapers which are not allowed to enter Tunisia.

"One last thing I would like to mention is that as an Arab journalist working in Switzerland, I seldom see the Arab press, so as to review and quote it. When I visit Arab embassies in Geneva, [and ask for Arab newspapers], I receive apologies, because the newspapers of their respective countries do not reach them!"

FRESH RUSSIAN TROOPS REPORTEDLY LAND NEAR IRANIAN BORDER

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 26 Aug 80 pp 3, 6

[Article: "Mujahidin Attack Babrak Karmal's Residence in Kabul; An Undersecretary Wounded; 10,000 Fresh Russian Troops Equipped With Modern Weapons Arrive in Afghanistan"]

[Text] Tokyo, 25 Aug (APP/APA)--The Afghan Mujahidin claim that they have destroyed Karmal's residence. The Chinese News Agency, XINHUA, reports that the Mujahidin carried out this attack last week. According to this report, the residence was built for Karmal's father. An undersecretary, (Mahmud?) Gulam was seriously wounded as a result of the attack.

The Mujahidin have increased their activities in Kannar, Paktia, Nangarhar, Kunduz and Parwan. According to another report, the Russians last week attacked Wardak Province using planes, tanks, helicopters and armored cars. The activities of the Mujahidin are limited [there], because of the army stationed on roads joining Kabul with Ghazni. On the second day of the attack, the Russian army used more destructive weapons. Russian planes heavily bombed (Ankhi Shansh) Valley and Carot hills and used poison gas, tear gas and sleep-inducing gas. Inspite of all of this, it was the Russians who suffered more loss of life.

According to one report, the chief commander of Hazb-e-Islami [forces] was recently killed in Piktia. The Mujahid, Qadeer Mohammed, had joined Mohammed Yunus Khaalis' Hazb-e-Islami 2 years ago.

Meanwhile, 10,000 Russian troops equipped with the latest weapons have arrived in a central province of Afghanistan near the Iranian border. According to the reports reaching Kabul, these soldiers landed at the airport of (Sheen Dand) from Russia. This airport is 90 kilometers east of the Afghan-Iran border, and 50 kilometers east of the center of Afghanistan. The Russian army now numbers 80,000. According to Afghan tourists, the military airbase of Sheen Dar [previously spelled Dand] has been transformed into a civilian airport, because war is continuously raging in that part of the city.

RUSSIANS PLAN TO MOVE PEOPLE FROM AROUND CONTROLLED CITIES

Lahore NAWA-I-WAQT in Urdu 29 Aug 80 pp 3, 10

[News report: "The Mujahidin Surround Jalalabad, Engage in Fierce Fighting With Russian Army; All Roads to Jalalabad Are Cut Off; Russian Army Moves by Means of Helicopters; Part of Control Tower at Airport Destroyed"]

[Text] London, 28 Aug (Radio Report)--The Afghan Mujahidin have besieged the city and military cantonment of Jalalabad situated on the highway connecting the Khyber Pass and Kabul. The Russian army can reach the cantonment by air only. The Russian army is trying to break the siege, and has asked for reinforcements. Heavy fighting resulting in great loss of life on both sides is reported.

According to reports reaching New Delhi, this is the biggest battle since Russia entered Afghanistan. The Mujahidin downed two helicopters and one MIG fighter. In addition, they destroyed several armored cars and tanks. They closed all roads leading to the city, and are attacking the enemy from hillocks around the city. The freedom fighters also attacked the airport of Jalalabad and destroyed a part of the control tower. To deal with the deteriorating situation, Russian army reinforcements have been flown in. Battles in other parts of the country are also reported.

According to the BBC, Jalalabad is very important because of its geographical proximity to Pakistan. Therefore, Russia will leave no stone unturned to free it from the Mujahidin. A large counterattack by the Russians is expected soon. The loss of Jalalabad would endanger control over the puppet government in Kabul. Meanwhile, trucks carrying fruit were struck on the Jalalabad-Kabul highway, and were forced to return to Kabul.

According to the Voice of America, Russian artillery stationed 20 miles north of Kabul is shelling the area heavily and forcing the local population to move to Kabul. Fighting has also started in (Pighman) and (Shakar Durra). In the south, around the (Kandoz) area, Russian planes bombed a small town. According to some diplomatic sources, the recently arrived delegation of senior military officers from Russia has suggested using guerrilla tactics against the Mujahidin. The Karmal government is going to follow that advice.

Removal of People Around Cities

According to APA, the Russian army in Afghanistan is working on a plan according to which people in areas surrounding cities under Russian control will be asked to move, in order to protect the cities from the influence of the Mujahidin, who have a strong hold on rural areas. According to this plan, the Russians have begun to attack the hideouts of freedom fighters. Camps of freedom fighters at (Pighman), (Charikar) Road, (Shiwaai) and Jalalabad Road have been attacked. The Russian army has established check points on bridges and road crossings. The Russian army is bombing the outlying areas of Kabul and other cities, and forcing the freedom fighters to flee to the mountains.

RUSSIANS REPORTEDLY STALLED IN MILITARY DEADLOCK

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 25 Aug 80 p 6

[Article: "Kabul in State of Siege; Russian Officers Cannot Leave City; Russians Have No Control Over Rural Areas, Military Rebellion Feared; Former U.S. Ambassador Robert Newman's Impressions; Russian Declared Compulsory Language; Kabul University Under Russian Teachers' Control"]

[Text] Karachi, 24 Aug--After 8 months, the Russians have still not succeeded in controlling the rural areas of Afghanistan. Inspite of their 80,000 troops in Afghanistan, the Russians have not achieved anything more than an embarrassing military deadlock. This impression was given by the former U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan, Robert Newman. Mr Newman told the weekly TIMES that while the Russians can afford to stay in Afghanistan for an infinite period of time, they cannot win the war. The people of Afghanistan will not let them win the war.

Last week a high level Russian delegation arrived in Afghanistan. According to some diplomatic sources, this delegation is going to examine the reasons for the slow progress of the war. The TIMES reported that people visiting Kabul get the feeling that Kabul is in a state of siege. After many weeks of efforts, Russian armored cars are still stationed on corners of roads and in front of government buildings. Russian officers are afraid to leave Kabul. Kabul police search taxis at night for weapons and identification of riders, because the Russians are concerned about the rebellion of Afghan soldiers and attacks by the Mujahidin.

The Russians have suffered heavy losses in Herat, a commerce center with a population of 160,000, situated in the western part of the country. Herat is totally out of Karmal's control, and is in great turmoil. Freedom fighters and Afghan soldiers are engaged in fighting round the clock. The famous eye hospital of the city, named after Noor Mohammed Taraki has been closed. The Afghan army, which once boasted a number of 100,000 troops in its ranks, is almost scattered now. The Russians, inspite of their repeated claims that they are only temporarily in the country, clearly plan to make this a satellite state. They exercise full control over all ministries through their advisers known as undersecretaries.

According to a government order, Russian has been declared as second language in schools and has been made compulsory. The New Delhi correspondent of London's DAILY TELEGRAPH reports that the Russians have started a regular program to influence the minds of young Afghans and Russian teachers have recently taken control of Kabul University and other educational institutions. Hundreds of Afghan young men are sent to Moscow on scholarships, and Afghan educational institutions are being supplied with Russian textbooks.

FOUR ANTI-KARMAL FORMER MINISTERS EXECUTED IN KABUL

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 27 Aug 80 pp 1, 6

[Article: "Four Anti-Karmal (Former) Ministers Executed in Kabul; Russian Commander's Jeep Destroyed in a Mine Explosion in Sarobi"]

[Text] New Delhi, 26 Aug (APP/REUTER/Radio Report)--Four [former] ministers of the anti-Karmal Khalq faction have been hanged. Among the executed are: minister of higher education, Mohammed Sooma; [former] minister of education, Halbeli; [former] minister of power, Mansoor Hashmi; and [former] minister of culture, Khial Mohammed Kitwazi. All of them were in jail in Pul Charkhi.

According to reports reaching Delhi, the activities of the Mujahidin are increasing by leaps and bounds. At Sarobi, on the Kabul-Jalalabad road, the freedom fighters blew up the jeep of a Russian commander with a mine. The commander, his daughter and two officers in the jeep were killed.

The restlessness of the Afghan soldiers stationed in Sarobi is very important, because they are charged with keeping the Khyber Pass open. Conditions in Sarobi have worsened following the inner strife of the Khalq and Parcham factions of the ruling party. Reports of skirmishes between commandoes and officers of the government army have been received.

Meanwhile, travel between Kabul and Jalalabad has been suspended, because the road between the two cities is closed. Hundreds of trucks carrying fruit are stranded on the highway. If this road is closed for a long period of time, it will adversely affect the already suffering Afghan economy. It will also cause scarcity of food in the country.

According to the BBC, the Kabul-(Torkhum) road has been destroyed by the Mujahidin. Hundreds of trucks are stranded outside the capital on this road leading to the Khyber Pass. The Afghan Mujahidin have increased their activities against the Afghan Marxist Party. Their activities are more pronounced in three provinces. About 30 or 35 members of this party are killed daily in Kunduz, Takhar and Baghlan. The Mujahidin claim in one pamphlet that they have killed 1,800 supporters of the government during the last 2 months.

Meanwhile, Kabul Radio reports clashes between the government forces and the Mujahidin in several parts of Afghanistan. The radio claims that a group of Mujahidin was annihilated and 10 Mujahidin were captured in Helmand. However, this report was not verified.

The mayor of Chasikar is among those killed recently. According to a report, the mayor was working at his home, when two gunmen jumped the fence around his house and began to fire, killing the mayor, his wife, two children and a servant. A son, who was not at home, escaped this fate.

MUJAHIDIN SAID TO HAVE BESIEGED JALALABAD

Lahore NAWA-I-WAQT in Urdu 30 Aug 80 pp 3, 6

[News report: "Soldiers (340) of Sarobi Garrison Join Mujahidin; Mujahidin Mine All Roads Leading to Jalalabad; Governor of Nangarhar Takes Refuge in Army Garrison"]

[Text] London, 29 Aug--The governor of Nangarhar Province has fled from his official residence. Jalalabad is Nangarhar's capital, and is being besieged by the Mujahidin. According to the DAILY TELEGRAPH, after fleeing his residence, the governor took refuge in the garrison of the 19th Afghan brigade. According to information received, the siege of Jalalabad is considered to be the biggest challenge to the Russians so far. It is said that the Mujahidin have mined all roads leading to Jalalabad.

According to the DAILY TELEGRAPH tourists arriving in New Delhi report that Russian bombers are bombing towns north of Kabul. The Russians are using napalm bombs, which is causing heavy destruction in these towns. Numerous innocent citizens have died; very few are safe.

The Afghan Mujahidin and rebel government soldiers have captured a power station in Sarobi, plunging many parts of Kabul in darkness. According to a source in Kabul, 340 soldiers belonging to the military garrison in Sarobi have joined the Mujahidin along with their weapons. According to an earlier report, the army was called to suppress some disturbances caused by commandoes in Sarobi.

According to western diplomatic sources, the Kabul-Jalalabad road was opened to traffic on Thursday night [28 August]. This road was closed on 20 August because of Russian and Afghan army movements. According to some reports, the Mujahidin had mined this road between (Surakhpur) and (Mahipur). According to a reliable source in Kabul, the Russians bombed the old city of Jalalabad. The Mujahidin have now taken over this area, and forced the governor and other officials to take refuge in a military garrison. This source added that there was heavy loss of life on both sides. More than 300 soldiers of the Russian and government armies were killed. Also, seven helicopters and two MIG planes were downed.

ZAHIR SHAH'S RETURN REJECTED--London, 6 Aug--The Afghan Mujahidin have rejected the proposal to reinstate former king Zahir Shah, and said that if Zahir Shah returns to Afghanistan he would be put in chains like a criminal to answer charges of crimes against Islam and the people. News had circulated a few days ago that attempts were being made to bring Zahir Shah, who is now living in exile in Italy, back home to Afghanistan. However, Mujahidin leaders told newsmen in Peshawar that no Mujahid would invite Zahir Shah to return, because he was active against Islam and the Afghan people during his rule, and was responsible for the poverty of the people in the country. The Mujahidin leaders said that some people did try to bring Zahir Shah back, but were not successful. [Text] [Lahore NAWA-I-WAQT in Urdu 7 Aug 80 p 10] 7997

CUBAN MILITARY ADVISERS REPORTED--London, 28 Aug (APP/AFP)--The conservative DAILY TELEGRAPH reports that according to diplomatic sources in New Delhi, Cuban military advisers considered to be experts in guerrilla warfare are fighting in Afghanistan. However, it is not known how many of them there are in Afghanistan. The New Delhi correspondent of the DAILY TELEGRAPH reports that the number of Cubans being admitted to Kabul University has increased rapidly. The newspaper adds that it is firmly established now that the USSR has failed to suppress the Muslim freedom fighters in Afghanistan, and that admission of Cuban students to Kabul University is being stepped up on Russian orders. IMPORTATION OF GOODS--Peshawar, 28 Aug--Aside from military control, the Russians want to take over the economic affairs of Afghanistan. To this end, the Karmal government has instructed all business firms involved in international trade to decrease their business with Japan and [West] European countries, and to import goods from communist countries. Meanwhile, Russia has started exporting goods such as radios, television sets, refrigerators and cars to Kabul on a large scale. It should be pointed out that Afghanistan used to import all its necessities from Japan and [West] European countries. It is noted that British cigarettes are not imported anymore. Instead, cigarettes from communist countries, such as Bulgaria, Poland and Hungary are being sold in Afghanistan. The Afghan Government has restricted travel too. It has instructed its embassies not to issue visas to anyone, except people from India and communist countries. [Text] [Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 29 Aug 80 p 10] 7997

FIGHTING IN SAROBI--Kabul, 29 Aug (APP/REUTER/Radio Report)--Afghan Mujahidin and soldiers who have defected from the Afghan army have captured an electric power station in Sarobi, 30 miles east of Kabul. CRUDE PRODUCTION CUTBACK STATISTICS REPORTED

[Article signed E.M.: "A Positive Contribution to the Stabilization of the Market"]

[Text] Like other OPEC members, Algeria has just announced a cutback in its oil exports.

The cutback, amounting to 100,000 barrels a day, will become effective within a few days, and it of course contributes to the trend taking shape among OPEC members aiming to reabsorb the current surplus, which exerts intolerable pressure on the crude oil prices of OPEC countries.

If one takes into account the statements made by certain OPEC countries since the Vienna conference, one can estimate as of today that the voluntary cutbacks decided upon amount to a million barrels a day.

It is very probable that this trend will increase and could affect all OPEC countries. Cutbacks could thus amount to nearly 2.7 million barrels a day. This indicates the importance of the measures that each OPEC country has decided to take on its own in order to modify the current situation of the market, which is unfavorable to OPEC countries and is at present characterized by a record stock estimated at 6.7 billion among OECD nations.

These decisions prepare a climate more favorable to the examination of different dossiers to be submitted to the sovereigns and chiefs of state who will be meeting in Baghdad at the beginning of November.

It is undeniable that the decrease in exports from OPEC countries, if it should become general as seems to be the case among the whole membership, constitutes a positive factor improving the chances first that an OPEC summit will be held, and second that it will succeed.

This should be considered a contribution to the stabiliziation of the market, which is characterized at present by excessive overstocking, because, while in the short run this overstocking constitutes a means of exerting pressure on oil prices, it can only result, in the long run, in situations similar to those we experienced during the year '79, leadin consequently to a disorganization of the totality of rules governing the international oil market.

The readjustment of the price of a barrel between 1979 and 1980 was certainly a factor which encouraged hopes for a great mobilization of other energy sources. It simulates consuming countries to save energy, and, as a last resort, it draws the attention of the international community to the pending or ultimate risks of an oil shortage, and consequently to the prospect of a serious economic recession.

Developing nations have nothing to gain from such a prospect, and their supplies are in danger of being seriously compromised, eventhough some of these countries may have the means of paying the price required to replenish their stocks. It is well known that in situations of shortage the problem of prices becomes secondary for buyers, while that of availability becomes the major one. Such being the case, it is evident that OPEC owes it to itself to make a positive and notable contribution so that developing countries can enjoy a priority in supplies, and so that deprived nations can be helped to develop their domestic energy resources, to modernize their means of production and their infrastructures, so as to improve the efficiency of the utilization of a barrel of oil imported.

The sense of responsibility shown by members of OPEC, and particularly by those who have individually and voluntarily decided to reduce their exports, thus constitutes an eminently positive political act. Short-sighted objectives have been set aside to plan for the future and to improve the opportunities for agreement on a long-term OPEC oil policy. This cannot fail to diminish the threat of an impending energy crisis.

CAMPAIGN SEEN AGAINST SONATRACH'S CLAIMS ON LNG PRICING

[Article: "On the Subject of a Press Campaign on the Price of Liquified Natural Gas (LNG)]

[Text] An orchestrated press campaign aiming to misrepresent SONATRACH's legitimate claims for a revision of the conditions of the export of natural gas--notably its price--in the light of new data on the international energy market seems to have been in progress for some time.

SONATRACH, anxious to safeguard its advantages in a difficult negotiation, did not deem it necessary to deny certain allegations, one as fantastic as the other, and seems instead to concentrate its efforts on articulating concrete positive proposals which will promote the progress of current negotiations.

The responsible attitude which the national corporation SONATRACH has maintained with regard to these slanted news reports--emitted by certain Western business interests--seems to have been misrepresented, so that the statements of principle expressed by the highest authorities in the country with regard to Algerian natural gas export policy are forgotten.

The press campaign which developed, particularly before and during the Vienna triministerial OPEC conference, sheds new light on the real intentions of its prime movers, who are bent upon distorting the meaning of the responsible, constructive positions of the Algerian partners.

Rear-guard action or mere search for short-term benefits, it remains true that no other exporter of natural gas has officially announced that it has abandoned the objective of lining up the price of gas to that of crude oil, when such has not already been achieved as in the case of the United Arab Emirates, Indonesia, and Mexico.

On the other hand, one can legitimately wonder about the very slight publicity given to the price increase of, reputedly, over 60 percent for Dutch natural gas, while SONATRACH's request is being represented as "unrealistic."

Futhermore, it should not be forgotten on this subject:

--That the agreements between the Netherlands and its partners in the European Community are secret, and that the real price increase is probably much higher.

--That extraordinary pressures exerted on those in key responsible positions in European oil and natural gas enterprises led them to recognize that it was necessary to aline the price of gas on that of crude oil and that it was in the interests of consumer nations to accept this.

--That in countries which are great importers of natural gas the tendency is for the price of the gas produced to line up with the price of crude oil.

It would seem that there is, indeed, the intention of discriminating against SONATRACH after having encouraged it to become very deeply involved in investments specifically intended to supply consumer nations.

While SONATRACH has remained firm in its objectives of parity of the LNG price with that of crude oil, it has always specified to its partners that it was open to considering a progressive evolution of the price toward that objective with a reasonable delay acceptable to both parties.

The potential increase in the price of gas cannot alone explain the magnitude of these pressures and campaigns, for its impact on the bills of importing nations is, after all, not comparable to, for instance, the moderate increase in the price of "marker crude" on which OPEC has just decided.

This means in other words that the stakes are elsewhere and that it would be fairer to inform public opinion more objectively.

These real stakes reside in the approach to the problems of international trade in natural gas, which, whether we like it or not, is the primary alternative to oil--the availability of which is becoming more and more restricted. Everyone predicts a decrease in the proportion that oil will represent in the fuel supplies of industrial nations with a parallel increase in that of natural gas.

When one knows that the reserves of natural gas are of the same proportions as those of oil and that the other energy sources will contribute marginally to meeting growing energy needs, one can henceforth assess more correctly the part played by Algeria.

Another aspect of the problem, and not among the least important, is the role it plays in the new international economic order, and particularly in north-south relations. For natural gas is generally an export from developing countries to industrialized ones. It is an energy source and a strategic raw material that the south can export in more or less sizable quantities to the north. To accept equitable terms of exchange in matters of natural gas is to acknowledge that the success of OPEC in the matter of crude oil can gain ground in another basic product and open the way to a trend with regard to other raw materials.

That is the reason why the extraordinary congress of the National Liberation Front has affirmed in the clearest possible way our objectives in matters of hydrocarbon gas, and has in so doing directed the attention of our partners to the grave consequences of an error in assessing Algeria's determination with regard to the settlement of the problem.

INTERIOR MINISTER CHAIRS COORDINATION MEETING

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 24 Sep 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by R. Semmad: "Coordination Meeting Chaired by the Minister of Interior Yesterday"]

[Text] A coordination meeting involving problems of public works, housing, and land reserves in the capital was held yesterday morning at the seat of the governorate under the chairmanship of Boualem Benhamouda, member of the [FLN's] politburo, minister of interior, in the presence of Ahmad Ali Ghazali and Mohamed Kortebi, members of the central committee, minister of housing and minister of public works, respectively. This working session was also attended by the members of the governorate's coordination council, officials from the foreign departments, and representatives of the ministries of planning and finance.

Important on more than one score, this meeting was the occasion for members of the government to review the complex problems hindering the capital city's development. Indeed, at a time when other governorates have moved to faster development, Algiers continues to lag behind weighed down by administrative delays.

The agenda touching on the major problems of the capital bore on three items.

Minister Benhamouda recalled the interest evidenced by the Algerian President in solving the problems faced by Algiers. He then invited the various personalities to take all the measures necessary to make up for all the time lost to achieve the goals contained in the resolutions of the 4th [FLN] Congress and the third session of its central committee.

Broaching the first point on the agenda, the director of basic infrastructures of the governorate drew the major lines of the public works sector. It is recognized that the country's political, economic, and cultural capital has reached a state of strangulation for which a solution has to be found at any cost. In the first instance the traffic thoroughfares are saturated and cause gigantic bottlenecks daily at the access points to iers at Birkhadem and Thenia.

SONATRACH at Caroubier: Building Problem

Highway projects were launched toward the end of 1979. They involve the construction of the Boudouaou-Lakhdaria expressway (over 40 km), the Algiers expressway between Birmandreis and Dar el-Beida (20 km), the East Algiers expressway (15 km), the reconditioning of Highway 41 from Birkhadem, and the construction of an automobile bridge at Cinq Maisons. This ambitious program costing a total of 188 billion Algerian centimes has witnessed inherent difficulties as the director of the governorate explained, numerous constraints concerning expropriations of land for public use, and the existence on the route of industrial plants such as the domestic head office of SONATRACH at Caroubier.

Making a second state, the minister of interior gave details, asking interested parties to proceed with the evacuation of sites upon presentation of documents conferring title. On this score and in order to relieve the governor, it was suggested that a project chief be designated to follow the evolution of the operation from close by.

The minister cited the example of the Birkhadem crossroads which constitutes a scourge on traffic obliging motorists to wait for hours to reach the capital. Too, the realization of the reconditioning project involving National Highway 1 has become a matter of top priority to insure the smoother flow of traffic on this important road, Minister Benhamouda added.

On his part Ali Ghazali pointed to delays at all levels, delays reflected by a lag in the execution of projects. A committee was created to study the causes and find remedies for the bottleneck. Regarding the SONATRACH unit at Caroubier the minister said: "An opportunity has been given to the officials of this very old facility to review their entire strategy for putting up industrial complexes."

The second aspect of the meeting pertained to housing, veritable Achilles heel of Algiers. Thus, 200 operations relating to the highway, posts and telecommunications, and education sectors have not yet been finalized. The communal committees and district committees charged with the selection of sites have not been effective, the minister of urban development noted.

To remedy this situation he decided to centralize the job by involving elected local officials.

Decentralized Housing Operations

As regards operations under way, the delay in the realization of projects stems from payment credits which were not honored at maturity. Thus, the housing zones at Bab Ezzouar, Bordj al-Kiffan and the Anasser regions are suffering from the failure to settle the problem.

Another factor prejudicing the execution of the projects involves strategic materials: Tiles, brass founding, ironware, plate glass, and insulation items. By way of example it should be noted that under the 3-year plan Algiers Governorate had received an allocation for the construction of 55,000 housing units. By May 1980, 20,000 units were still at the discussion stage, the operations for same not having been sited.

The minister of housing did not fail to note that what is involved here before everything is a problem of authority.

In future, he said, housing operations will truly be decentralized at the governorate level. Projects will be entrusted to state or private enterprises and for all delays it will be appropriate to apply penalties to national companies, the minister added.

Broaching the issue of real estate reserves, the director of CADAT [Territorial Development Fund] cited the figure of 7,000 land lots for which surveys have been completed and 4,827 lots ready for distribution.

This operation, which caused a lot of ink to flow in Algiers, Ali Ghazali noted, must shortly be implemented by giving more time to the APC's to draw up and publicize lists of beneficiaries. As far as the minister of interior is concerned what should be done first of all is to encourage housing cooperatives, with individual housing units representing an exception. Talking of the environment, Minister Benhanouda stressed the need for laying out green spaces, recalling that the urban development code calls for a percentage of same at housing sites.

At the conclusion of this meeting the minister of interior expressed gratification at the democratic and constructive discussion that had taken place, stressing the spirit of give-and-take which must underlie relations among officials for a better reactivation of the projects under way.

CENTRAL COMMITTEE MEMBER STRESSES 5-YEAR TRANSPORT PLAN

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 22 Sep 80 p 3

[Interview with Saleh Goudjil, member of the [FLN's] central committee, minister of transportation, by Cherif Haddad: Constantine; date not given]

> [Text] Saleh Goudjil, member of the central committee, minister of transportation, who has just made a working and inspection visit in eastern Algeria, indicated to our Constantine correspondent who interviewed him the major outlines of our national transportation policy.

Question: In your previous tour you detailed a transportation policy based on a decentralization of facilities and means. Is this policy adequate to face the needs of the people during the period covered by the 5-year plan?

Answer: The entire transportation policy included in the 5-year plan strives to solve all the problems raised directly or indirectly by economic life and the needs of citizens. Knowing that these needs and the requirements of this sector are growing annually and are assuming an increasingly larger role in our concerns, we owe it to ourselves to reflect on the ways and means that will enable us to reduce this constantly growing demand in order to achieve at the conclusion of the 5-year plan a result which will not meet all our needs but at least the essential items to insure harmonious development of the regions. This planning policy is necessary for our working method with constant and up-to-date follow-up of the various levels of the country's development in order to place this important sector of the country's economy in the vanguard of national development.

Question: Your ministry seems to grant a choice place to the infrastructure of railroad transportation. Does the implementation of this goal not carry the risk of being effected at the expense of the inhabitants' immediate needs?

Answer: The concern expressed in your question is linked to what I have just noted in the preceding question. However, we know that what should enable us to face the considerable evolution of needs and accumulated demand over the years obliges us to anticipate the future, stressing the realization of the basic transportation infrastructure across Algerian territory. It is only in this fashion that we shall manage to make up for delays and envision definitive solutions.

Indeed, if there is one sector which has suffered delays--and this is a general observation made by all economic operators--it is that of the transportation infrastructure in Algeria. Too, the 5-year plan has been premised in the field of transportation on the undertaking of large-scale operations, very important to preserve the harmonious development of our economy by taking long-term prospects into account. This policy will insure the country's development without major constraint, which does not mean that our immediate concerns will be neglected.

An adequate solution of our transportation problems passes through a balancing of needs without falling for all that into the easy way out which consists in importing and acquiring costly equipment only to allow it to deteriorate or to underutilize it for lack of sufficient backup infrastructure.

Question: The reconditioning and extension of the national railroad network enjoy a priority in your ministry. A start has been made in its implementation with the project of Ramdane Djamel-Annaba. What will become of the other projects?

Answer: Taking into account regional balance and the method of complementary action, a port governorate with a very highly developed infrastructure must meet not only its own needs but also those of the bordering governorates. Talking of Ramdane Djamel, that is one of the most important projects which the railroad sector is initiating. It will be in a position to insure the relief of the two major ports of eastern Algeria (Annaba and Skikda) through transportation to the Constantine region and the rest of the country. Furthermore, this important project will provide the railroad experience necessary for the realization of the other projects included in the 5-year plan such as the regional reconditioning of Annaba, on which a promising start has been made.

Such planning of the railroad transportation infrastructure will enable us to block out a railroad master plan staggered over 20 years. The organization of this important sector will assume the place that behooves it, taking into account our national policy in the field of territorial development.

Question: Our ports continue to raise serious problems of land space. Has the time not come to reorganize the infrastructures by restoring the initial orientation of the fishing ports?

Answer: While we have so far found solutions for the relief of bottlenecks in our ports thanks to improvements and the realization of some basic infrastructural projects, our primary goal in this respect is to take advantage of the real possibilities of our ports within the framework of short-, medium-, and long-term development. I would strive thereby to make an evaluation of the existing possibilities of our ports, one by one.

I would then examine the possibilities of enlarging them by increasing their accommodation capacities for freight and determine on the basis of the results actions to be taken and included in the 5-year plan. A master plan for each port will be drawn up in light of its orientation together with the laying out of new ports.

As for the functional aspect of our multiple-purpose ports, as regards maritime control but also fishing whose socioeconomic repercussion is obvious, this has not been overlooked for the political directorate has placed fishing among our priority sectors by endowing it with a secretariat of state for fishing.

In conclusion we can say that we have been able to go beyond the initial stage which consists in seeking solutions, in planning, in becoming organized, and in getting ready for the realization stage.

With the approval of the 5-year plan we move entirely into the most decisive stage--that of the realization and implementation of these goals.

PUBLIC OFFERED SHARES IN INSURANCE COMPANY

Manama GULF MIRROR in English 4-10 Oct 80 p 35

[Text]

THE Kuwaiti-dominated Arab International Insurance Company this week opened a public float for $2.5 million of shares and financial sources expect the two-week issue to be oversubscribed up to 100 times.

AIIC, a Bahrain-registered exempt company which will act as a general insurance and re-insurance group dealing with fire, accident, motor, marine, air and industrial cover, is the second public firm to float shares in a month.

Two weeks ago Arab Iron and Steel Company's $48 million float was oversubscribed almost 42 times. But this week a source for one of the four Bahrain commercial banks which accepted share applications said: "Despite the Iran-Iraq war we expect this issue to be oversubscribed between 50 and 100 times."

AIIC is issuing $6 million of its authorised $10 million capital. Bahrain's Ministry of Commerce recently allowed the founders to upgrade the issue by $1 million.

The founders, including Kuwait, the UAE, Saudi, Bahraini and Qatari companies and businessmen, are taking $3.5 million, leaving $2.5 million — fully paid up — for the public.

Fifty Bahraini founders are each putting in $10,000 worth of shares.

DAMAGE TO IRAN, IRAQ'S OIL INDUSTRIES NOTED; RESERVES REPORTED HIGH

Tehran IRAN ECONOMIC SERVICE in English 6 Oct 80 pp 11-12

[Text] During an exclusive interview, an official of the Oil Ministry explained the effects of the Iran-Iraq war on the two countries' oil industries, as under:--

As President Bani Sadr said in his press conference, Iraq had for some time been making preparations for a long war. These preparations become specially clear when we regard Iraq's oil activities immediately prior to the start of the war. Apart from exporting its oil by sea, Iraq also exported oil via pipelines running through Turkey, Syria and Jordan. The pipeline through Turkey ended at the Turkish port of Iskenderun and had a capacity of 700,000 barrels per day. This pipeline, completed in 1977, had never been utilised in full, partly due to differences on the payment of transit fees to Turkey.

The pipeline running from Kirkuk to the Syrian port of Banias on the Mediterranean has had its capacity raised to 1.7 million barrels per day.

Sometime ago the foreign press reported that Saudi Arabia had agreed to make a 15-year loan of 250 million dollars to Turkey. In this way the Saudis were acting as intermediary in settling the dispute between Iraq and Turkey over the pipeline transit fees, and clearing the way for the export of Iraqi oil via Turkey.

On 25 September REUTERS reported that Iraq had informed Lebanon that it wished to utilise the pipelines from Kirku to Tripoli and Banias. All these steps show the close ties between Saudi Arabia and Turkey, and if we bear in mind the dependence of the Saudis on the United States, and the support given to Saddam Hussein by Jordan and Saudi Arabia, both undisputed servants of Western imperialism, then the real character of the Baath regime in Iraq becomes clear.

With due regard to the above, it becomes clear that Iraq would not have started the war without prior permission from its masters and close friends. In this way Iraq would export its oil to the West by pipeline should the war disrupt its exports by sea via the Persian Gulf.

The following statements published in the oil journal PLATTS of 25 September are also revealing:

Carter says that oil exports from the Persian Gulf must not be disrupted. The United Arab Emirates' Oil Minister says we will not permit our Western friends to be short of oil. The European Economic Community has 120 days reserves of oil so it is unlikely to suffer any shortages due to a crisis in the Middle East. An official of the Japanese Government said that Japan had oil reserves enough for 110 days.

Thus while Iraq got the green light to start the war, it had been warned not to attack crude oil loading terminals since this would endanger oil exports to the West. For this reason we see that Iraq attacked the Abadan refinery which supplied 60 percent of domestic needs, but refrained from any serious attack on the Kharg Island crude oil loading terminal.

The Oil Ministry official said that damage caused to Abadan refinery was much less than at first thought, and a team had been despatched to ascertain the exact amount of the damage.

In answer to a question as to whether Iran would face an oil shortage this winter, the official said that before the attack on Abadan refinery and the storage tanks we had no shortage and our reserves were higher than at this time last year. Even now, our stocks of kerosene are very satisfactory, but we are in a state of war, and the Army must have first priority in fuel supplies. We must also note that Abadan refinery supplied 60 percent of domestic consumption, and accordingly the moves taken, such as the banning of private cars during the week, is a precautionary measure and does not mean rationing, since our storage tanks are not empty.

The official added that a number of oil producers had proposed selling oil products to Iran, and while thanking these states, Iran had informed them that for the time being it did not require such imports.

Of course, if the war continues for some time, we can count on Iran's allies such as Libya and Algeria to supply us with some oil products, but the important thing is that should the war continue, the Iranian people must be prepared to bear some hardships.

The official said that prior to starting the war with Iran, Iraq had been endeavouring to win friends and influence public opinion by granting a total of 209.7 million dollars in loans to various countries, including India, Morocco, Pakistan, Mozambique, Madagascar, Tanzania, Sri Lanka, and Bangladesh.

SANCTIONS SEEN CONTRIBUTING TO INFLATION

Tehran IRAN ECONOMIC SERVICE in English 29 Sep 80 pp 2-3

[Text] Since the imposition of economic sanctions on Iran by European countries and Japan, there has been a marked aggravation in Iranian inflation, and prices of imported products have risen. The sanctions have had two major effects on our economy:

Firstly, the announcement of the sanctions resulted in some local merchants hoarding their imported products in the hope of selling at much higher prices later on. This resulted in marked shortages in many products and raw materials, and the price of some products even doubled.

Soon Iranian importers started importing their requirements from European countries through the intermediary of middlemen in Switzerland, Austria and Spain [nations not participating in the sanctions against Iran). And similarly Japanese goods were imported via the Persian Gulf states. But this round-about procedure, requiring transshipment of the goods, and commission for the middlemen resulted in a sudden rise of about 20 per cent on the cost of Iranian imports. The procedure also involved a further delay of between one to two months before the ordered goods finally reached Iran.

It appears that America and the other nations participating in the sanctions were well aware that their action would not prevent raw materials and manufactured goods from reaching Iran, but that the difficulties and problems created for Iranian importers by the sanctions would lead to Iranian inflation rising to unbearable levels. And thus Iran, dependent on its basic industrial needs on the West, would have to submit to imported inflation.

Today, not only in the private sector, but also in the public sector such as the National Iranian Oil Company, we witness the purchase of spare parts and machinery via the intermediary of third countries at higher costs, and all this has led to a kind of psychological warfare and domestic dissatisfaction.

Since rising inflation entails political agitation and general lack of confidence, the United States and its allies are using every means, including economic sanctions to prevent economic stability in Iran, and show that Iranian officials are unable to control inflation and rising prices.

Accordingly, and under present circumstances, any irresponsible slogan and baseless talk can have an adverse effect on the country's economic stability. In this respect we may recall the remarks of our President who said that each new lashe of the whip is a new factor in increasing prices and worsening inflation, and a step nearer to economic instability.

Today we must earnestly request all our politicians and economists to counter our economic difficulties with economic remedies. All the various factors inherent in our economic problems, the most important of which are inflation and rising prices, must be fully analysed and appropriate remedies be imposed to solve them. Such remedies must of course be compatible with our new social order. Only in this way can we combat American efforts to show that our system and regime is incapable of solving our economic and technological difficulties.

Today there is talk of a drop in our domestic production, (It should be noted, however, that our political leaders in all their speeches, talk about an increase in production and encourage the people to economise and consume less, all of which is important in controlling inflation and bringing about economic stability to the country), but have we asked ourselves the reasons for our drop in production?

During the past 18 months every one has been saying that our production must increase, but despite all these sayings, we have been witnessing constantly rising prices and spiralling inflation. This may be due perhaps to our concerning ourselves so far to the symptoms of the disease and not giving enough attention to the real reasons for the sickness.

It is now time for us to investigate the reasons for the drop in investments in Iran, and make an all-out endeavour to remove the obstacles to increased investments. Only in this way can we increase our domestic production and lessen our dependence on foreign nations. The reasons for the drop in investments will be discussed at length in a separate article.

NIOC EVALUATES LAST YEAR'S PERFORMANCE

Tehran IRAN ECONOMIC SERVICE in English 29 Sep 80 pp 7-10

[Text] The spokesman of the Oil Ministry announced a summary of the operations of the National Iranian Oil Company for the period after the Revolution, as follows:

Production and Exports

Production of crude oil and gas during 1358 (year ending on 20th March 1980) was as under:

Crude oil production for year totalled 1,259 million barrels i.e. an average of 3.45 million barrels per day. Oil exports during the year averaged 2.65 million barrels per day.

Gas and Liquefied Gas

Liquefied gas from the Mahshahr refinery for year averaged 22,110 barrels per day, and of this amount 15,096 barrels per day was exported.

Total gas produced during the year came to 888,635 million cubic feet, equal to about 2,429 barrels per day (or about 2,429 million cubic feet per day). Total gas delivered to the trans-Iranian trunk gas pipeline was 732 million cubic feet per day.

Production of crude oil and gas during the first quarter of 1359 (three months ending on 21st June 1980) was as under:

Crude oil production for the quarter averaged 1.848 million barrels per day, and of this about 571,000 barrels per day was exported.

Liquid gas production by the Mahshahr Refinery averaged 10,900 barrels per day.

Gas production for the quarter averaged 1,233 million cubic feet per day, and gas delivered into the trans-Iranian gas pipeline averaged 373 million cubic feet per day.

Discovery of new oilfield in Khuzistan

The new oilfield of Pelangan, 35 kilometres north-east of Dezful was discovered when the first exploration well struck oil on 9th March 1980. This well was drilled to a depth of 4,597 metres and is currently producing at the rate of 4,500 barrels of light crude of 32.5 API.

Tests of the strata so far drilled indicate probable oil reserves of the field to be some 40 million barrels, but a more accurate estimate will become possible when drilling is completed to the bottom of the oil-bearing strata.

Drilling in the South

During 1358, twelve drilling rigs drilled a total of 44,215 metres. Five of the rigs were engaged in exploration drilling, another five on development of existing wells, and two rigs operated in offshore waters.

During the year the Roudak oilfield, south-east of Gach-Saran was discovered. The new field is producing at the rate of about 6,000 b/d.

The 12 oil rigs have also been operating since the start of 1359 and during this time the two new oilfields of Pelangan and Papileh were discovered.

Gas Injection

Gas injection into old wells at Gach-Saran and Haft-Kel continued during the period under review to increase oil recovery from them. About 288,6400 [as published] million cubic feet of gas from the Pazenan field was injected into wells of Gach-Saran, and another 125,760 million cubic feet of gas from the Naft-Sefid field was injected into wells at Haft-Kel. These operations prevented this considerable amount of gas from having to be flared.

Seismic Survey

Seismic survey in the Turkoman Sahra and north-east of Gorgan (in the North) regions led to the discovery of three geological structures which probably contain oil or gas.

Well drilling in the north included three wells in the gas field of Khangiran, and five development wells in the Naft-Shahr (ex Naft Shah) region.

Some 18,511 million cubic feet of gas was produced from the Khangiran field in northern Khorrasan and delivered to the National Iranian Gas Company of Mashad.

During the period under review, some 5,908,950 barrels of oil was produced from the joint Iran-Iraq oilfield in the Haft-Shahr region, and fed into Kermanshah Refinery.

From July 1980 some 305 million cubic feet of gas was produced from the Qeshm Island field and fed into the Gourzin gas refinery.

During the year 1358 crude oil fed into the country's oil refineries reached an all-time high, and production of middle distillates (kerosene and diesel oil) was some 23,800 barrels per day more than for the previous year of 1357. By the end of the year under review, crude oil fed into Iranian oil refineries exceeded the one million barrels per day mark.

LAST YEAR'S NON-OIL EXPORTS TABULATED

Tehran IRAN ECONOMIC SERVICE in English 29 Sep 80 pp 9-10

[Text] The report of the Export Promotion Centre of Iran for the first quarter of the current Iranian year (21 March to 21 June 1980) shows that the country's non-oil exports for the period amounted to some 152,000 tons valued at Rials 19,332 million (U.S. $276 million). Compared with the same quarter of a year ago, the figures show a drop of 22 per cent in weight, but a rise of 40 per cent in value.

Exports of hand-woven carpets and handicrafts accounted for 77 per cent of the total non-oil exports. The share of such exports in previous years (with the exception of last year when it was 46%) had been between 14 to 18 per cent. Exports of carpets for the quarter under review came to 2,087 tons valued at 14,230 million Rials. This is a drop of 14% in weight, but a rise of 133% in value over the same period of last year.

The following table shows the percentage value of non-oil exports during the quarter under review:

Group of Exports	1st quarter 1359	1st quarter 1358
Industrial products	4.5	3.5
Agricultural products	15.0	44.5
Carpets & handicrafts	77.0	46.0
Mining products	3.0	5.0
Other products	0.5	1.0
	100.0	100.0

During the three months under review some 854 million Rials of textiles, shoes, vehicles, chemical products, household products and biscuits were exported. This is an increase of 80% over the same period of last year.

The report indicated that with the shortage of raw materials, spare parts, specialist workers and expert management, there does not seem any special effort by industrial units to boost their exports.

In the agricultural sector, with the exception of liquorice roots, wool, guts and caviar, there was a big drop in exports, and this was due to very low stocks.

The drop in exports of cotton, due to the decrease in the area of cultivation of this product, and inability to meet domestic requirements, was one of the main reasons for the drop in the value of agricultural exports.

Exports of dried fruit and nuts during the period amounted to 4,363 tons valued at 774 million Rials ($11 million) showing a drop of 87% in weight and 77% in value over the same quarter of a year ago.

The value of exports of nuts and dried fruit during the first three months of this year and their comparison with the same period of a year ago are shown in the following table:

Product	1st quarter 1359	1st quarter 1358
	(in millions of Rials)
Pistachio nuts	476	2,003
Raisins & sultanas	183	969
Dates	15	89
Almonds	7	65
Dried apricots	93	207

Exports of mining products and building materials during the period under review showed a drop of 22 per cent in weight and 17 per cent in value over the same period of a year ago. The drop was mainly due to the decrease in exports of metal mining ores, and exports of these came to 16,110 tons valued at some 342 million Rials, against 32,643 tons valued at 515 million Rials in the same period of last year.

It appears that the uncertainty over the manner of administration of the country's mines by the Government following the announcement that all mines are nationalised, has resulted in a drop in mining operations and lack of interest by the private sector to pursue such operations.

PLAN DIRECTOR TAKES STOCK OF ECONOMY

Tehran IRAN ECONOMIC SERVICE in English 6 Oct 80 pp 7-10

[Interview with Ezzatollah Sahabi, director of Plan and Budget Organisation, date and place not given]

[Text] Mr. Ezzatollah Sahabi, director, Plan and Budget Organisation (P&BO) expressed his views on the effect of the hostage-taking of U.S. Embassy personnel on the Iranian economy, and various problems confronted by P&BO. Here is a summarised version of this interview:

Q. Could you tell us what positive and negative effects this hostage-taking has had on the Iranian economy?

A. This hostage-taking has, so far, had a negative effect, but it could also have positive effects. From my viewpoint, this action has, as a matter of principle, been a correct and revolutionary one, as it reflected the crimes committed by the United States in Iran during the past 25 years, and which brought the Iranian nation to the point of explosion. This act of hostage-taking was undertaken by a small number of students, but they did it in their capacity as a conscientious and politically aware section of this nation. As a matter of principle, the student class has been in the forefront of the Iranian revolution. At a time when the Iranian masses were inactive and ignorant of the Pahlavi regime's stance, the students were engaged in their anti-Shah struggle. This hostage-taking has violated all international laws and conventions. But there has always been a question mark on the validity of these regulations as we argued that these laws were to be respected only when a country has its normal law and order situation. When people of a society reach an explosion point and actually stage an uprising, then these international laws can't be enacted there. So this uprising has been both against the Pahlavi regime and its supporters. It should also be kept in mind that this action was taken only when the Shah was taken to the United States which was tantamount to granting refuge to a criminal and plunderer who was responsible for massacring tens of thousands of the Iranian people.

This hostage-taking could have a far-reaching positive effect on the economic and social aspects of the Iranian life. While preparing the emergency budget during the current year, I have, at times, said that it is true we are now facing economic sanctions and our oil revenues have sharply declined from its 23 billion dollars. This brings a great pressure upon our country whose 80 to 85 percent budgetary resources are obtained from oil. I have, when preparing such emergency budgets, expressed my opinion that these economic sanctions have come to us as a boon since these can account for the start of a big socioeconomic jump for the Iranian nation because we would be forced to utilise our domestic talents when all of our foreign resources are cut off. Such a national mobilisation was begun during the days of the late Dr. Mosadeq when oil revenues were cut off. It was in those days that oil stoves and samovars as well as industrial spare parts were started to be manufactured domestically, with our raw materials etc., being exported for the first time ever. If that Government had lasted for just another decade, we had certainly possessed an independent economy. Until we become independent and self-sufficient economically, all slogans on independence would be hollow and empty-worded in essence. In order to become economically independent, our economy should not rely on oil. Our oil-based economy is the result of a colonialist plan, with the result that our oil exports went on increasing every year. When Mosadeq concluded an agreement with the Oil Consortium, it was decided that the Government budget should be met through domestic resources, and the oil revenues specified to only national development plans. But later, there was increasing budgetary deficit every year, until in the Fourth Development Plan, oil revenues became a part of the budget. From that time onwards, the shortfall in current expenditures was met from oil income. Presently the Government revenues from taxation etc, is only up to 550 billion rials whereas it has to spend 1,800 billion rials on current expenditures. I must say that despite a lack of oil income, Pakistan enjoys a better position. Similar is the case of India. We are poorer than both India and Pakistan. If we intend to become independent of oil, we should gradually reduce our annual current expenses. These economic sanctions can prove to have a positive effect if we act vigilantly in implementing a "war economy" which can be the starting point for our economic independence. The hostage-taking, however, has not been advantageous to us since a large number of our assets abroad were frozen, the firms with which we had concluded agreements and which were later cancelled by us filed suits in courts which acceded to their demands. Such issues are still continuing.

These economic sanctions have brought great pressure upon Japan, European states, and even on some neighbouring Muslim countries. Despite the fact that, as a matter of principle, OPEC member-states were required to come to the rescue of one of the members faced with economic sanctions, Saudi Arabia and Iraq betrayed it by boosting their oil exports by three million barrels per day. This has adversely affected us as our oil revenues have sharply declined. If the present situation continues, our present oil revenues of 13 billion dollars would be reduced to 10 billion dollars next year. When we have less foreign exchange earnings, it has two effects: The financial budgetary resources decline, and since we are deeply dependent upon foreign countries, we need to export more commodities which needs larger amount of foreign exchange. Another loss incurred by us due to economic sanctions is that we are unable to import industrial raw materials and spare parts from European countries, and have to meet such demands from international markets on higher prices. This year, we have to pay between 20 and 30 percent increased prices on such commodities. For instance, one item, very urgently needed by us, constitutes spare parts of road-building machinery, such as those of Caterpillar which is a famous American firm. Despite our contacts with many of its branches in different countries, we have received negative responses. As a result, Iran had to procure its needs at inflated prices elsewhere. A number of new firms have lately been set up in the Persian Gulf emirates which are earning huge profits through acting as intermediaries in exporting goods to Iran. In any case, there were great short-term losses economically and materially due to the hostage-taking. If it leads to a general awareness to do away with our foreign dependence and compels us to utilise our talents and indigenous Products, then I am in favour of these economic sanctions. However, if the trend of the past one year continues, then these sanctions would be detrimental to us.

Q. What effect has this hostage-taking put upon the rate of employment in Iran?

A. It is natural that a decline in foreign exchange earnings has adversely affected Government's development programs. Resultantly, we have been forced to reduce our development expenditures up to 50 percent in the current year, and consequently, a number of road-building, construction, agriculture, power and telephone projects have been shelved. This has caused unemployment, and has checked any new employment at a time when our population is constantly on the increase, and nearly half a million people are annually increased to the country's potential work-force. Hence, the hostage-taking has directly affected employment positions. As the effects of reduced oil sales have now started appearing, and because the Government has been compelled to discontinue a number of its development projects, these would lead to some more unemployment. Hence, hereinafter, unemployment would be one of the major and complicated issues to be confronted by our Government since with the stoppage of development projects, their personnel cannot afford to get jobless. Last year, a number of our workshops faced the same problem, as their workers continued to get their wages without there being any output. Moreover, many of the private sector jobs are likely to be eliminated because of a decline of our imports of resultant closure of commercial firms. Similar situation exists in big transportation firms which have been nationalised lately. According to reports, we possess a fleet of about half a million trucks whereas we need only a maximum of 150,00 trucks for our economic needs. If our imports are further diminished, then more than two-thirds of these truckers would get unemployed. In this way, it can be observed that there would be greater unemployment at both public and private sector levels. Also with a decline in Government revenues, there would be no investments, and consequently no new jobs created.

Q. Why was the Economic Mobilisation Committee set up, and what has been its performance so far?

A. In March last, the P&BO sent a proposal to the Revolutionary Council that, with the economic sanctions taking a serious turn, we should mobilise all of our efforts to confront them. Earlier, there has already come into existence a National Mobilisation Command which dealt with military affairs. By such a proposal, we wanted to mobilise ourselves economically, culturally, politically and from the publicity point of view. Later, five members of the Revolutionary Council were asked to set up such a Mobilisation Committee which was to confront the economic sanctions on a war footing, economic responsibilities of this committee. Subsequently, I set up a five-member Mobilisation Unit attached to the Revolutionary Council, and invited top officials of a number of ministries such as Agriculture, Commerce and Finance to join it, apart from a number of experts and specialists from P&BO, thus comprising a 15-member team. We first began our task through procuring foodstuffs and basic goods until the end of the current Iranian year (March 20, 1981). We improved customs functioning at Julfa Post where a maximum of 15,000 railway wagons were awaiting their turn for clearance. Then we provided handling facilities to some of the inactive seaports on the Caspian to enable some of the imported goods to be brought there. This committee did a tremendous job by holding its bi-weekly meetings and we were very much satisfied with its functioning. Later, we dealt with the industrial matters to resolve the issue on the shortage of their raw materials and spare parts. A subcommittee was set up to arrange manufacture of certain agricultural implements domestically. Then another subcommittee was formed to benefit from the state-owned factories and private workshops to manufacture industrial spare parts, etc. This subcommittee is still functioning. We also chalked out a distribution plan of essential goods in various provinces of the country through a network of cooperative societies. We sought help of local councils in big cities, like Tehran and Isfahan, for distribution of essential commodities through Government stores and shops to ensure provision of nine basic goods in sufficient quantity to every family. With the change in Government and my election as Majlis deputy led to a discontinuation in the work of this committee. However, we did a lot of work during a space of four months.

Q. Would you elucidate on the "emergency budget"? Does it pave the way for our gradual independence from an oil-based economy?

A. Yes, it does, since we have been able to cut down our current expenditures appreciably. In the 1359 approved budget, current expenditures amount up to 1900 billion rials whereas the development spendings stand at 1100 billion rials which is a unhealthy budget. We should increase our development funds and make still greater cuts in current expenditures. Another point is that our total oil revenues are 920 billion rials of our budget. We raised income tax on a slab system, and thus expect to have an added tax revenues to the extent of 200 billion rials by the end of the current year. We would have to reduce staff in those state-owned firms now running at a loss. In 1359 budget, there was a deficit of 4640 billion rials. However, if all the anticipated plans are approved, there would only be a deficit of 3600 to 3700 billion rials in the "emergency budget" which seems quite logical.

Q. How do you view the rumours on the dissolution of P&BO?

A. Such rumours have mostly been spread by certain individuals on political grounds about whose political affiliations I don't want to comment. There also exist some individuals, with specific political affiliations, who contend that P&BO is a redundant organisation. If we want to speedily gain economic independence and our revolutionary aspirations, such as social justice and equitable distribution of wealth, then we need to have a system of centralised planning. Anyone, with even a little knowledge of economy, understands this. I don't approve of P&BO in its present form and personnel. It can be reduced, but it is vital for the country in terms of its valuable functions, since its dissolution would lead to lack of harmony in national affairs. Such individuals, calling for a dissolution of P&BO have not so far come forward to discuss the issue in the Islamic Majlis, and hence it appears to be just a political stunt.

BANKER ASSESSES OPERATIONS OF AGRICULTURE BANK

Tehran IRAN ECONOMIC SERVICE in English 29 Sep 80 pp 4-6

[Interview with Abolfazl Shaheedi, member of Agriculture Bank Managing Committee; date and place not given]

[Text] Following the end of the general assembly meeting of the representatives of Islamic Councils of various branches of the Agriculture Bank from all over the country, Abolfazl Shaheedi, a member of the elected Managing Committee of the Agriculture Bank expressed his views in an interview on the performance of the Bank in the pre-revolutionary period, the existing bottlenecks and its future program. Here is a summarised version of the interview.

[Question] What is the reason for slow processing of credit extension by the Agriculture Bank to farmers? According to reports, these loans are much delayed before they finally reach the applicants.

[Answer] This is one of the fundamental problems faced by the Bank. The loans, if not extended on the proper time when they are required for farmers to procure seed, fertilisers and water pumps, etc., they actually lose their value, and are subsequently used up by the farmers in meeting their basic needs of living. However, the reason for these loans, which sometimes take up to four months to be processed, is the shortage of bank staff and availability of funds. We have, in a resolution passed at the recent general assembly meeting, called upon the Government to notify the total amount of funds to the Agriculture Bank at the beginning of every financial year. Naturally, once the available funds with the Bank are exhausted, we have to approach the Central Bank of Iran (CBI) and the Plan and Budget Organisation for further grant of funds which are usually not extended to us due to the present critical conditions.

[Question] What was the total amount of funds granted to the Agriculture Bank this year?

[Answer] CBI has approved about 110 billion rials for us during the current year. Because of some new plans, we are hoping to get CBI approval for boosting these funds to 200 billion rials which, if granted, would more than double the funds given to us last year, and these would go a long way to meet the present needs of the farmers.

[Question] How much of these funds have been spent so far?

[Answer] Of these funds, which are being gradually put at our disposal, about 30 billion rials have been spent so far. According to statistics, a total of about 38.5 billion rials have been extended in loans to 231,000 rural families during the first four months of the Iranian year (ending July 20, 1980). This shows a 93% rise in terms of number of loans and 109% boost in terms of the amount of credits as compared to the corresponding period of the last year. This rate would further go up during the autumn season when great number of farmers apply for loans.

[Question] What is the maximum amount of loan paid by the former Agriculture Cooperative Bank and the former Agriculture Extension Bank in the post-revolutionary period?

[Answer] The former Agriculture Extension Bank had certain on-going projects which couldn't be discontinued due to existing commitments. However, we limited the scope of these projects without affecting their economic feasibility. Now the Agriculture Bank is acting in accordance with the new set of regulations on loan extension under which a maximum of 10 million rials are granted to individuals and a maximum of 50 million rials for collective activities. This limit has been put in order to allow larger number of farmers to benefit from such loans. The average amount of farm credits extended until last year stood at 82,000 rials, but during the current year, this has gone up to 120,000 rials, which shows that due attention is being paid to the needs of the masses in rural areas.

[Question] Since the Islamic land reforms are being implemented in the country, are there any plans to probe into the specified limits of land ownership and loans paid by the former Agriculture Extension Bank to big land owners?

[Answer] Unfortunately, no such probe has been made so far. However, the loans, being extended now, are paid after due consultations with the seven-member team in each region on the land ownership position of the applicant and the performance of his agricultural activities.

[Question] Most of the individuals who acquired big loans from the former Agriculture Extension Bank were those who come under Principle 49 of the constitution, and as such their wealth and assets are to be probed into. Do you have any program to probe into such persons' file?

[Answer] A number of individuals were singled out for such a probe. But since the merger of the former Agriculture Extension Bank and former Agriculture Cooperative Bank has not been completed so far, therefore there exist certain problems in this task because of our lack of thorough and direct supervision over the new Bank.

[Question] Should the Bank legally function under your supervision?

[Answer] Yes, we should have such a supervision. But this supervision is practically possible only when systems of these two banks are completely merged and their employees brought under the framework of the new bank.

[Question] What is the mode of functioning of this Bank? Whether it is acting in an independent manner?

[Answer] It is practically governed by its Managing Director and the Managing Committee. However, due to the different nature of the two systems, it cannot be said to have basic and accurate supervision over the Bank affairs. Presently, the preliminary merger plan has been prepared, and necessary staff needs of its four units appropriated.

[Question] What are the conditions governing the advancement of loans to farmers?

[Answer] Under the new set of regulations, many of the former security bonds have been eliminated, and we extend up to a maximum of one million rials in loans on guarantees and promissory notes. Since the issue of probing into individual land ownership is also there, we grant loans upon the recommendation of the seven-member committee in rural areas, as also some other loans on the basis of documentary evidence given by local witnesses about applicants. But such evidence has posed us with a number of problems because of incorrect evidence.

[Question] What are your future plans to make the Bank still more people-oriented and to remove its existing bottlenecks?

[Answer] Among our problems in this connection are the scarcity of funds and resultant lack of job security. In some branches of the Bank, employees attend to their official duties due to their concern regarding the scarcity of funds that might lead to their tussle with dissatisfied loan applicants. Another problem relates to a shortage in staffing position which can be met if we are allowed to hire the presently jobless highschool diploma-holders and graduates on daily wage basis. This would boost the activities of this Bank and consequently resolve many problems. At present, we have no Bank branches in about 1,500 small towns, and hence can't meet their demands for farm loans. We are also lacking in transport facilities to cater to the needs of the rural population. After much difficulty, we were able to purchase 50 new automobiles this year, but this would be neutralised with the planned inaugural of 50 more branches of the Bank in the near future.

[Question] Don't you think there is a need to bring about a change in credit extension policy?

[Answer] Yes, there is. The problems I have referred are those confronted by the Bank at present. If the Agriculture Bank is to carry out its basic functions in a normal way, then cash loans are to be extended to farmers, under the overall supervision of the rural services centers with which they are to be attached. All the servicing units, including those of the Agriculture Bank, are to be located in rural areas, with the credits being extended to such units in cash by the Bank for offering their services to farmers.

HIGH COST, CONSUMPTION OF DURABLE GOODS SCORED

Tehran IRAN ECONOMIC SERVICE in English 6 Oct 80 p 13

[Text] More than two million tons of household appliances have been imported by Iran during the last few months, and with stocks full, consumption of such durable goods has this year increased by more than 70 per cent over last year. Ahmad Qassemi in the Tehran Bazaar said that demand for household appliances rose at a high pace during the summer, and this appeared to be somewhat unusual. He said that during a two week period 3,000 electric suction sweepers were sold, and that some 500,000 sewing machines imported during the year had all been sold.

Last summer there was a shortage of fans and space coolers. A fan selling for 4,500 rials last year was priced at 7,500 rials this year. And coolers costing 25,000 rials last year were now priced at 33,000, and even then the local manufacturers only supplied the frame of the coolers and the customer had to buy the electric motor on the black market.

Other items which have gone up in price include water heaters (from 23,000 to 29,000), wall clocks (from 3,500 to 4,500), Pars colour television sets (from 90,000 to 93,700), and 9-foot Philco refrigerators (from 20,000 to 23,800).

One Bazaari merchant said that the higher prices were all due to profiteering. Before the Revolution the merchants in the Bazaar played a major role in the downfall of the old regime, but now after the Revolution they are turning to profiteering again. He added that most items are imported at reasonable cost, but by the time the article has passed through various middlemen the cost for the consumer has increased fourfold.

In this way sewing machines are imported at a cost of 4,000 rials each and sold to the consumer at 12,000 rials. Similarly ceiling fans imported at 1,700 rials each are sold to householders in Khuzistan at 12,000 rials.

The merchant warned his colleagues in the Bazaar and the various middlemen involved to abstain from profiteering and hoarding of products, and to be content with a reasonable profit, or else they would soon face the wrath and anger of the public.

Another Bazaari said that it was wrong for the people to buy such large amounts of foreign imported "luxury" goods, but should utilise traditional Iranian products instead, and wait until the country was in a position itself to manufacture such household appliances.

He went to the United States the next year and following a specialization course in pediatrics he completed a course in internal medicine and cardiology and returned to Iran in 1354 [21 Mar 75 - 20 Mar 76] after which he was appointed as a professor at Tehran University. After the victory of revolution he was appointed head of the Razi Medical College and later as the head of the medical faculty of Tehran University. He had recently been appointed as the chancellor of Tehran University. He is married and has two children.

Asghar Ebrahimi, Petroleum Minister

Engineer Ebrahimi was born in Esfahan in 1332 [21 Mar 53 - 20 Mar 54] and holds a diploma in mathematics and a BA in chemical and gas and oil engineering as well as an MA in oil engineering from the University of Southern California. He left his doctorate degree studies incomplete to return to Iran. During his student years, both in the Oil College in Abadan and at the University of California, he was a member of the Islamic Association. He had been arrested 4 times by the SAVAK in Esfahan and Abadan, once spending 17 days in prison in Abadan. During the old regime, he had held several revealing news conferences in the United States. After the victory of the revolution, Ebrahimi played important and effective roles in calming down the situation in Khorramshahr, in confrontation with Iraq and in leading of military operations against the enemy. He also took a leading part in the strengthening of the border garrisons and the purging of government agencies in the Province of Ilam. His last position was that of governor-general of Ilam.

Mohammad Reza Ne'matzadeh, Minister of Industries and Mines

Born in 1324 [21 Mar 45 - 20 Mar 46] in Tabriz, he finished his elementary and highschool studies in Tehran. He later went to the United States where he studied mechanical engineering at the University of California. He was the head of Persian speaking group of the Islamic Association [at the university], and before returning to Iran worked for 6 months at various industries in the United States. He cooperated with various political groups at different times, and before the victory of revolution he worked with Engineer Bazargan in getting the oil industry started. After the revolution, he worked with the Ministry of Labor for 4 months to get various plants restarted. He also cooperated with the Islamic Housing Foundation as an inspector. He was, for 4 to 5 months, a member of government mission at the Iran National Plants until last Aban [23 Oct-21 Nov 79] when he was appointed the minister of labor. He does not belong to any political party but has had close ties with the Islamic Republic Party. He is married and has 3 children

Duzduzani, Minister of National Guidance

He was born in 1321 [21 Mar 42 - 20 Mar 43] and was employed by the Ministry of Education in 1340 [21 Mar 61 - 20 Mar 62]. He later attended special classes for teachers of theological subjects run by such professors as Yadollah Sahabi, Bazargan and Golzadeh Ghafuri. Because of the old regime's sensitivity to that matter, he was exiled to such places as Damavand and Larijan. Later, he entered the university and, inspired by the uprising of 15 Khordad 1342 [5 June 1963], he joined the Islamic Nations Party which was the first organized Islamic group that believed in armed struggle. Following the uncovering of the party in 1344 [21 Mar 65 - 20 Mar 66] he and 55 other members were arrested. He was sentenced to 6 months in prison and was discharged from the Ministry of Education. In 1346 [21 Mar 67 - 20 Mar 68], during the coronation celebrations, he and 5 other people were arrested and were charged with the plot to kill the deposed shah and members of his family. He did not confess and was able to go free after 44 days in prison. In 1348 [21 Mar 69 - 20 Mar 70], he joined the "Allah" Party, and later, the Mojahedin. In 1351 [21 Mar 72 - 20 Mar 73], he and a number of Mojahedins were arrested and were sentenced to 7 years in jail. He continued his struggle after he was released in 1356 [21 Mar 77 - 20 Mar 78] until after the victory of revolution after which he played an important role in organizing the Guardians Corp which he commanded for some time. He still teaches the corps members theoretical subjects.

Mahdavi-Kani, Minister of Interior

While in prison, he cooperated closely with the Mojahedins until 1354 [21 Mar 75 - 20 Mar 76]. At this time, he and another young man (of the Mojahedins) formed a secret Islamic organization in prison. After the revolution he became active in the Central Committee and became a member of the Council of the Central Committee. He was tried in 1354 [21 Mar 76 - 20 Mar 77] and was first sentenced to 3 years in jail. His sentence was extended to 38 months by the appeal court. He was released in Ordibehesht 1357 [21 Apr-21 May 78] and following the revolution was appointed as the superintendent of the officers school which had been taken over by the people.

DEFENSE BUDGET SEEN HAMPERING ECONOMY

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 27 Aug 80 p 10

[Article: "Gafni: Defense--The Heavy Burden on the Israeli Economy"]

[Text] The State of Israel's defense burden is three to four times heavier than that of every member country in NATO--said the Governor of the Bank of Israel Arnon Gafni in his talk on Tuesday on Israel's economic situation and policy.

The governor appeared at the 38th International Conference on Public Funding and Employment, held at Hebrew University on Mount Scopus in Jerusalem. More than 200 senior economists from various countries, including the Eastern Bloc, are participating in the conference. The Egyptian representative, who was to participate in the discussions and speak on the funding and effectiveness of public initiatives in Egypt, did not attend.

The governor of the Bank of Israel dwelt in his survey on the difficulties which are afflicting Israel as part of the sad situation in which most of the industrialized countries of the world find themselves. This is primarily because of the continuous increases in the cost of petroleum.

Israel has an additional problem which weighs heavily on its economy--the defense burden which constitutes a serious factor in the growth of the country's national debt. Mr Gafni pointed out that in contrast to an increase of 3 billion dollars in the national debt during Israel's first 25 years, this debt has increased by 15 billion dollars during the last 7 years alone. "This is an unbearable burden, and it is three or four times greater than each of the NATO countries," he said.

In regard to inflation, the governor of the Bank of Israel opined that "there is perhaps a tendency to partially blame also the liberalization in the foreign currency policy which the Likud administration has conducted," however this is not the crucial and most important factor in the acceleration of inflation. Other important factors are public expenditures, increased monetary expansion and wage increases.

The economic policy conducted during the last year has been trying to control these factors, and not without success, said Mr Gafni, in citing the positive results which led to the decrease of private consumption, the decrease in imports and the increase in exports.

In concluding his remarks, the governor of the Bank of Israel mentioned his program for economic policy and the battle against inflation, which is based on a joint arrangement for a temporary freeze of wages, prices and taxes.

DROP SEEN IN DEFENSE FORCE READINESS

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 3 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by the Military Correspondent of DAVAR: "The Training Level in the IDF Has Reached the Brink of the Red Line"]

[Text] In the Central Training Installation of the IDF for field units, training is conducted for units from detachment up to regiment for all military reserve units of the IDF, and the installation is provided with a good deal of up-to-date equipment. In the course of a year, tens of units pass through the installation and the training exercises conducted there encompass units from a detachment to a regiment on a very broad scale.

In these exercises the integrated battle theory of the IDF is implemented in practice. Due to budgetary limitations, this training is conducted with a minimal utilization of battle armaments and equipment, but in part various training aids are substituted for the use of equipment, some of which are modern and quite expensive electronic components that afford the soldier-trainees a refresher in battle theory and practice in battle methods.

On a tour of this place yesterday by military correspondents, the advantages of the systems and the manner in which they are utilized for the purpose of training tens of thousands of servicemen annually, were explained. Among other things, structures have been erected at the installation for battle in urban areas, a large range, facilities for teaching tank gunnery occupations, use of communications equipment for training, and the like.

Major General Amnon Reshef, commander of the Armored Corps, Major General Amir Drury, head of the Training Department in the General Staff, and Brigadier General A., commander of the installation, explained, on a tour, the effectiveness of the installation, its advantages and the solutions it affords the military during a time of economizing. In a "warfare city" in a built-up area there are structures and streets within which infantrymen are trained in warfare in built-up areas under almost actual area conditions. Among other things, training is conducted in the installation for detachment commands in order to prepare them for maneuvers in which all units of the detachment participate. During the past 2 years many innovations have been introduced to the central installation, and the construction of facilities, and the setting up of additional bases are continuing.

With all of this, the remarks Major Generals Levy, Reshef and Drury seemed to leave the impression that the economizing and the budgetary restraints are bringing the training level of the IDF formations to the brink of the red line. As an example, it was reported that the training of one detachment for the duration of the maneuver that extends over a number of days in all of its aspects, costs tens of millions of Israel pounds. Acquisition of a single simulator installation for teaching tank occupations will cost something like one billion pounds. Because of budgetary restraints, the acquisition of such simulation systems has been deferred at this stage.

ANNEXATION OF GOLAN HEIGHTS OPPOSED

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 20 Aug 80 p 9

[Article by Dan Margalit: "Golan Arises on Annexation Map"]

[Text] The parade of embassies leaving the capital has increased, as could be expected, the sense of regret on the part of some cabinet ministers and members of Knesset, who were pressured into voting for the annexation of Jerusalem, but this has not weakened the call for the annexation of the Golan Heights. An analysis of the political circumstances and pressures leads to the conclusion that the parliamentary trap is unavoidable and the opposition ability is practically nil. One of the Likud MK's who had signed the petition on the Golan Heights said to me in a bitterly joking manner: "There is nothing to fear. The Columbian consulate will not leave Katsrin in protest."

But in time, some voices expressing reservation have been heard. Menahem Begin was cool in his reaction to the petition calling for annexation. When he received the signed demand that "we not lose the North," the prime minister responded with almost complete silence, and Likud members added that "we do not have to lose our heads." But just as the prime minister changed his reasoning in the Jerusalem affair, and made it the opening gambit of the election campaign, so he may act regarding the new demand.

The chairman of the Labor party, Shimon Peres, was not far behind Begin, and sought to assure himself some room to withdraw. He declared this week that a territorial compromise is possible on the Golan Heights. As the defense minister in the last Alignment government, Peres knew that at that time Henry Kissinger had probed the possibility of reaching an interim agreement with President Assad at the price of a withdrawal of 2-3 kilometers. These voices cannot buck the general trend. Since 1967, the settlement of the Golan Heights has been part of the Israeli mythology. When Alignment governments wanted to evade demands to expand settlements in Judea and Samaria, they added preliminary housing facing Damascus. Except for Jerusalem, singers have honored this region more than any other in the country. The words by Rachel: "There are the Golan mountains, reach out and touch them: have for many years been heard in parade choruses.

Even archeology has been enlisted to uncover the heavy Jewish settlement of Golan during the Second Temple period (a fact).

The political reasons which have encouraged this trend are still in place. Syria has refused to join any peace process. Fear of such a possibility has recently been expressed by settlers. Syria controls the course of the PLO. The last Damascus Congress proved that the terrorists are not satisfied with a partition of the country and the establishment of a state alongside of Israel; they want a state to replace Israel. Under these circumstances there is no one with whom to talk. Even according to Anwar al-Sadat's last letter to Begin, no country has to negotiate its extermination. These are the conditions which prevail in the Syrian-PLO sector.

From such roots has grown rapidly a unity which is a national consensus. This unity opened on the left. MAPAM included Golan in its original plans. It was only in this area that the Hashomer Hatsair kibbutzim breached the Green Line, with their fields spreading out on the Golan Heights. Their settlements in the eastern Upper Galilee are trying to soothe the party institutions so as to avoid creating any more disturbance than necessary. MAPAM is well aware of the inferiority of its position.

Likewise, the doves of Hakibbutz Hameukhad do not want to provoke a debate of principle over the Golan Heights. Their great historical debate with Moshe Dayan is based on their claim that when he was the defense minister, he was not enthusiastic about occupying the heights. They also like to quote him, that the present ceasefire line cannot be described as a defensible border in Syrian terms. The settlements of Hakibbutz Hamsukhad in the area are more prominent than those of any other movement.

Under these conditions, the Alighment will not permit Geulah Kohen to seize the initiative again. Opposition politicians do not want to get caught once again in being dragged after the "renaissance." Alignment members of Knesset will oversee the annexation of the Golan Heights by means of a multi-party coalition created for that purpose. In a certain sense, Likud and the NRP will be less demanding on the issue of the Golan Heights. The historical link to that region is not so strong, and in orthodox circles this is even considered to be "the conquest of Syria" which is a right but not a particularly obligatory commandment. Yet even Likud and the NRP do not want to play into the hands of Ge'ula Kohen.

The principal oil for lubricating the machine is supplied by public opinion surveys. Seventy-five percent of the Jewish community supports the annexation of the Golan Heights, and that is an irresistable incentive in an election year. To this must be added the Druse Arabs in the Golan Heights themselves, who have apparently accepted certain assurances not all of which are known. A member of the Israeli administration does not dare to warn them as to what will happen to them if in the future they return to a Syrian administration, for no Israeli administration is now able to admit that such considerations guide it.

In the Druse pressure to become citizens, as much as it flatters Israel, is also a troubling element similar to the lack of gratification which sometimes accompanies relations with Major Haddad. But in the face of the active role played by the Israeli Druse Arabs in pressing for annexation, the government will not want to reject them.

In practical terms, this annexation is without value. Just as the Jerusalem legislation did not add one Jewish neighborhood to the capital, so the annexation of the Golan Heights will not solve the problem of the settlements in the region. In Katsrin and Marom-Hagolan there has recently been heard complaint about the slowdown in construction activity. The settlers have complained to visitors that the frames of houses have remained uncovered. Hundreds of families who signed up for housing have not been able to move into their homes.

The situation is even worse in the area of employment. People travel from Katsrin to work throughout the Galilee. If, until now, settlements have not developed because of budgetary difficulties and considerations of official priorities (e.g. pouring more resources into Samaria), now a political difficulty may be anticipated. Annexation of the Golan Heights will arouse international pressure to stop all Jewish construction. To the economic pressures will be added political pressures which until now were dormant. But, in the election atmosphere which is already guiding the party centers and Knesset factions, no practical value is assigned to arguments such as these. Only earlier elections, or sophisticated delaying tactics will be able to stop the annexation.

EAST JERUSALEM ARAB CALLS FOR PEACEFUL COEXISTENCE

Tel Aviv 'AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 20 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Gideon Vigart: "Prophet From East Jerusalem"]

[Text] In the east part of Jerusalem lives a man who is considered a prophet--a man before his time and era. In the present atmosphere of great tension in the territories, when people live in constant fear of retaliation and revenge if they dare to "betray the Palestinian cause", and contradict the self-proclaimed leaders in Beirut and Damascus, it is unusual to find such an "exception."

So, if in this atmosphere we meet in the Arab part of Jerusalem a Palestinian nationalist, who proclaims on street corners that he rejects the "secular democratic state in all of Palestine," in the style of the PLO, and instead demands the existence of the State of Israel within secure and recognized borders--he is indeed "exceptional."

And if in addition, this same Jerusalem Palestinian demands that the PLO erase from its charter all reference to armed struggle "for the secular entity," and says to the Palestinian organizations in Lebanon: if you ever want to return to the Bank and the Gaza Strip, you will have to change into declared political parties to struggle for your goals by peaceful legal means--this indeed is a rare phenomenon.

Such a man is Muhammad Abu Shilbayah, "the stubborn," who calls upon his people to stop always demanding "all or nothing." His motto is "take what is given--and later ask for more!" Who is this man, and what is his background?

Muhammad Abu Shilbayah was born in Kfar Yahudish (today Yahud), in the last decade of the British mandate, and he fled with his family because of the War of Independence. After wandering, he settled in Jerusalem, studied at the University of Cairo, and became a young teacher. As a nationalist, and an activist in the Syrian socialist Al-Ba'ath party, he sought the removal of the regime of the Hashemite kingdom. Thus he spent years in Jordanian concentration camps in the desert on the Iraq border.

His name became known in broader circles when in 1971 there appeared on the shelves of bookstores in East Jerusalem his first book (in Arabic) "There Is No Peace Without a Free Palestine State" and a year later "The Way To Salvation, Freedom, and Peace," two books which could never have been published in Arab countries because of the sharp criticism of their regimes. Even then the Jerusalem writer came out against the use of violence as a solution to the Israeli-Arab dispute (in his first book a special chapter is devoted to "the mistakes of the Palestinian organizations who have learned nothing from the lessons of the past!").

He writes as follows: "The Palestinian state which I propose does not need weapons and does not need an army. Absolutely not; we do not want to destroy anyone or throw anyone into the sea; we do not want to build our state on the ruins of the state of Israel..." (p 14, "The Way to Salvation, Freedom, and Peace").

Abu Shilbaya was the first man, until today the only one, not only from among his own people but among all Arabs, who demanded not only the payment of reparations by Israel to Palestinian refugees, but also the payment of reparations by Arab countries to Jewish refugees who were forced to leave their countries following the War of Independence and the establishment of the state.

In 1973 Abu Shilbaya made an attempt to publish his own newspaper, the weekly SAWT-AL-JAMAHIR (The Voice of the Masses). In its pages, which appeared for 3 months, the editor called for a solution based on mutual understanding and concessions, called upon Israeli writers to work with him, and called for the establishment of an Israeli-Palestinian peace party. Today, Abu Shilbaya is one of the editors of the Jerusalem Arab daily paper AL-ANBA.

It is a rare experience to listen to a man like Abu Shilbaya in these times. Today, as in the past, he is not afraid of expressing his opinions, even though they arouse the leaders of his people beyond the borders. He is not afraid to say openly that "deep and far-reaching changes have occurred among the Palestinians in the territories thanks to the daily contacts between them and Israelis over the last 13 years." He thinks that the effects of this fruitful encounter are especially felt in the creation of totally new classes within the population of the territories and East Jerusalem--workers and women. They are no longer satisfied with an antiquated social structure and are now demanding true democracy "as it exists in Europe, the United States, and Israel!"

His plan: federation between Israel, the Palestinians, and Jordan--as a nucleus for a general Middle Eastern federation in which Egypt would be the main factor. In his opinion, the "secular democratic state" on the PLO model would lead to the establishment of a bi-national state, a second Cyprus, and unceasing war.

With great courage, he proclaims to all willing to listen: "I am for a Palestinian state in the territories--a transition period of 5 years under American supervision, elections in 2 years in which the voters will elect a government which will enter into negotiations with Israel on all of the problems in the dispute."

As for Jerusalem? A united city, indivisible, having two separate city halls, with an overall single city hall--the capital of the tripartite federation. But above all, this man repeatedly emphasizes: I demand an absolute end to acts of hostility, a change in the Palestinian covenant so that it will recognize Israel's right to exist within sure and recognized borders forever--in exchange for Israel's recognition of a Palestinian state which is peaceful and non-aggressive.

POLITICAL PARTIES WOO ARAB VOTE

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 28 Aug 80 p 19

[Article by Meir Hareuveni: "Parties Open Race For Arab Votes"]

[Text] The people involved in the electoral system in the Arab sector estimate today that the principal struggle prior to the elections for the Knesset are in two camps: the front which is crystalizing around RAKAH, and the Alignment. The other parties, including Likud and the NRP, which had significant influence on the Arab village in the last 20 years, will pay the price of having ignored the problems of the Arab sector and of their absence from the Arab village during the period of Likud's power. In the chase for Arab votes in the Arab sector, the party workers are encountering a chilly attitude. When the secretary general of MAPAM, Viktor Shem-Tov, was invited to lecture to a group of Alignment workers at the Arab village of Dir-al-Asad near Karmiel, only 20 persons from the village and from those invited from other Arab villages in the Galilee attended. Workers from RAKAH, the strongest party in the village, did not hide their pleasure at the embarrassment of their principal antagonist.

In another instance, the honor given by Alignment leaders to the past MK Shaykh Jabar Mu'adi whenever they visit the area, was challenged by young activists in the Druse villages. The young people claim that the aging leader who tends to envelope himself in gilded robes while his feet are stuck in the soil of reality of the Druse village, is in fact a "worn out horse" and that the Labor Party would do well to understand that the Druse population has become estranged from the aging and conservative leadership. More than anything else, the young activists were angered by the fact that Shaykh Jabar Mu'adi was invited to sit at the presidential table, when Shimon Peres appeared at the Histadrut Hall in Acco before a sympathetic Jewish public.

Another phenomenon which is accompanying the race of the large parties for the votes of the Arab electorate is the organizing of mixed Jewish-Arab pressure groups which seek to develop brotherly relations of cooperation between the Jewish and Arab sectors in the Galilee. Everyone knows of the efforts of the head of the local council of Kfar Tavor, Micha

Goldman (who is one of the election managers for Yitshaq Rabin). Recently there was founded, at the initiative of Micha Goldman, the "Committee of Jewish-Arab Councils in the Galilee."

A similar activity in the Arab sector, in cooperation with groups of Jewish activists, is being conducted in the Galilee by MK Amnon Lin, of the Knesset faction of La'am.

Another group which was created this month at the initiative of the Regional Workers Council in the Western Galilee and the Union for Development of the Western Galilee is the group for nurturing good neighborly relations, with the participation of Jews and Arabs from both sectors of the region. One of the signatories of an invitation to the first convention of this group is a resident of Kfar Dir-el-Asad, Husayn Asadi, coordinator of activities of the Labor Party in the Arab sector of the Western Galilee.

Another group, totally Arab, which was recently created, is the "Arab Group". This group is led by people of high position in both Arab and Jewish circles, most of them academics. Among them are the attorney Jamil Shalhuv of Haifa, attorney Muhammad Masrawa of Kfar Qera, Ibrahim Shabat who is a journalist from Nazareth, and Dr Sami Mar'i of Haifa University. Because of their position in both the Jewish and Arab communities, the people of this group carry far more weight than their numbers would suggest. Although for the moment this group is not identified as an offshoot of any of the political parties, its primary mission is to moderate extremism in the Arab sector and to increase cooperation with Israel, and this will lead to such identification, at least according to the propaganda of the RAKAH people, who view this group with much seriousness, and characterize it as "yet another group under Alignment protection."

In contrast to the formation of a strong front led by RAKAH in all villages and population concentrations of Arabs in the Galilee and the Triangle, the deployment of the Alignment in the Arab sector is marked by splinter groups. This splintering of forces and group organization based on local and sectarian interests marks the split between Rabin and Peres in the struggle for the Druse Arab vote.

Presently, sympathy in the Arab sector is supporting Peres. In the Arab sector, the Alighment paints itself as a party which rejects settlements in the territories and which is ready to negotiate significant withdrawals. Of the two principal opponents in the struggle for the prime ministry in an Alignment government, Rabin has the image of the hawk, which explains the support expected by Peres.

The Arab electorate blames the Likud government for difficult economic conditions as well as the extremism in political expressions on the issues of settlements in Judea and Samaria, as well as recent developments in negotiations with Egypt.

The Arab electorate will also settle accounts with the NRP because of the influence of the Ministry of Interior on budgets for local authorities as well as permits for building. They remember clashes with the police against the background of implementation of decrees for the destruction of houses built without permits, the repeated protests over the non-approval of building plans in the Arab village, and the difficult financial situation of local authorities currently.

Political developments in the region since 1967 and especially in recent years, surrounding the peace agreement with Egypt and the strengthening of pro-PLO elements not only within the region, but on international fronts such as the UN Assembly and the European Common Market, have contributed to the strengthening of RAKAH and its establishment as the central party in the Israeli Arab sector.

RAKAH, together with other local factors which are uniting around it in a front, is trying to create for itself the image of a responsible party. Its leaders emphasize that they agree with and recognize Israel's right to exist within the 1967 borders, and they demand the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside of Israel. They affirm the Israel-Egypt peace treaty, and they accept the coexistence of Jews and Arabs in the region on condition that the Arab community enjoy full equality of rights.

Extremist minority groups among the Arabs of Israel view even RAKAH as a disappointment that has to be removed. The RAKAH platform has no answer for the longing of many Arabs for the creation of a Palestinian state which would include the territories where large communities of Arabs are concentrated within the state of Israel. Such extremist factors, including the S'nei Hakfar; TALAM (the Progressive National Movement) which is the movement represented by university students, as well as MATSPEN which is made up of both Jews and Arabs, all reject RAKAH.

Opposing RAKAH there are relatively large Arab groups which identify with the State of Israel. These communities are controlled by people of [illegible] years of age, most of them well established economically. These groups fear that the strengthening of the extremists and the weakening of the deterrent strength of Israel will lead to a deterioration which will cause them to lose their material achievements and turn back the standard of living to which they have become accustomed. Within these groups are those who seek to find a common denominator and a basis for cooperation with the Jewish political parties.

The Likud has not been wise in using its position of control. In the three years in which it has been in the driver's seat, neither the Liberals nor the Herut movement has established one club or branch in any Arab village. The recent attempts of the Deputy Prime Minister Simha Ehrlich on behalf of the Liberals, to develop a network of communication and influence within the Arab sector, using his position as the government appointee over the Arab sector, have not succeeded in arousing more than a smile among the activist leaders within the Arab sector. The other Zionist parties have done nothing in this area. All of them have left the arena open for a struggle between RAKAH and the Alignment.

The Alignment has already made its first move in the Arab sector. The census of the Labor Party counted about 10,000 Arabs. About 100 Arab delegates are supposed to participate at the convention, and they will carry decisive weight in the selection of the candidate for prime minister. The Arab representatives are also demanding a place in the candidate lists for the Knesset and central public institutions in the government. The principal demand is that the Labor Party leave the Arabs and the Druse to decide who will be their candidates for the Knesset, and not perpetuate the selection of candidates through the party machinery.

The Labor Party is also preparing a platform in which special sections will be devoted to positions on issues important to the Arab sector. Central activists within the party are frequently visiting the Arab sector. Rabin and Peres made courtesy visits to greet Druse and Muslim leaders on the festival of Id-al-Fitr at the end of Ramadan, and they even participated in family events.

VARIOUS PEACE OPTIONS WITH ARABS ANALYZED

Tel Aviv HATZOFEH in Hebrew 22 Aug 80 p 6

[Article by Eliahu Khen-Tzion: "The Dangerous Character of the Jordanian Option"]

[Text] Before we deal with the subject itself, we must pose a series of fundamental questions.

Does King Husayn represent the Palestinians? Would an agreement with him mean an agreement with the Palestinians? Are the days of the Hashemite regime in Jordan numbered? Is a treaty between Jordan and Israel so essential that it would be worth the price of accepting Jordanian-Palestinian sovereignty in Hebron, Ramallah, Nablus, and Gaza?

The questions are many, and any ill considered step could lead to destructive results for the future of the country, for generations. Let us face these problems and answer them. Before doing so, it is worth clarifying who are "our basic enemies." With whom are we constantly and fundamentally in frontal collision? On the other hand, which are the Arab countries where the "areas of friction" with them are small, relatively, and where conflicts can be bridged?

We can see that basically, the problems between us and Egypt are not abysmal and can be bridged. Ultimately, there is no territorial dispute between Israel and Egypt. There is an international border recognized by all nations of the world. Israel has no territorial demands in Sinai, and Egypt has no territorial demands in Israel. Israeli conquest of Sinai, three times, was an Israeli response to Egyptian challenges, and for security considerations to prevent it from becoming a "military spring board" against israel. The many attempts of Egypt to attack Israel led us to hold a permanent road in the Sinai desert, all or in part, and to create works on the ground which would prevent Egypt from turning the Sinai into a permanent base for attacking Israel.

At the same time, there is no dispute between the people of Egypt and the people of Israel. There is no collision of interests of a proportion which would upset a stable peace treaty between us and Egypt.

The difficulty for Egypt in coming to peace terms stemmed essentially from reasons which were required by "the brotherhood of Islamic nations" as well as the desire to maintain Egypt's hegemony in the Arab world. Egypt wanted to enjoy the economic support of the oil exporting nations, and to avoid political isolation.

On the other hand, Egypt had many reasons for wanting peace with Israel. The principal one was to stop the "vicious circle of war," which had sapped its strength and prevented it from devoting its resources to the reconstruction of the Egyptian people.

The points of dispute between us and Syria are much greater than with Egypt, but still it is possible to bridge them. There is an international border between Israel and Syria. We were forced to occupy and hold the Golan Heights because of wars forced upon us by the Syrians.

There are political circles within Syria which have not forgotten the distant history of "Greater Syria" which stretched to the borders of Egypt, and included western and eastern Israel, but these memories have not been formulated into actual territorial demands.

Syria was and still is one of the states taking a most extreme stance with respect to Israel, and more than once it was the "motivator" which caused bloody wars and dragged the rest of the Arab countries into a general war with Israel. Nevertheless, the gaps are not abysmal, and a peace treaty could be reached without too much "pain" for Syria and Israel.

For purposes of discussion, it should be noted that in both Egypt and Syria there are dominant populations and presidential regimes, and while taking into account the non-democratic character of regimes in Arab countries, these do represent their countries, in spite of the strong opposition in each of the countries. So, signed treaties could be made with these countries under their present regimes. It is not impossible that such treaties would be breached by new regimes that might come to power, or even by the existing regimes, but nevertheless there is a degree of reasonableness that political agreements could be reached. So, the achievement of a peace treaty with Egypt is a positive step, and the desire to reach such a treaty with Syria should be one of the early goals of Israeli policy.

This is not the case with Jordan, where King Husayn of the Hashemite dynasty rules, supported by the beduin population which is a minority in the total Jordanian population. Most of the population is composed of Palestinian refugees who have "acquired" for themselves a "national entity" differing in character and substance from that of the Jordanian beduins.

Today we live in a period of the destruction of the last remnants of kings and kingdoms in the Asian and African continents, and this "wave: is rising. The stability of Husayn's monarchy in Jordan is doubtful. It might even be said that its days are numbered.

Still one must marvel at Husayn's staying power and ability to maneuver. Yet the facts do not offer a promising picture for him.

The Palestinian population of Jordan is gaining increasing influence politically, economically, and culturally, and there is no doubt that in the not distant future, they will gain control of the country.

The Palestinians are now riding the crest of a wave of proud and militant nationalism, supported by other Arab countries and the Third World. Now they have succeeded in hitching their wagon to the countries of Western Europe. It is true that these waves are temporary and irrational, based on changing political reasons, filled with contradictions.

The differences between the political "national entity" between the two populations both in the country of Jordan and in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza with their "added Palestinian power", are deep and very basic. Any treaty between us and Jordan will be deeply influenced by these basic facts. It is beyond doubt clear that a treaty with King Husayn will not solve in any way the Palestinian problem. On the contrary, a treaty with Husayn would cause a Palestinian reaction and could aggravate the problem and make its solution more difficult.

There is a great difference between the geographical-military problems between Israel, Egypt, and Syria, and between Israel and Jordan. The former are on the southern and northern borders, and in military and geographical terms would not, in the first stages of a war, press the heartland of Israel.

On the other hand, Jordan is on Israel's long eastern border, at the narrow neck of the country. Jordan could launch an attack on Israel from bases close to the population centers of Israel, and the sensitive and critical military points of Israel. Any treaty with King Husayn, according to Shimon Peres, would include territorial concessions in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza. The border between Jordan and Israel would "move" westward and be fixed near Jenin in the north, Tul-Karm in the center, and in the region of Yatur which is south of Mt Hebron. Indeed, MK Peres supports the Allon plan, which calls for Israeli settlements and sovereignty in the Jordan Valley, and the stationing of the IDF on the Jordan River, but we must also keep in mind the Jericho plan which permits a Jordanian corridor to Judea and Samaria, as well as access roads for Jordan to Gaza, which would become a Jordanian port on the Mediterranean. The limitation which would prevent the Jordanian army from crossing the Jordan River would be no guarantee to prevent the possible creation of secret bases on the crest of the mountains of Judea and Samaria which could be occupied by the Jordanian army--in the event of a war--by means of surprise landings by land and air.

It can be assumed that any attack on Israel would be in cooperation with "brotherly" Arab countries--Syria, Iraq, Lybian support, Saudi Arabia, and the rest of the Arab countries.

Jordanian sovereignty over Judea, Samaria, and Gaza, which would prevent free military movement by Israel in those territories, would enable the Jordanians to concentrate military means, secretly, which could be hidden in the mountains and towns, and with which Arab civilian militias could be equipped, to provide massive military support to the Jordanian-Syrian-Iraqi army to the rear of the IDF.

King Husayn would solve his "Palestinian problem" within his country by transplanting the Palestinian leadership and the other volatile factors within the Palestinian population in Jordan to Judea and Samaria! The Palestinian entity in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza would be more radical and more militant, and would sooner or later lead to another Palestinian state under the Jordanian crown of King Husayn.

The "Jordanian option" will not solve the Palestinian problem; it will perpetuate it. As stated before, some of the Palestinian refugees in Jordan would be directed to Judea and Samaria by economic inducements as well as threats. Such a movement would be accompanied by a new national and religious arising under the motto "return to home" of the Palestinians.

The Jordanian option necessarily carries with it danger to the very existence of Israel. It carries no solution to any of the problems of Israel.

The Jordanian option will only sharpen the Palestinian problem, and encourage and push the Arab countries to open a general attack on Israel--on the northeastern front from aggressive military bases having clear advantages for the Arab armies! They would attack in the belief that this time they would be able to defeat the IDF on the battlefield. Already on the first day of such a war, Israel would be forced into a defensive posture, to protect its population and industrial centers, as well as sensitive military points. This would give a very important opening advantage to the Arabs.

The Jordanian option--in my opinion--would constitute a death trap for Israel, both politically and militarily, and the Israeli government should do everything possible to put distance between itself and such a solution.

In looking back, it is clear that Israel never had any interest in saving the monarchy of Husayn in 1970. We responded to a secret request, perhaps silently, by the U.S. to support the hand of Husayn by turning back the Syrian armored columns which were disguised as "Palestinian forces." The IDF did this by moving up armored units on the Golan Heights opposite the mountains of Gilead--the road on which the Syrian tanks were advancing. Their armored column was forced to turn back, to avoid an Israeli attack on its flank, or being cut off from the Syrian rear.

We have no interest in the continuation of Husayn's monarchy in Jordan. It holds no advantage for Israel, in spite of the quiet on the Jordanian border and the open bridges, which are to his credit.

In the long run it would be better if the Palestinians would take the reins of power in Jordan and realize there their "national political" desires. The "Palestinian entity" would find its expression there. In terms of explaining our position to the world, this would be more convenient for Israel. The autonomy plan, in spite of all of its drawbacks, limitations, and dangers, is a possible solution, as the lesser of evils. But in order to reach this solution, we must create far reaching facts in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza, by means of which we will be able to neutralize the dangers of autonomy, and prevent any territorial contiguity of the areas of autonomy. Only after basic preparations by Israel "in the field" can we begin serious negotiations on autonomy.

It would be appropriate for the government to come out of the next elections to be a national unity government, which would have the power to face the challenges and great difficulties which await us, on all fronts and in all sectors, in both political and security terms.

OUTSIDE MEDDLING CALLED CAUSE OF NAFHA PRISONER STRIKE

Tel Aviv HATZOFEH in Hebrew 2 Sep 80 p 4

[Article: "The Source of the Hunger Strike by the Security Prisoners in the Nafha Jail Lies in Unmistakable Political Causes"]

[Text] "The reasons for the hunger strike declared by the security prisoners in the Nafha Jail on 11 July were clear political reasons, provocative elements from the outside meddled in this issue and their contribution to the spread of the hunger strike was quite significant," was determined by special investigation commission headed by Commander Shmuel Eytan, which was appointed by the Interior Minister Yosef Burg to investigate the causes of the strike.

The report of the commission, which includes conclusions and recommendations stemming from what had been learned from the strike, was made public at a news conference which took place yesterday in Jerusalem.

The interior minister reported that the commission examined about 40 people, among them Squadron Leader Haim Levy, commander of the Prison Service, personally, who was present at the press conference.

The interior minister noted that in Israel there are seventeen jails, including seven in the areas of Judea and Samaria. These fails hold some 600 [sic] prisoners, among whom are 2700 security risks "in the broadest sense," since among those security detainees there are those even at Nafha who have been sentenced because of notorious acts of terror to life imprisonment more than once.

Outside Elements

"The hunger strike by these security prisoners was political, led, incited and inflamed by specific external elements, by the influence of the PLO, and in accordance with general political acts associated with the general atmosphere," said Mr Burg, who noted that the recommendations of the commission will be taken under advisement and implemented to the extent possible.

Squadron Leader Haim Levy, Commander of the Prison Service, and Commander Shmuel Eytan, chairman of the commission, also said that from conversations with the prisoners as well as from intelligence information, it was clear beyond doubt that "the strike was organized within the context of the struggle against the State of Israel, indeed from within the walls of the jail, and the principal goal was to exhaust us to the greatest degree possible."

Forced Feeding

The commission report confirmed that two of the hunger-striking prisoners who died during the strike, as a result of the penetration of acidified juices from the stomach to the lung after they had been fed in an exhausted and frail condition. One of the deceased, Muhammad 'Ali J'abri, ate willingly after the deterioration in his condition and for reasons that were not made clear died subsequently as a result of "respiratory pneumonia."

Hunger striker Ghassam Muhammad Halawa died after being forcefed by means of a tube (zunda) and expired by reason of the penetration of acidified gastric juices to the lungs, which could have been in any case "the result of the resistance by the prisoner and his general condition, when a quantity of food entered the trachea by error instead of the esophagus."

But in the two cases, the commission found no deviation from the procedural instructions and there was no negligent conduct requiring legal action.

By Order

The commission determines in general that "the activities in their entirety, including the medical activities which were carried out by the prison authorities, from the beginning of the hunger strike were carried out in accordance with orders and existing procedures." Only with regard to three prisoners was there the need to use force to persuade them to accept nourishment, according to regulations existing only in the State of Israel, which require that a hunger striker must be forced to take nourishment of a sufficient caloric quantity in order to prevent endangerment to his life.

Lack of Concern

Mr Burg noted that in countries throughout the world it is customary to permit hunger strikers to strike until there is an actual danger to life before the prisoner is forced to take nourishment, however in Israel there exists the principle of "sanctity of life" and a hunger striker is not permitted to approach a danger point at all.

The commission recommends response to a number of demands of the prisoners related to the conditions of their imprisonment, emphasizing that these demands could have been met even without the strike, the principal motivations of which were, as has been stated, political, and especially out of a desire to prevent the separation of the leadership of the prisoners from the other prisoners and their transfer to other jails.

Expanded Exercise Compound

Among the recommended reforms: Expansion of the exercise compound, instituting improvements in the conditions of the prisoners' meeting with their family members, installation of wash basins in all cells, increasing the lighting and ventilation conditions in the cells.

The commission also recommends introducing more variety in food served the prisoners by seasoning it and cooking it in accordance with their taste.

In a special recommendation, the commission notes that government authorities should give attention to the problem of indoctrination of the security prisoners, with the aim of utilizing the length of their stay in prison, in view of the fact that "the terrorist prisoners refuse to work at any kind of task with the exception of self-serving tasks entailing their own needs. The refusal to work is explained as a non-contribution to the Israeli war effort."

Intellectual Theory

The intellectuals among the prisoners disseminate a theory of hate toward everything associated with the State of Israel and Zionism, and that is operated at times also by the use of force and threats.

The commission notes further that "with the outbreak of the hunger strike at Nafha Jail, the incident received a great deal of publicity in the media in Israel and abroad to a degree exceeding all proportion. For example, it was reported that 26 hunger-strike prisoners had died.

Distorted Picture

The timing of the strike to correspond with the deliberations at the UN and in Copenhagen and the meddling by interested parties created a distorted picture of Nafha Jail."

The commission determined that it was proper to emphasize that the medical service and the other prison conditions at this facility are superior to the conditions at other jails, and the only problem is the distance of the site from the center of the country, which is a problem that is of no especial consequence in the opinion of the commission.

PALESTINIAN STATE SEEN AS ANATHEMA TO ARABS

Tel Aviv HATZOFEH in Hebrew 29 Aug 80 p 6

[Article by Dr Yitzhaq ben-Gad (Makhloff): "The Arabs Do Not Want a Palestinian State"]

[Text] In the previous article in this series, we discussed the dilemma facing the PLO after the Yom Kippur War: to join, or refrain from joining, the Geneva Conference. We shall discuss the intervention of the Arab states in the dispute, and the idea of the establishment of a Palestinian state. We shall answer the question: Do the Arab countries neighboring "Palestine" want a Palestinian state?

The resolutions of the Palestinian National Council at its meeting of June 1974--which have been called the Ten Section Plan--were extremist and uncompromising. They appear less extremist by reason of the strengthening of the foundations of the PLO which advocate a relatively moderate position, on the tactical question calling for the participation of the PLO in Geneva. This is as opposed to the position of the extremists, who reject out-of-hand any compromise or political negotiation and are of the opinion that the only way to achieve the goals of the Palestinians is through armed conflict. However, in effect, the resolutions of the Palestinian Council were meant to serve two important aims: A) To deny Jordan the legal authority to return to itself the areas from which Israel is to withdraw. B) At the same time to maintain a state of war with Israel and to prevent, at any cost, a connection between return of territory by Israel and the Palestinian recognition of Israel's right to exist.

Anyone examining the way of the Palestinian national reaction, cannot but be impressed by the fact that the Arab leaders who wished to exploit the Palestinian problem for their own interests have, with the passing of time, been turned into the exploited. The Palestinians who had been destined to be the weak and exploited body have become an exploiting factor, vexing and even dangerous, to these leaders and to others who have succeeded them. This is analogous to the axe turning upon its hewer.

The prime argument of the Palestinian movement that the land belongs to its Arab inhabitants and that no man has a right to deed it to the Zionists. The Balfour Declaration, the Mandate and the Partition of 1947 are all null and void, inasmuch as they stand in opposition to the natural and legitimate rights of the inhabitants of the land whose decisive majority are Arabs. The appointment of Haj Muhammad Amin al-Husseini to the exalted position of president of the Supreme Muslim Council was the beginning stage in the relations of "Palestine" with the Arab countries and Islam. Amin al-Husseini was an ambitious leader who wanted "Palestine" to capture a position in the Arab and Muslim arena above and beyond its size and its political weight. In a Muslim congress which he convened in Jerusalem in December 1931, there are to be seen for the first time hundreds of representatives from Arab and Muslim states who came to deliberate over what the Mufti called: "The terrifying Zionist threat to the Holy Places." In the riots of 1936, some of the Arab states attempted to intervene with the Palestinians to cease their strike. In the London meeting of 1939, representatives from the Arab countries participated in order to help in solving the problem.

The interest of the Arab states in the controversy increased when they achieved independence in the mid-forties, and a sharp rivalry then began among them on the conquest of "Palestine" and tying it in to their sphere of influence. The Arab leaders were not blind to the fact that "Palestine" constituted a geopolitical focus by virtue of its location between the Mediterranean and Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and Egypt. The one dominating this land region could influence—if even indirectly—events in neighboring countries. The War of 1948 presented an appropriate opportunity for the leaders of the Arab countries to concern themselves with their interests in "Palestine" or at least to prevent others from achieving exclusive gains. When that war broke out, Egypt even hesitated about becoming involved in it. The decision of Egypt to intervene in "Palestine" came when it became known that Abdallah, king of Jordan, was preparing to wage war in order to annex parts of it to his kingdom. Egypt decided to intervene in order to prevent Abdallah from donning the crown of "the courageous fighter for Palestine" in the Arab world, and to prevent him from annexing territories, or at least to provide that Egypt, too, gain a substantial slice. In the war, as is known, Abdallah dominated western Transjordan, which had been intended as a Palestinian nation, and Egyptians conquered the Gaza Strip. At the start of the fifties Nasser, the ruler of Egypt displayed ambitions to annex the Negev, in order to create a corridor to the northern Arab countries. Even in 1948, Egypt planned its aggression to accommodate this theory.

The war also served the interests of King Abdallah, who wished to enrich his desert kingdom with manpower from Judea and Samaria, and he also aspired to attain the title "Defender of the Holy Places" of Islam in Jerusalem.

The Syrians' claim to "Palestine" is known. The leaders of the Palestinian movement after World War I considered themselves Syrians, and "Palestine" was called Southern Syria (Syria Al-Janubiyyah). The first Arab executive committee assembled and was formed in Damascus. The Palestinian leaders considered themselves Syrians in the peace conference following the first World War. One of the reasons the Syrians are more extremist than others is their perception that "Palestine" is a part of their land. On 8 March 1974, Syrian President Assad said that: "Palestine is an integral part of southern Syria and we are of the opinion that our privilege and obligation are to insist that Palestine be a liberated portion of our Arab homeland and of our Syrian land." It is no wonder that in the deliberation of the representatives of the Palestinian organizations, the representative of the pro-Syrian Al Sa'iqah Organization said in 1970: "Neither the Palestinians themselves nor one of the organizations, have the authority to decide unilaterally the solution of the fate of Palestine."

In contrast to this Syrian position, the representative of the Arab Liberation Front who leans toward Iraq, said that: The liberation of "Palestine" will serve as a means of achieving overall Arab unity, and not toward the establishment of the 15th Arab state, which will only deepen the division.

At a press conference held about a year ago with President Carter, he said that as far as is known to him all of the Arab leaders with whom he met did not desire the establishment of a Palestinian state and they did not discuss it with him. Why?

Saudi Arabia--this nation is one of the most reactionary and conservative globally and in the Arab world in particular. On more than one occasion this nation has been the target of a verbal attack by the leaders of the PLO. This nation is also busy even today with an economic development plan of stupendous sums. Clearly, a situation such as this requires peace and serenity. A revolutionary Palestinian state at the head of which stand subversive leaders and experienced terrorists, who have never covered their Communist leanings, would endanger the existence of the Saudi royal regime. Recently, Crown Prince Fahd spoke of the need for a Palestinian state. But in the Arab East we must differentiate between words and deeds and the beliefs which are in the heart.

Syria--for the reasons we have outlined in the article and for the age-old desire to see the unification of the Fertile Crescent--is not interested in such a state. It wants a Palestine as an indivisible part of Syria.

Jordan--Hussein knows well, and rightly, that the cruelest enemy of him and his kingdom is the PLO. He still has not forgotten the pronouncement of George Habash: "The road to Tel Aviv leads through Amman."

Egypt--This country is prepared for any solution which will preserve its interests in the region. Arafat, the revolutionary and the pro-Russian, is not to its liking. A state in Judea and Samaria which will be under Communist and pro-Russian influence, will clash also with the national interests of Egypt.

How does it happen that everyone is talking about a Palestinian state and no one wants it, including the PLO? That is related to the character of the East in which we live.

ANALYST REAPPRAISES PLO POWER

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 29 Aug 80 p 17

[Article by Mordekhai Bar-On: "The PLO and the Strategic Balance"]

[Text] The expanded preemptive activity of the IDF in the areas seized by the terrorists north of the Litani [River] was undoubtedly necessary, justified, and singularly successful. Anyone conversant with the history of the mini-war of the IDF can hardly remain unimpressed by the level of implementation, by the scope of the strike at the enemy, and even—with all the grief--by the minimal number of casualties among our fighters. The problem posed to the IDF in its war against the terrorists is not how to liquidate once-and-for-all their capability of striking at us, but rather how to reduce this capability to a tolerable minimum.

Strategic Balance

The success and the timing of the operation requires that we examine the strategic balance of our struggle against the PLO.

From the time of its founding in 1964, the PLO has absorbed far more defeats than successes on the battlefield and in its various operations. The level of the military operations of the PLO fighters was shown, in almost all cases, to be very low. On the tactical and operational level, the IDF succeeded to a great degree in neutralizing the efforts of the terrorists. If this problem were only one of military struggle, we would be witness now to a total degeneration of the terrorist organizations and would have gained, after 16 years of struggle, a strategic victory which also would have included a political advantage.

If the goal of the terrorists is to convert life in Israel to hell and to undermine the will-power of the Israelis, there is no doubt that the IDF has chalked up a victory for itself in the strategic military balance.

Political Advantage for PLO

Although life in Israel has not become hell at all and the strikes of the terrorists have not become a decisive factor in the shaping of its domestic morale, the PLO has made spectacular gains on the political level and has become a first-rate factor, both in the Arab world and in global politics: the PLO has acquired for itself increasing sympathy in world public opinion and has strengthened its base as the recognized and undisputed spokesman for the Palestinians.

How can the gap between the military failure of the PLO and its political and psychological success be explained?

It would appear that the difficulty is pegged in our grasp of the historic quality of the PLO and of its strategic goal. We must make the analysis according to the results and not according to the proclamations, according to the actual development and not as a result of images which flow from formal definitions, from exhibitionist declarations or from literal declarations of aims.

The PLO declares about itself, and thus it is perceived worldwide, that it is an organization of guerrilla fighters. The fact that we in Israel persist in labeling the PLO as a terrorist organization, has not succeeded in changing by much its world image; very few outside of Israel label the PLO fighters with the name "terrorist" or with other pejorative labels. The expressions prevalent in the world media are "guerrilla fighters," "commando" and the like. Even within Israel, we use the label terrorist more by way of a moral judgment than by way of strategic-historic consideration. The strategy of Israel vis-a-vis the PLO really demonstrates that we see in it first and foremost an organization which poses before us a military problem.

Through all too pathetic but completely fruitless informational efforts, we persist in convincing the world that there is no Palestinian problem, or at least that the PLO does not represent this problem honestly; in effect, Israel does not have a PLO policy. All of our efforts are concentrated in defensive methods similar to the IDF operation on the Arnon Heights.

What Is Guerrilla War?

Were the PLO a guerrilla organization within the classical meaning of the word, its struggle could be summarized as total failure. Those conducting a mini-war are aware that their enemies possess a decisive advantage which is in itself military; thus they are incapable of defeating them in a direct campaign on an area or on other military objectives. They direct their efforts toward striking a single objective--the will of their enemies to continue the struggle. A guerrilla war is typical of struggles within the frame of reference of a civil war--where the will of the ruling circles can be broken, or at least the basis of their hold upon the nation can be pulled out from under them (and this, of course, is a situation irrelevant to the Israel case)--or to struggles against a foreign ruler. In this case, a vital condition for success of the struggle of guerrilla fighters is that the enemy have a realistic option to abandon continuation of the struggle. Inasmuch as a foreign conqueror always has a capital city, such a war ends in the victory of the guerrilla fighters when the foreign conqueror decides to give up his conquests and to retreat to his capital city. Converting the life of the foreign conqueror to a hell in the conquered areas, persisting in the mini-war until the community and the policymakers in the capital city are convinced that there is no prospect of ending the war in victory, and the unrelenting pounding on the morale of the conqueror, are therefore the principal objectives of guerrilla fighters. Influence upon international factors or upon the policies of other nations which are not directly involved in the dispute, are secondary objectives and their influence on results of the struggle are for the most part secondary; the essence of the struggle is joined between the conqueror and the conquered and its results are directly determined between the disputants.

An additional objective facing guerrilla fighters is the effort to recruit the support of their people and to take a position on national leadership acceptable to all, or at least to a decisive majority of their nation. The essence of the struggle against the foreign conqueror helps them to attain this objective relatively easily; however, when there are competing forces within the guerrilla movement, the problem of rivalry with the national leadership arises, as we have seen in several places in Africa in recent years (in Angola and in Mozambique, for example), but this issue mainly influences the situation which is created after the conqueror has left and not the essential results of the guerrilla war.

If we examine the struggle between Israel and the PLO in light of these classical terms, we can say with confidence that the IDF has indeed succeeded in preventing the PLO from approaching its proclaimed goal (to weaken the Israeli position, or even its will to retain the areas which it conquered in 1967). Furthermore, we may even say that the PLO has no prospect of attaining these goals, inasmuch as the fundamental factor is lacking in this struggle--Israel has no concrete option of abandoning the struggle, and even abandonment of the areas which were conquered during the Six-Day War, entails at the very worst a negotiated arrangement and not military surrender.

PLO Strategy

However, this analysis deals only with the only superficial layer of our historic struggle against the Palestinians, and though it takes into account the uniqueness of Israel's situation, it fails to account for the uniqueness of the PLO situation. The PLO, despite its proclamations, is not an ordinary case of an organization of guerrilla fighters, since the military aspect of its war is nothing but a marginal aspect.

The strategy of the PLO is not to overcome Israel's capability to maintain its position by a direct struggle. Its accomplishments are in the very area of three collateral objectives: conquest of the leadership of the Palestinian nation, recruitment and activation of the Arab world (and even the Islamic one) for an all out war against Israel, and a strike at the international position and the economic and political survival capability of Israel. The military capacity of the PLO is merely a visual accompaniment to its political and psychological capacity. This is the reason why, paradoxically, military defeats do not weaken the PLO, but rather even reinforce it. Its very position on the front of the struggle against Israel and its continued appearance in the headlines of the media in the Arab world and over the globe generally, is what affords to its advantages in the area of the three goals toward which it aspires.

This article deals with the military-political balance and not the moral-ideological balance of our struggle with the PLO, but it is appropriate, though only by indirection, to add this as well: The atrocity missions of the PLO (its actions in Bet She'an, in Ma'alot, and on the Coastal Road, and others), despite the anguish they arouse among us and among many others, are not weighed against the strategic balance of the PLO, but rather to its advantage especially. Paradoxically, such acts build the image of the PLO in the Arab world in particular, but also globally and even in the enlightened Western countries as a representative of the despairing struggle of the Palestinian nation for its liberation.

Slaughterers of children in Nahariya and Ma'alot do not appear in the consciousness of the world as criminals who pull out from under themselves every moral hold upon the justice of their struggle. They are described as "desperados" whose terrible distress pushes them even to the commission of such acts of atrocity. These atrocities are described, even more regretfully, as evidence of the strength of the political demands of the Palestinians.

Let us return to the cumulative effect of the military failure of the PLO. Were the PLO an ordinary case of a guerrilla war, their ongoing and repeated military failures would have to expose the shame of this organization before the world in general and the Palestinians in particular. 14 years of military failures would have had to convince the Palestinians and their supporters in the Arab world that the road of the PLO is a dead-end. Yet, with every additional failure the stock of the PLO rises both in the eyes of Arab public opinion as well as in the eyes of the Palestinians. 14 years after the founding of the PLO, there is not today an Arab or a Palestinian who would undermine the leadership of Yassir Arafat among the Palestinians. Further, it would appear that Arafat and his cohorts have succeeded in consolidating a broad and powerful front of Arab nations and armies who are preparing themselves and looking forward to the moment when they, and not the PLO will be able to attain the ultimate goal--the liquidation of Israel.

I have not yet had the opportunity to analyze closely the reactions worldwide to the IDF's most recent attack, yet from previous instances it can be concluded that the victory of the IDF on the Arnon Heights, with all its essentiality and importance on the level of the military struggle of Israel against the terrorist organizations, will contribute not at all to and perhaps will even take away from, our political and psychological balance of our war against the PLO. When the films of the successful strikes against the bases of the terrorists go out worldwide--even if there are statesmen and media personnel who justify the operation--the image of the PLO as the representative of the Palestinian struggle and as the power to be reckoned with in any solution that can be attained in the Middle East, will be reinforced, since even the IDF is obliged to take it into account and to mobilize against it by such a broad and daring operation.

We must therefore remember, even when the defense requirement obligates us to conduct operations such as this, that their influence ranges merely over the most superficial level of our struggle against the PLO, and that they do not solve by any means or manner, the deeper problems of this struggle. If we fail to search for new ways to measure up against the cumulative effect of the PLO position in the Arab world and globally, we are destined to be likened to one who treats pneumonia with cough tablets.

INTERNAL STRUGGLE WRACKS HERUT

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 22 Aug 80 p 7

[Article by 'Adit Zartal: "Herut Returns to Its Natural Place"]

[Text] If there are special suits for those who sit on the benches of the opposition, they are already being made or pulled out of mothballs in Herut. One of the key activists of the movement told me this week that Herut is returning to its natural place after a period of glory. For the purposes of public relations and election propaganda, there are those who are flexing their muscles and guaranteeing that in the time remaining until the elections, the situation will be reversed and the public will come to know what a wonderful government it has had in recent years. Some, primarily those whose seats in the coming Knesset are assured, are already regarding the political arena with a bit of despair and self-irony as if there is no force in the world able to save this government and this coalition from themselves. There are others, however, who are endeavoring to guarantee themselves and their movement a soft landing on the day after the elections and are speaking about a government of national unity. Moshe Arens, a certified major hawk (he voted against the Camp David agreements) recently stated in an interview to Galei Tzahal [the IDF radio station] that it is a national obligation to establish a government of national unity and that in sum the political differences between the Likud and the Alignment are not as great as they seem. If the Alignment is ready to return 80 percent of the West Bank, so he said, the Likud is prepared to return 50 percent. He said this, and the ground under him did not open up and swallow him. MK Hayim Kaufman, the chairman of the Herut faction in the Knesset, also favors the establishment of a government of national unity. "The next government," he says, "whatever government it is, will fall in 2 years when it will be necessary to give up territories and to withstand unprecedented pressures. Only a government of national unity will be able to endure this."

The awareness or the feeling that the days of the administration are ending and that the opposition always remains has changed Herut into an arena of clashes in the style of "grab what you can." There are two main struggles in the movement--the old struggle for seats, that is to say for a seat in the Knesset, which has now taken on dimensions of urgency and near-violence, and the struggle over the inheritance from Begin, that is to say over the leadership. These two struggles are intertwined and feed each other.

Three years of government have done something to Herut and its people. It has given them, for the first time in their political lives, the taste of power, influence and action. It has elevated many people, some of whom were virtual unknowns, to the governmental level and has made them personalities, as it were, and has raised the level of their political aspirations. Since the return to the benches of the opposition will again reduce the system of political reciprocity to the seats in the Knesset, the atmosphere around the list for the coming Knesset is oppressive and full of suspicions. There are new candidates, whom the administration has elevated and made national personalities, such as the Israeli ambassador to Egypt, Eliyahu Ben-Elissar; Cabinet Secretary Arye Na'or; or the Director-general of the Office of the Prime Minister Matti Shmuelevitz. There is also pressure from below, that of the young activists or the middle-aged generation in the leadership and in the secretariat of the movement, and from the local leadership which has arisen and built up strength in small towns and development towns. While the list of candidates has greatly increased, the list will be reduced according to all the forecasts. Someone told me that there is no one in the Herut who is ready to sign the 16th place (in the event that Herut joins with the Liberals). There are also those who fear that the prime minister, in order to preserve the all-Likud course, will impose concessions on Herut for the sake of the other partners in the Likud. The struggle for these few places promises to be so intensive that only a few really consider themselves safe in the coming list. A key member of Knesset, who has important positions both in the movement and in the Knesset faction, told me that after the first six positions, everything will be open. He, himself, is not at all certain of his reelection.

I requested those with whom I talked, all of whom have key positions in the movement, to draw up their list for me. All agreed on the top five of Menahem Begin, Yitzhaq Shamir, David Levi, Arik Sharon and Yoram Aridor. Several added Moshe Arens as safe in the sixth position. After these, in varying sequences, came the almost-certain including Hayim Corfu, Dov Shilanski, Roni Milo, Moshe Katzav, Hayim Kaufman and Yigal Cohen-Orgad. Even Mordekhai Zippori, Deputy Minister of Defense, did not manage to assure himself a safe seat in the next Knesset. Although in recent weeks, he managed to collect the signatures of 150 members of the central committee (the central committee of the Herut has more than 1000 members) who called for his appointment as minister of defense, they say that in the struggle for seats, he is likely to be rejected because he does not have a clear and definitive group of supporters and because his main support, Ezer Weizman, has proven to be a broken reed, at least in the current situation. The places of members of Knesset such as Mikhael Deqel, Yosef Rom, Eitan Livni, David Stern or Nasser al-Din are even less safe. In contrast to those who will be rejected there are those who are seeking to be drawn inside. At the head of this list are those with government positions whom I have already mentioned and also the chief of the Information Branch of Herut, Gideon Gadot, who apparently holds many promises from those who are considered in Herut as the recipients of large votes; David Magen, the head of the Qiryat Gat Council, who has gained a reputation as a rising local leader; Me'ir Shitrit, the head of the Yavneh local council; Tzvi Tzilqer from Ashdod; Hananya Gibstein from Rishon Leziyyon; Ovadya Ali from Afula; and Mikha Reiser, chief of the Organization Branch, a branch which is traditionally an almost-certain springboard to the Knesset (Yitzhaq Shamir and Mikhael Deqel previously served in this position).

Weizman--A Soccer Player in Quarantine

Ezer Weizman's name was missing in all the lists of candidates which I received and in every case was placed on the side. No one believes that with Begin at the head of the list Ezer Weizman will return "home." There are those who are not sorry about this, primarily those who are among the supporters of Yitzhaq Shamir as a possible heir of the prime minister and are also doing everything they can to increase the obstacles confronting Weizman. There are those who are trying secretly and without leaving a trace to preserve as best they can the very thin and fragile ties which nonetheless exist between Weizman and Herut. The more prominent in this area are Weizman's opponents, not his supporters, who have "entered the shelters" according to their man in Caesarea. Moreover, whoever has identified with the Weizman option has recently found himself a target for attack and even purge attempts. This is how many understand the attempt to purge the chairman of the Herut faction in the Knesset, Hayim Kaufman, and to replace him with Dov Shilanski, as part of a greater power struggle between the Shamir people and the Weizman people. In this pattern, claim those who are identified with Weizman, can be included also the recurrent talk about David Levi's loss of strength in the movement, the notices in the press, after the elections in the Metalworkers Union, which blame Yoram Aridor for the defeat, the attempt to involve Mikha Reiser, the chief of the Organization Branch, in the incident involving forgeries in the party's card file, and the struggle between Mikhael Deqel (the Shamir camp) and Me'ir Cohen (a supporter of David Levi) for the vacancy in the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee with the departure of Akiva Nof. Deqel defeated Cohen in the vote, and the Shamir camp (in the activities of which, incidentally, Shamir does not participate at all, at least overtly) vociferously claimed that the hawkish line in the Herut movement has defeated the dovish line, which is now used to signify anyone who seeks to leave the doors open for Weizman.

The irony is that the key person in several of the recent power struggles, some say conspiracies, which the Shamir people have conducted with the other camp is Eitan Livni, who was the operations officer of Irgun Tzvai Le'umi and who does not exactly squander love for Yitzhaq Shamir (the operations officer of the Lohamei Herut Yisrael). They say in Herut that Livni aspires to Aridor's position as chairman of the secretariat, for which he struggled unsuccessfully during the past year, and to again be one of the strong men in the movement. He is credited with erasing the enormous debts of the Tel Hai Fund and, of course, its underground past. However, for the sake of his "grand plan," the seizure of the secretariat and the domination of the extreme hawkish line, he was prepared to enter into alliances which until a short while ago seemed unacceptable. He supported Mikhael Deqel (a Shamir man) against Me'ir Cohen in exchange for his friend Dov Shilanski's taking the place of Hayim Kaufman, known as an adversary of Livni, as chairman of the Herut faction. The next stage in the plot was said to be the removal of Mikha Reiser from his position as chief of the Organization Branch in anticipation of the removal of Aridor as head of the secretariat. This plan has so far not been very successful, and there are those who maintain that it has even damaged his prospects for holding what he already has.

Beyond these unaesthetic personality conflicts emerges the larger struggle over the future image of the Herut movement, both in terms of the composition of the leadership and its ideology. This struggle over the inheritance is between two camps. One camp supports Yitzhaq Shamir as the heir of Begin and is more solid and active at this time while the other camp, the centrist one, claims that now is not the time to be involved in naming an heir (with the intention of leaving the door open for Weizman), a camp which is not actually active and even whose lines of demarcation are not sufficiently clear.

It is not easy today to be an open supporter of Weizman, the man who insulted the leader and who came out against his leadership and even to a certain extent against the ideology he personifies. In a movement which is very closely supervised by the leader, despite the democratic "moves" which he makes, it is better not to stand openly alongside one who has removed himself from the at times imposed consensus around the leader. Individuals, not from the first ranks, have openly declared their support for Weizman. Others are saying behind closed doors that Ezer Weizman is Herut's electoral life-saving board and that under no circumstances should he be permitted to leave the movement. Someone compared Weizman to a soccer star who has submitted a quarantine form. Should he be ejected and pushed to the arms of another competitor team or should an attempt be made to talk things over with him and reach a common understanding, his silent supporters ask.

This indeterminate camp of phantoms of those who want to see Weizman return includes David Levi (who recently had a telephone conversation with Weizman), Hayim Corfu, Hayim Kaufman ("It is unheard of that Rabin and Peres can appear on one list and not Begin and Weizman"), Mordekhai Zippori, Moshe Katzav, Me'ir Cohen, and also, it is said, Yoram Aridor, even though he himself denies any affiliation with any camp. There people are very cautious in their comments and their actions. They are not among those who are making pilgrimages to Weizman's new home in Caesarea. They try not to initiate conversations with him and not to be seen in his company or in the company of his friends and emissaries. The movement for Weizman in Herut has gone underground. Nevertheless, five members of the secretariat maintain rather frequent contact with Weizman. The same applies to heads of branches. This will continue until the screening out of those who are described as Weizman people begins. Not much is needed, someone told me. All it takes is for Kadishai to say one word of criticism and opposition, either in or not in Begin's name, in order for the target of the criticism to be frozen out.

Weizman also does not make it easy for his supporters. He does not make his intentions clear, does not consolidate an open force for war within or outside of Herut, and is very cautious about promising anything to anyone. It now seems that among all the options open to him he will choose the easier one in waiting for another factor which will tip the scales in his favor, be it those pressures on Begin within the Likud to work for his return or be it the state of Begin's health which would open the way for his return. In any event, waiting outside in Caesarea is much easier than waiting inside, within the movement.

Weizman's opponents do not consider him to have much influence, and they do not consider him a danger. One member of the secretariat told me that the furor around Weizman's electoral abilities was exaggerated and that the Likud's great victory in the last election did not result in more than two seats. In the previous election, the Likud's component elements received 39 seats whereas in the 1977 election, "with Weizman as the chief of staff, with Zhorbin on the right and Leah Rabin (and her bank account) and Asher Yadlin on the left, the Likud received no more than 41 seats. It was only afterward with all the joinings that we increased to 45, so where is the landslide victory?" Someone told me that there are three people who can win an election in Israel, and they are Menahem Begin, Zubin Mehta and Isaac Stern.

Also, no one believes that when Ezer Weizman decides to leave Herut, he will take a healthy bite out of it for the entity which he will head. "Ezer," they say, "hoped to bring down the government with his departure from the Ministry of Defense and he did not succeed. He hoped to shake the movement and it remained whole."

In contrast, the camp which supports Yitzhaq Shamir as Begin's heir is clearer and more unequivocal. His supporters--Roni Milo, Mikhael Deqel, David Stern, Dov Shilanski and to a certain extent also Moshe Arens (although, it is said, that he reserves the right to compete for the leadership after Begin), Yosef Rom and Eitan Livni, despite his long-term rivalry--are speaking and working openly. Mikhael Deqel even attempted to arrange open conferences in the branches for Shamir under the banner of "ideological conferences," however, he was censured for this in the secretariat.

Songs Behind the Scenes

Yitzhaq Shamir's strong status in the movement and the unanimous recognition of his personal qualities and ability make it very easy for his supporters. Begin also considers him, as it were, his heir, however, the Shamir people claim that it is precisely Begin's position and lack of action in this matter that are playing into the hands of Ezer Weizman. They recognize that Shamir is not an outstanding vote getter, but they claim that if he were given the opportunity to serve now as prime minister and mature in the position for the remaining year to build himself as a national leader in the public consciousness, he could head the Likud's list in the next elections and even win. Such a process is possible, of course, only if Begin were to announce today his early departure for health reasons (and for no other reason) and gracefully vacate the top position to his natural heir. Those who maintain this point primarily to the state of the prime minister's health. They are concerned that in anticipation of the elections it will become evident that the prime minister is unable to endure the burden of an arduous election campaign and will be forced to drop out. Only then it will be too late to run Yitzhaq Shamir for prime minister, and the top position will fall uncontested into the hands of the big vote getter, Ezer Weizman.

These comments, made repeatedly without attribution in the corridors of Herut, attest to the very sensitive status of the prime minister in his movement. Although he is the leader and no one dares to stand up and advise him out of friendship to depart honorably, and whoever would criticize him openly would be ejected immediately from the tribe, the songs are different behind the scenes. More and more people in Herut believe that Begin is a failure as prime minister and that there is no longer any prospect for saving this government in its current composition. "He is a great leader," someone told me, "but of the opposition. As a prime minister and team chief he has failed all along the way." Other vibrations on frequencies which are still not being received well also attest to an erosion of his strength. Although members of the Likud leadership were encouraged and jubilant when they left the last meeting during which Begin declared that he would visit every settlement in Israel during the election campaign and that he would be chief of staff for the elections, it is mentioned with bitter humor in internal conversations that the victory in the last election was achieved while Begin was lying in a private room in the intensive care ward in Ikholov [Hospital]. Someone told me that in anticipation of Begin's birthday which was intended to be, as it were, an intimate event for family only, members of Knesset and key people in the movement received telephone calls to be present. I have also heard denials of this, but the story itself attests to the major fading process.

However, the real battle which Herut is conducting today, say those who are trying to eliminate the internal disputes and rivalries, is the one for the masses of its members and sympathizers, those who have been disappointed by the policies of the government and the conduct of its ministers and who are not sufficiently aware of the government's achievements. "If members of the movement become active again, we will stay in power," says Gideon Gadot, the chief of the Information Branch. "Herut members have expressed their dissatisfaction," he maintains, "in the municipal elections and in the trade union elections. They simply did not vote. We know this because we followed the vote closely. If we can reactivate them and gain their support, we have nothing to worry about," he states. It is difficult to know if he believes what he says or if this is part of his job as the one who is in charge of information and the one who will apparently lead the information staff of the entire Likud for the elections.

POLL SHOWS NO DROP IN PERES LABOR LEAD

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 8 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Amnon Denkner: "Nothing New in Labor: 65:35 in Favor of Peres Camp"]

[Text] There is nothing new at all in Labor. It is becoming gradually clear that both camps comprising it, with the accompanying incessant friction, are within clear numerical frames. Every controversial question requiring the decision of the Party Central, is being and will be decided, apparently, in favor of the camp of the supporters of the chairman of the party, Mr Shimon Peres, who dominates about 65 percent of the members of the Central, as opposed to a minority of 35 percent who make up what used to be the "Allon Camp" and now is the "Rabin Camp."

This is the outcome of considerably stormy afternoons at Arlozorov House in Tel Aviv, and was expressed with a good deal of bitterness by the one who had apparently won the victory, but in effect was not able to brag about it to the professional oddsmakers of the Party: Yeruham Meshel, the veteran secretary-general of the Histadrut, while selected as the Party's candidate to continue to serve in the position which he holds in the second session, yet his great personal expectations were smashed against the immovable wall which separates the camps.

Evidently Mr Meshel had good reason to believe that he would score a conspicuous personal gain: while the Rabin Camp took a position against his selection, it nevertheless stressed that it was taking that position not because of personal opposition to Meshel, but rather on an issue of principle: the existing Party Central which, in a couple of months, will end its term, is not the one that should be choosing candidates for the next session, but rather the Party Central that will be chosen subsequent to the December convention. The Meshel people were aware that even within the hard core of the Rabin Camp--the Kibbutz Ham'e'uhad--there were those who expressed a desire to vote in favor of Meshel. Even the fact that he had not a single opponent appeared to support his efforts to garner a sizable majority. Add to that the political wisdom which said that against a hostile Likud government the secretary-general would need an overwhelming expression of confidence, to strengthen his hand in his economic battles, and you can see the rosy hopes of the Meshel faithful, who looked forward during the secret ballot process to a majority of about 75 percent.

What was left for the secretary-general after the vote was to choose between two alternative explanations: was it his unstimulating image that became a stumbling block for him, or was it, perhaps, the Histadrut steam-roller which was activated at week's end on the members of the Central, that failed to break the rigidity of the camp division.

Adari Versus Nehemias

The second vote, which delineated the boundaries, was on the function of the chairman of the elections committee of the party. The choice of the Peres camp was Mr Rafi Adari, the general manager of Workers' Housing, and the Rabin Camp offered Mr Aharon Nehemias, mayor of the municipality of Safed. The sponsor of Nehemias before members of the Central was a man who in the past has been among the leading behind-the-scenes operators of the party, Mr David Calderon. He proved once again that people who have blossomed behind the scenes are better remaining there and not exposing themselves to a microphone, a camera and an audience. In a long and tiresome discourse which detailed insignificant milestones in the life of his candidate, Calderon succeeded in arousing impatience and derision among members of the Central Committee. Even his remark that the fact that Mr Nehemias is of Moroccan origin should not be used against him, did not sit well particularly. The crowd whistled and roared in rage and Mr Abba Eban pondered aloud whether it would not be worthwhile for the Peres people to arrange, at the next Central Committee meeting, for Mr Rabin to be introduced to the members by that very Mr Calderon.

Mr Adari was presented by the General Manager of Koor, Mr Nafhthali Blumenthal, who did a far better and shorter job, but even that had no great influence on the results of the vote, which again stood at around the fixed percentages.

Rabin-Peres Clash

As always, it was interesting to note how Mr Rabin and Mr Peres once again clashed on the podium of the Central Committee. Mr Rabin called upon Mr Meshel to waive the vote, and postpone it for the Central Committee following the convention. As soon as he left the podium, Mr Peres sharply attacked his remarks, the substance of Peres' remarks being that the decision should be taken immediately and decisions should be honored. This was more than a simple hint of the previous decision of that very Central Committee, on the matter of the candidacy of Mr Peres himself for the position of prime minister. However, Mr Peres added, that if the Central Committee were to vote for Yitzhak Rabin as its candidate for the prime ministry, he, Peres, would avoid challenging that. People of the Rabin camp, who well remember that Mr Peres did that very thing in the past, began screaming foul, and even the Peres people did not understand precisely what their leader was saying. "He certainly meant something," one of them said to me. "Tomorrow morning he'll explain it to me. Maybe then I'll understand it."

Stammering Speech

Against the background of a ceremonious but stammering acceptance speech by Mr Meshel, the camps made their calculations. Everyone attempted to appear satisfied with the results, it was pleasant for the Peres people to stress the large majority, the Rabin people to stress the firm base for continuing the struggle, but both camps today are cocking hopeful eyes toward the large camp of almost 100,000 new registrants in Labor, who are the ones who will determine a good deal in the true and perhaps final battle: the battle over the composition of the Labor Party convention, next December.

HISTADRUT SCORES GOVERNMENT ON HOUSING

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 7 Sep 80 p 14

[Article by Yosef Golan, DAVAR Correspondent: "Histadrut Alleges: Severe Housing Shortage Threatens Social Stability"]

[Text] The severe and continuing shortage of housing and its high price, which is beyond the reach of those eligible for it, constitute a threat to social stability in the country and are a cause of resentment which has already brought about a number of undesirable outcomes--it was stated in the sharp proposals for a resolution which were formulated to wrap up today's deliberation in the executive committee of the Histadrut on the issue of the housing crisis.

Shmuel Bahat, a member of the coordinating committee who will initiate the debate today, will accuse the Housing Ministry of extreme negligence in this area.

The Likud people may raise a storm because of the failure to invite Housing Minister David Levi to initiate the debate on the housing issue. Members of the Likud faction allege that by failing to invite David Levi, the majority is revealing that its intention is actually "for a political and not a substantive discussion."

Last night the Likud people were in contact with the Housing minister and proposed that he appear at the meeting in his capacity of associate member of the executive committee, to hear the opening remarks of the chairman of the housing committee, the member of the coordinating committee, Shmuel Bahat, and subsequently to be the first speaker on behalf of the Likud. According to sources in the Likud, David Levi "has not yet made a final decision on how to go about this." A precedent had been set for this tactic already when David Levi and Yoram Aridor appeared together as associate members of the executive committee, and David Levi even brought with him a group of protestors who were residents of his municipality Bet-She'an.

In the proposed resolution which will be offered today to the executive committee, it is further stated that the continuing housing shortage has a negative and dangerous influence on the integration to society of those demobilized from the IDF as well as upon the immigration to Israel and the absorption of immigrants. "The executive committee cautions," it is stated in the proposals for the resolution, "that instead of coming to grips with the problem itself, the Housing Ministry has misled the public through dissemination of misleading data both with regard to the extent of housing starts in actuality as well as with regard to the number of eligibles who have been unable to exercise their eligibility." In order to close the gap that has been created by the scope of residential construction, the executive committee demands that the government initiate building starts within the range of 45,000 to 50,000 dwellings annually," the proposals for the resolution state.

Coordinating Committee Demands Creation of Employment Sources

The coordination committee of the Histradut at the end of the week accepted at its meeting the proposal of the secretary-general of the Histadrut, Yeruham Meshel, to demand that the government forthwith create employment sources for workers who have been laid off. Likewise, the Treasury has been called upon to permit the National Insurance Institute limited use of funds which have been collected by it, and which belong to it, including monies of the Unemployment Insurance Fund, which are monies that are transferred to the National Insurance from wage withholdings of workers and employers.

Meshel stressed that emphasis should be placed upon creation of sources of employment, either through transfer of production lines in depressed enterprises, or through the establishment of new enterprises. Meshel noted that payment of unemployment benefits is merely a partial stopgap, as insurance during a time of crisis, but that it will not solve the problem of the worker who has been laid off and who is interested in continuing to work. Likewise, the secretary-general warned against withholding unemployment payments from workers who complete courses in occupational training, but for whom work has not been found.

SHELI: Weak Classes Hit Again

The chairman of the SHELI faction in the Histadrut, Ron Cohen, reported on Friday that he has received information which is still being held secret, according to which the training grants for students in the lowest tenth percentile in the population have been cancelled.

In consequence of this information, Ron Cohen on Friday applied to the minister of labor and welfare and to the minister of education to act to restore the grant. According to his argument, "cancellation of this grant is an additional link in the chain of assaults upon the weak classes, and it is up to me to demand that the assaulter not economize on the backs of these classes." Ron Cohen asserts that training of a student for the current school year costs about 6,500 Israel pounds. The chairman of the SHELI faction proposes that monies from the tuition fee which are presently frozen in the National Insurance Institute, be allocated for this purpose, and in that way will be returned to their original purpose.

MAJOR INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT NOTED

[Article: "Unemployment Increases From 1200 to 12,000"]

[Text] "The increase in the number of unemployed from 1200 prior to November 1979--the date of the change of government policy on subsidies, employment and credit--to 12,500 in July provides clear evidence of the worsening of the employment situation," said the chairman of the Trade Union Branch in the Histadrut, Yisrael Kaysar, at the plenary session of the branch which was convened yesterday with the participation of the director-general of the Employment Service, Barukh Haqla'i.

Kaysar demanded that the unemployed be given suitable work in accordance with the law and not be required to take any work offered. According to him, the Employment Service must solve the unemployment problem by means of the vocational rotation and movement of workers. He demanded that the government enact a minimum wage law.

The chariman of the Employment Staff of the Histadrut, Aharon Harel, demanded that the government and the Employment Service create commutative employment for the unemployed. He called for the cancellation of an order for 200 ambulances in the United States and their production in automotive enterprises in Nazerat 'Illit which will prevent the laying off of workers and the payment of foreign currency.

Haqla'i: 3500 Laid Off

The director-general of the Employment Service, B. Haqla'i, said that since 19 November businesses have announced their intention to lay off 8200 workers, however, by the end of June 1980, 3500 had been laid off. In addition, many workers have been given early retirement, and the scope of employment in a series of businesses has been reduced. This process resulted in the fact that while in July 1979 there were 22,720 people seeking work, in July 1980 the number rose to 36,750.

Barukh Haqla'i also pointed out that public administration has also been recently closed to workers, a fact which primarily has an adverse effect on academics.

Nevertheless, he said, there are today about 17,000 vacancies in textile and food enterprises. These involve shift work and beginning wage levels; therefore, not many people are interested in them.

NEW DIRECTIVE WITHHOLDS UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Tel Aviv 'AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 8 Sep 80 p 8

[Article: "12 Thousand Job Seekers in the Development Towns]

[Text] 12,045 job seekers registered in the development towns among which are 7,338 men and 4,707 women. Among the job seekers there were 99 skilled building trade workers, 887 in manufacturing, 701 from transportation, 784 in clerical, 340 in the liberal professions, and 9,075 unskilled job seekers as has been made public in a recently completed report on the employment situation in the 29 development towns.

During the same time period the employment offices in the development towns received 5,598 requests for workers, which included 1,475 requests for skilled workers, and 4,123 requests for unskilled workers. 615 of the requests were not filled for lack of appropriate workers and this included 332 requests for unskilled workers. 5,224 of the job seekers were directed to jobs. 4,750 job seekers were unemployed 6 days or more during that month.

Large Development Towns

7,096 of the 12,045 job seekers and 3,164 of the 4,750 unemployed for 6 days or more, are counted within the 7 large development towns, which include Tiberias, with 710 job seekers and 499 unemployed; Nazareth-Alit 602 job seekers and 358 unemployed, Afula 815 and 465; Acre 717 and 237, Nahariya 577 job seekers and 195 unemployed, Ashdod 1,073 and 278; and Ashkelon 946 and 392.

Job Refusal Notation

Directives to note "Refusal to Work" which makes unskilled job seekers who refuse to report to available jobs, ineligible to be certified for unemployment benefits, were sent to the employment offices throughout the country--as was reported by the director-general of the Employment Service at a meeting of the placement subcommittee of the Employment Service Council which took place last week in Jerusalem.

Haklay reported, that despite the increase in the number of job seekers and in the number of unemployed, the Employment Service encountered difficulties in directing skilled and unskilled workers to manufacturing, to hotel services, to construction and to agriculture. There are difficulties in directing workers to the grape harvest in Samaria. The employment offices are compelled to transmit new applications for workers from the Territories. The number of recipients of certificates for unemployment benefits increased also among the unskilled who refuse to report to available jobs.

RESEARCH EMPLOYMENT PROPOSED FOR ACADEMICS

[Article: "IL690 Million Will Permit the Employment of 500 Additional Academics in Research and Development for Export"]

[Text] An allocation of IL690 million will permit the employment of an additional 500 academics in about 100 research and development programs for export commodities. This was announced by Minister of Industry, Commerce and Tourism Gideon Patt upon completion of the first part of a program for encouraging exports and changing the employment structure in the economy.

The program, which was prepared by Mr Avraham Ashri, the deputy director general of the Ministry of Industry, Commerce and Tourism, and approved by the minister, notes that the ministry now has proven research and development programs, the implementation of which has been delayed because of the lack of funds. Moreover, all the requisite administrative instruments for the immediate implementation of the aforementioned programs also exist.

The ministry states that even with the authorization of the programs, there will be a need to establish a condition that the academics who will be employed will be supplementary employees and not permanent employees in the projects.

Emphasis on Research and Development

In a discussion of the essential elements of the program held in the ministry, Minister Patt pointed out that special emphasis must now be placed on industrial research and development since Israel can now compete in the world market only if the original know-how component in the commodity will be relatively higher than the cost of its production.

Those who submitted the program point out that in 1979 about 2,850 academics were employed in industrial research and development, including about 80 research and development programs at an overall cost of IL1.860 billion, of which about IL970 million was funded with the help of grants.

The average overall cost of an academic researcher, including use of equipment, materials and employment of assistants in an industrial project in 1979 was about IL1.4 million while in 1980 it was estimated at IL2.8 million.

One Hundred Programs

On the basis of the requests already in the ministry, it is clear that for about 100 justified and proven research projects there will be no solution and it will not be possible to authorize them under current budget limitations. For these 100 programs to be authorized an additional allocation of IL550 million is required for the fund for industrial research which will provide an impetus for the employment of 400 academics and about 325 other workers. A supplementary allocation of IL140 million for preindustrial research, which would employ about 100 additional academics, would be a solution for the employment of 500 academics and would likely provide impetus for development and the promotion of exports resulting from Israeli research and development.

The entire program will be submitted today to an interministry team for the encouragement of exports and the change of the employment structure in the economy.

Minister Patt also pointed out that Israeli exports resulting from original research and development, which amounted to 150 million dollars in 1979 is steadily increasing, and the application of this program will bring us at the end of the decade to the export of 3 billion dollars of research and development commodities.

MINISTER DEPLORES DEFICIT IN RAINFALL, EFFECT ON CROPS

Nouakchott CHAAB in French 6-7 Sep 80 p 3

[Interview with Mohamed Ould Amar, Mauritanian minister of rural development, by Radio Mauritania; Nouakchott; date not given]

> [Text] Mohamed Ould Amar, minister of rural development, recently granted an interview to our colleagues from Radio Mauritania in which he deplored the delay in the rainy season this year and its dangerous consequences on the life of the rural sector.
>
> By way of example, the minister said that the towns of Nema and Kiffa witnessed in the entire month of July 1980 only 33 and 21 percent, respectively, of their normal rainfall for that month.
>
> Asked to survey the situation of the livestock-raising projects in the country's southern and southwestern zones, the minister said that they are either on the point of or at an advanced stage of execution.
> Mohamed Ould Amar also mentioned among other questions the constraint which the landholding system exerts on the development of agriculture in Mauritania and asserted the government's determination to find a just and equitable solution to this thorny question.

Question: The rainy season was late this year. Can its scope be determined already at this stage and what are the consequences of this delay on the rural sector?

Answer: The rainy season was indeed late this year, which has had among other negative consequences the extension of a particularly difficult preharvest food shortage for the herd. By way of example, the towns of Nema and Kiffa, to mention only these, witnessed in the entire month of July 1980 only 33 and 21 percent, respectively, of their normal rainfall for that month. Even though it is still premature to evaluate the results of this rainy season, it is already possible to draw the following conclusions:

1. The rainy season will be relatively short and some types of vegetables, especially the fodder crops, will not have time to complete their growing cycles before the October hot weather (harmattan wind).

2. The rainfall is unevenly distributed and some very important regions from the agricultural-pastoral viewpoint have so far seen a dangerous deficit. Involved are the two Hodhs and Assaba and Trarza.

It is however appropriate to note that the river's flood waters had risen fairly early, which enables us to hope for good crops in the Oualo region.

Question: Mauritanian agriculture has witnessed difficulties owing to a shortage of rainfall. Mr minister, are you optimistic for the year under way?

Answer: The shortage of rainfall is indeed one of the major constraints of our country's agriculture and particularly of traditional agriculture. It is still too early, as I said before, to make projections regarding the results of this year's agricultural season. In general, such a projection can be made only in October or November, that is, when the maximum amount of information is available on the rainfall, its volume, and its distribution in time and space. Too, as you certainly know already, it is not only rainfall which determines the results of such an agricultural season. There are also the behavior of the crop pests and our capability to contain their attacks. Wait, then, for a month longer, perhaps even for 1-1/2 months, so that I may be able to tell you with less risk of error what this agricultural season will be like.

Already now and as I mentioned earlier, the Oualo region and the low-lying areas can represent sources of hope for us for the 1980-81 agricultural season.

Question: What is the situation regarding the laying out of livestock-raising projects in the southern and southwestern zones?

Answer: Three livestock-raising projects are in the process of initiation or at an advanced stage of execution.

Involved are the pastureland improvement project (with Dutch funding) whose operation zone is in Assaba, the Tagant region, and southeastern Brakna; projects in the southeast and southwest (financed respectively by the EDF [European Development Fund] and the World Bank which will be involved in the two Hodhs and Assaba for the former, and in the regions of Trarza, Brakna, and Gorgol for the latter). The sum total of these projects strives to improve the pastoral hydraulic infrastructure (to increase the use of some pastureland through the creation of water points to enhance sanitary facilities and to teach the livestock-raisers improved techniques of herd and pasture management. The latter is all the more fundamental as it is necessary to observe a balance among our pastureland resources. We have so far resorted to temporary makeshifts which have limits since they are not completely dependent on us. What is involved is movement of herds outside our borders and the distribution of concentrated fodder.

Question: Land ownership represents a handicap for the state's facilities, notably in the Gorgol region. Has a solution been found to this thorny problem?

Answer: The system of land ownership is a handicap to a large extent and, as I explained at the latest seminar for cadres, the development of agriculture as well. I nevertheless wish to clarify an ambiguity. This constraint is exerted principally on the major public hydroagricultural projects. It can still be overcome in the area of traditional agriculture. Consequently, in my opinion there are no farmers who, as some pointed out at the seminar, have the resolve to produce and enjoy rainfall, climatic, and ecological conditions favorable for production but are prevented from doing so by the nature of land ownership. Furthermore, when they exist, the contradictions are less among social classes--as is the case elsewhere--than among tribes or groups of tribes.

What I have just said in no way strives to minimize the problems which arise but rather to specify their nature. The search for a solution to this problem of land ownership will have to strive to preserve the fundamental rights of individuals as well as groups of individuals concerned and to liberate the modernizing effort of the state.

While striving to solve the immediate problems arising in the Gorgol region or elsewhere, this solution will have to broach the problem overall, that is, in all its relative aspects both regarding cultivated or cultivable land and concerning pastureland and pasture rights. Efforts are under way. But the problems being as complex as you know, the endeavor could only be prudent and extended.

It is necessary to find just solutions which are equitable to everyone. The government will not allow itself to be diverted from this approach because of pressure.

Question: Mr minister, what is the state of the national agricultural development fund?

Answer: There is nothing called an agricultural development fund but there is a national development fund, period. The decree creating and regulating this fund is in the process of being promulgated. This institution whose takeoff capacity will be 400 million ouguiya anticipates three specialized funds (for agriculture, fishing, and industry), which funds could in the more or less long term split off as autonomous entities. For the time being the national directorate is striving to build up the necessary funds for the institution and to define its operating rules.

Question: The head of state launched an appeal this year that everyone contribute to the success of the 1980 agricultural season. What are the measures taken by your department to achieve that goal?

Answer: I specify that the appeal of the head of state does not relate exclusively to the government services but also to all the active forces of the country.

As regards measures taken by the department in this context, they involve the acquisition and distribution of market garden equipment, the initiation of a vegetable and especially crop protection campaign, and the strengthening of the means of assistance of the livestock-raising department to insure appropriate sanitary services for the herd.

Too, my department continues to be at the disposal of collectivities that may express their intention to lay out new land or boost water storage possibilities in the villages and the fields.

Question: Mr minister, is there a message that you wish us to convey to our farmers?

Answer: My appeal will limit itself to reminding you of what the chairman of the CMSN [Military Committee for National Safety], the head of state and of the government, said when he urged our people to win the battle of agricultural production and particularly of food crops to protect what is our natural patrimony and to help our natural resources regenerate themselves.

Witness for Prosecution's Statement

Casablanca LIBERATION in French 19 Sep 80 p 9

[Text] Text of statement made by a witness for the prosecution [partie civile] in the case heard on 15 September 1980:

The political assassination of which the late Aomar Bendjelloun [as published] was the victim and whose particular seriousness cannot escape anyone was committed with the specific purpsoe of silencing one of the eminent defenders of the democratic and socialist causes in the Third World.

Executed in Morocco by paid killers, he was liquidated by those who have an interest in keeping our country from ever inaugurating the democratic process for which the deceased Aomar Bendjelloun had always fought and for which he suffered so much. On several occasions he had escaped death, in particular at the beginning of 1973 when an effort was made to assassinate him by means of a booby-trapped package.

The truth about the assassination on 18 December 1975 which we are called upon to judge could have been brought to light if those charged by their duties and responsibilities--political and judicial authorities--with revealing this truth had operated to this end. But these authorities have constantly acted just the opposite.

On the one hand, in fact, the responsible government authorities did not make known to the judicial apparatus the information they possessed; worse yet, they did nothing to ensure the court appearance of two essential defendants, although one of them, Abdelaziz Naamani, was arrested 3 years ago, and the other, Abdelkrim Moutii has taken refuge in a "brother country" (the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia) and the Moroccan Government has refrained from requesting his extradition. Similarly, these authorities have not taken the action necessary to assure that papers which have disappeared from the dossier and which--according to police conclusions--contain serious charges against high personalities and foreign organizations are replaced in the file or that at least copies of these papers are introduced into the court proceedings.

As for the judicial hearings, they have in turn prevented the truth from coming out, either passively or actively.

Passively: when the judicial police stopped their investigations of those responsible for the crime at a lower level and when the various examining magistrates who succeeded one another in this case limited themselves to the admission of the defendants' denials as if the judges were dealing with mere witnesses.

Actively: when the judicial apparatus refused to have an inquiry made into the disappearance of essential papers from the dossier; when it refused to order that defendants Naamani and Moutii be referred to the judical apparatus; when it refused to order the judicial police to present to it at least copies of the papers which had disappeared from the file; when the judicial apparatus refused to hear as witnesses persons whom the witness for the prosecution had requested be heard, either within the framework of supplementary information or at the bench of the criminal court, such hearing being of a nature to bring to light at a minimum certain truths about this case.

Under these circumstances, the trial which we have been requested to attend can be nothing more than a judicial masquerade, an insult to authentic justice and to the memory of the late Aomar Bendjelloun.

The witness for the prosecution, being unable by his presence to support such a mockery of justice has decided to leave it to your court the historical responsibility of hearing the case without his participation.

By means of the decision you will render, you will have perhaps judged the assassins; however, you surely will not have judged those really responsible for this odious crime which did not only make a victim of Aomar Bendjelloun but also of those close to him, his friends, indeed all of Morocco.

The real trial of this crime will take place on another day, when we will find those truly responsible.

For now, the witness for the prosecution feels that the true dossier of this case has not yet been opened...

[Text] Important measures to tighten security in Tunis.

In accord with government instructions and in consultation with regional authorities from the District of Tunis, the minister of the Interior has taken a series of measures designed to tighten public security in Tunis and in the suburbs to maintain an atmosphere of calm and to prevent acts of delinquency.

In this context, a work session was held Wednesday in the governor's offices under the direction of Mhadheb Rouissi, president governor of the District of Tunis. This session was devoted to putting these measures into effect and particularly to the creation of ten mobile National Guard brigades whose job it will be to back up the activities of the police stations in the areas and neighborhoods which have experienced a renewed outbreak of acts of violence and delinquency.

The mobile brigades will begin their activity shortly and will be provided with necessary manpower and material. They will make continuous rounds and, to back up the actions of the municipal police, will make checks aimed at fighting rural depopulation and anarchistic groups.

The president governor of the District of Tunis noted in this regard that elected officials and Destourien groups are being asked to prepare the public so that these brigades will be able to accomplish their clean-up mission under the best conditions and to guarantee security within the capital and in its suburbs.

He also announced that permanent National Guard posts will be established at Gammarth, Harrouch, B'har Lazreg, Kabaria, El-Ouardia, Borj Touil, Mnihla, Douar Hicheur, western Kram, Sidi Hassine, Attar, Boum'hel and Borj Cedria.

ARAB TRADE WITH MAJOR WESTERN COUNTRIES DETAILED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 29 Aug 80 pp 36-37

[Article by 'Adnan Karimah: "Saudi Arabia Is Tops on All Fronts in Arab Trade With West"]

[Text] There are Arab officials who, publicly at least, separate politics from economics. They defend their point of view in support of their country's economic relations, including imports and exports and various investments in certain foreign countries. Then they make political attacks against these countries for their positions which conflict with Arab interests, without translating this into both economic and non-economic measures to put pressure on these countries to support Arab rights. It seems that the statement made by Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz last week is the beginning of a new thrust in a different direction.

No matter what the secret or public positions of certain Arab countries doing business with the United States and West Europe may be, financiers, businessmen and economists understand those positions only in terms of figures. These reflect the true state of existing relations, the development of trade, and the activity of the Arab-American and Arab-European partnership in securing the supply of oil needed by the Western countries and selling industrial goods in the Arab markets.

Figures show the trade relations of the four major foreign industrial nations with the Arab world. The countries are as follows:

1. The United States of America.

The volume of trade between the U.S. and the Arab world jumped from $25 billion in 1978 to $33 billion in 1979, an increase of 32.5 percent. American imports, most of which are oil, rose from $15.6 billion to $22 billion, an increase of 40 percent. With the price of oil, the Arabs paid for goods imported from the U.S. These rose from $9.4 billion to $11 billion, an increase of more than 17 percent. As a result of an increase in American imports over exports, the American balance of trade registered a deficit of more than $11 billion last year, compared to $6.2 billion in 1978, an increase of more than 77 percent.

Five of the 21 Arab countries monopolize 85 percent of Arab-American trade.

Saudi Arabia is in first place. Naturally, it is the best Arab customer of the U.S. Its volume of trade with the U.S. is approximately 39 percent of the total Arab-American volume of trade. It rose last year by 33 percent, growing from $9.6 billion to $12.8 billion. Most of this increase came from the increase in American imports of Saudi oil, taking into account the rise in prices. Oil imports amounted to $7.9 billion compared to $5.3 billion in 1978, an increase of approximately 50 percent. American exports to Saudi Arabia represent manufactured goods for consumption and production. They rose 11.5 percent, from $4.3 billion to $4.8 billion. As a natural result of the increased dependence of the U.S. mainly on Saudi oil, the deficit in the American balance of trade with Saudi Arabia grew from $936 million in 1978 to $3.108 billion in 1979, an increase of 232 percent.

Libya is in second place in Arab-American trade relations. Its share is approximately 17 percent. The volume of its trade with the U.S. rose last year by 35 percent, from $4.2 billion to $5.7 billion. Inasmuch as American exports registered an increase of only 10 percent from $425 million to $468 million, the big increase came from the 30 percent rise in Libyan exports to the U.S., from $3.7 billion to $5.2 billion. This caused the deficit in the U.S. balance of trade with Libya to grow from $3.3 billion to $4.7 billion, an increase of more than 45 percent.

Algeria is in third place. Its share of Arab-American trade is approximately 16 percent. Its position is no different than that of Saudi Arabia and Libya with respect to supplying the U.S. with oil and gas. Its volume of trade jumped from $3.8 billion to $5.3 billion, an increase of approximately 40 percent. While its sales to America rose 44 percent, from $3.4 billion to $4.9 billion, American exports to Algeria registered an increase of only 8 percent, rising from $374 billion to $404 million. This caused the deficit in the American balance of trade with Algeria to grow from $3.1 billion to $4.5 billion, an increase of 45 percent.

The United Arab Emirates is in fourth place. Its share is approximately 8 percent. The volume of its trade with the U.S. rose from $2.3 billion to $2.6 billion, registering an increase of only 13 percent. However, purchases by the Emirates of American goods improved. They rose from $493 million to $666 million (35 percent). This led to a relative reduction of 4 percent in the American balance of trade deficit with the Emirates, despite increased American purchases of oil from the Emirates. These purchases rose from $1.8 billion to $1.9 billion.

Egypt is in fifth place. Its share is 5.4 percent. Its volume of trade with America jumped from $1.2 billion to $1.8 billion, a 50 percent increase. American imports from Egypt, including oil, rose from $105 million to $381 million. Exports to Egypt also rose from $1.1 billion to $1.4 billion. Thus the surplus in favor of the U.S. rose by 2.2 percent, registering $1.52 billion.

Iraq has taken the place of Iran in supplying the U.S. with oil. Iraq's exports to the U.S. rose from $243 million to $618 million, or by 154 percent. Its purchases from the U.S. also rose from $316 million to $441 million (by 39.5 percent). Thus Iraq's volume of trade with America jumped from $559 million to $1.059 billion. The American balance of trade with Iraq moved from a surplus of $73 million in 1978 to a deficit of $177 million last year.

2. France.

Figures show the degree to which the French economy is dependent on the Arab world, be it for its supply of oil or for the sale of its production of consumer and intermediate goods in Arab markets. The volume of trade between the two rose from 77 billion francs to 102 billion francs (by more than 32 percent). The rise in the price of both oil and industrial goods contributed to inflating this increase. French imports (mostly oil) rose from 45.8 billion francs in 1978 to 61.9 billion francs in 1979, an increase of 35 percent. At the same time, French exports to the Arab world rose from 31 billion francs to 40 billion francs, an increase of 29 percent. As a result, the deficit in the French balance of trade with the Arabs rose from 14.6 billion francs to 21.7 billion francs, or 48.6 percent.

Saudi Arabia is also in first place as the best customer of the French economy. In the context of its securing France's requirements of oil, its sales to France rose from 18 billion francs to 24 billion francs, (33 percent). Saudi imports rose accordingly from 3.9 billion francs to 4.6 billion francs, an increase of approximately 18 percent. This caused the deficit in the French balance of trade with Saudi Arabia to rise from 14.4 billion francs to 19.6 billion francs, bearing in mind that the volume of trade between the two countries rose from 22 billion francs to 29 billion francs, or 31.8 percent. The Saudi share was 28 percent of the total Arab-French trade.

Iraq ranks second in trade with France. Iraq's share is 17.3 percent. Its volume of trade with France rose from 11.7 billion francs to 17.6 billion francs, an increase of more than 50 percent. This increase came from the rise in French imports from Iraq, mostly oil, from 9.4 billion francs to 14.2 billion francs, and from the rise in Iraq's imports of French industrial goods and technological equipment from 2.2 billion francs to 3.3 billion francs. Inasmuch as the increase was nearly proportional, the deficit in the French balance of trade with Iraq rose at the same rate from 7.2 billion francs to 10.8 billion francs.

Algeria is in third place, with a share of 12.6 percent. It registered a 27.7 percent increase in its volume of trade with France. This volume rose from 10.1 billion francs to 12.9 billion francs, although it differs from the other Arab oil countries in that it is close to and does business with the various sectors of the French market. Therefore, despite Algeria's sales of oil and gas to France, France's exports to Algeria increased from 3.2 billion francs to 4.7 billion francs (by 46.8 percent), providing a surplus in the French balance of trade amounting to 3.5 billion francs last year. This was the natural result of the growth of Algeria's imports of French industrial and consumer goods from 6.9 billion francs to 8.2 billion francs.

The same holds true for Morocco which is in fourth place. However, the lack of Moroccan oil for export has caused a 63 percent increase in the French balance of trade surplus, from 1.9 billion francs to 3.1 billion francs. French imports from Morocco rose from 2.3 billion francs to 2.8 billion francs, while its exports to Morocco rose from 4.3 billion francs to 5.9 billion francs.

The United Arab Emirates is in fifth place in Arab-French trade, with a share of approximately 7 percent. French imports from the Emirates rose by 10 percent.

French imports rose from 4.6 billion francs to 5.1 billion francs, as compared to an increase of 32 percent in French exports to the Emirates, which rose from 1 billion francs to 1.4 billion francs.

3. West Germany

West Germany's economy became more dependent on Arab oil which amounted to 59.9 million tons out of a total 107.4 million tons of oil imported by Germany last year, an increase of approximately 55.8 percent. Arab oil imported in 1978 amounted to 52.9 million tons. Oil constitutes 90 percent of German imports from the Arab world. German imports rose from 12.9 billion marks to 18.5 billion marks, a 43.6 percent increase. Despite this, the German economy enjoys a top spot in Arab consumer markets. Sales of German production in Arab markets rose from 15.8 billion marks to 17.3 billion marks, (a 9.4 percent increase). The German balance of trade moved from a surplus of 2.9 billion marks in 1978 to a deficit of 1.2 billion marks in 1979, bearing in mind that the volume of trade as a whole rose from 28.8 billion marks to 35.9 billion marks, an increase of 24.6 percent.

Although 98 percent of West Germany's imports from Saudi Arabia is oil, West Germany succeeded in registering a surplus in its balance of trade with the kingdom, amounting to 1.126 billion marks in 1978. Imports amounted to 3.33 billion marks compared to 4.416 billion marks for exports. However, the surplus diminished in 1979 to 108 million marks, the difference between 308 billion marks for imports and 4.416 billion marks for exports.

The situation is different with regard to Libya, which is in second place in Arab-German trade relations. Inasmuch as oil constitutes 94.4 percent of West Germany's imports from Libya, these imports rose from 3.4 billion marks to 5.5 billion marks, an increase of 61.7 percent. West Germany's exports to Libya rose accordingly from 1.6 billion marks to 2.1 billion marks (more than 31 percent). This resulted in a rise in the German balance of trade deficit from 1.7 billion marks to 3.3 billion marks, a 94 percent increase.

While West German imports from Algeria rose from 2.3 billion marks to 3.1 billion marks (98 percent of which was oil), West German exports to Algeria declined from 2.5 billion marks to 2.2 billion marks. This caused Germany's balance of trade to move from a surplus of 200 million marks to a deficit of approximately 900 million marks.

The deficit in the German balance of trade with the Emirates, which is fourth in rank in Arab-German trade, rose from 538 million marks to 1.244 billion marks. This was the result of an increase in German oil imports from 6.5 million tons to 7.6 million tons, thereby causing a rise in imports from 1.4 billion marks to 2.1 billion marks, or by 50 percent. German exports to the Emirates rose by only .8 percent, from 857 billion marks to 864 billion marks.

For its part, Iraq supplies West Germany with oil, which amounts to 95.6 percent of Iraq's total exports to West Germany. Last year, West Germany bought 2.2 million tons, compared to 1.9 million tons in 1979 [sic]. This led to an increase in its imports from 411 million marks to 610 million marks. However, German goods succeeded in invading the Iraqi market and registered a gain of approximately 31 percent, rising from 1.6 billion marks to 2.1 billion marks. This provided a surplus which grew from 1.2 billion marks to 1.4 billion marks.

4. Great Britain

Great Britain depends mainly on oil from the North Sea to fill its requirements. It imports small amounts of Arab oil, but it is the European country which enjoys a trade surplus with the Arab countries. Its imports rose from 2.714 billion pounds to 3.097 billion pounds, an increase of 14 percent, compared to an increase of only 5.3 percent for exports which rose from 3.152 billion pounds to 3.32 billion pounds. As a result, the surplus dropped from 438 million pounds to 223 million pounds.

Saudi Arabia is in first place in trade even with Great Britain. Great Britain's volume of business with Saudi Arabia rose from 1.656 billion pounds to 2.001 billion pounds. However, in its balance of trade with Saudi Arabia, it suffers from a slight deficit which rose from 84 million pounds to 215 million pounds. This was the result of an increase in British imports from 870 million pounds to 1.108 billion pounds, compared to a rise in exports from 786 million pounds sterling to 893 million pounds sterling.

Kuwait is in second place. The deficit in the British balance of trade with Kuwait rose from 289 million pounds to 510 million pounds, due to an increase in British imports, including oil, which grew from 621 million pounds to 743 million pounds. At the same time, British exports dropped from 332 million pounds to 233 million pounds.

The Emirates provided a surplus in the British balance of trade which rose from 166 million pounds to 251 million pounds, due to a drop in British imports from 270 million pounds to 237 million pounds, and a rise in exports from 435 million pounds to 488 million pounds.

With Iraq, which ranks fourth in Arab-British trade relations, the deficit in the British balance of trade dropped from 282 million pounds to 192 million pounds, due to the drop in Britain's imports from 497 million pounds to 393 million pounds. There was also a drop in British exports to Iraq, from 215 million pounds to 201 million pounds.

Egypt is in fifth place. Its volume of trade with Great Britain rose from 306 million pounds to 516 million pounds, an increase of 68.6 percent. However, British imports rose from 101 million pounds to 252 million pounds (150 percent).

Britain's exports to Egypt rose only 28.7 percent, from 205 million pounds to 264 million pounds. This led to a drop in the British balance of trade surplus from 104 million pounds to 12 million pounds sterling.

One may conclude from all of these figures that the four great industrial countries are the ones benefiting from their trade relations with the Arab countries, especially the oil countries, in the following manner:

First, they benefit from Arab oil which provides them with their industrial and consumer requirements.

Second, they benefit from oil money which is recovered from the oil-producing countries to pay for consumer goods, services and interest on investment in development projects, not to mention the cost of weapons which they sell to the Arab countries, thereby covering the deficit in their balance of trade with them and even achieving a surplus. It is understood that trade indices do not include arms sales.

Third, they benefit from the oil money surplus. This money is deposited by its owners in foreign banks, outside the Arab nation. In addition, these banks use it for their various investments.

The least one can say after examining these figures and learning the real status of the Arab economy is that it is an economy which suffers from the illness of "subservience," since it is integrated in an unfavorable manner with the world capitalist economy. It is in the interest of the capitalist nations to try to prolong this illness, in order to benefit from draining Arab resources.

SWEDISH YOUTH HAIL GAINS OF APRIL REVOLUTION

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 9 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Kabul, Oct. 9 (Bakhtar).--The characteristic features of present day Afghan reality is the growth in the participation of the people in the political and social life. Despite the continued intrigues of the counterrevolutionary gangs in some areas of the country, the situation in the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan is normalising. Chairman of the Young Communist League of Sweden Olof Brengstroem said this in an interview to a newspaper in Stockholm upon his return from Kabul where he attended the conference of the Democratic Organisation of Youth of Afghanistan.

He said that guests from abroad at the conference visited different provinces of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and could get convinced of the people's trust for the revolutionary government of Afghanistan led by Babrak Karmal, of the striving of the working masses to defend the gains of the April Revolution.

He said that the creation of the organisation of Afghan youth is part of the process of the construction of new society. The Democratic Organisation of Women of Afghanistan, associations of creative intelligentsia have already been formed in the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. The activity of these mass organisations is aimed at the consolidation of the gains of the April Revolution.

The conference of the Democratic Organisation of Youth of Afghanistan whose delegates were representatives of all Afghanistan provinces set out the tasks of the Afghan youth in the construction of new society, Olof Brendstroem said.

The chairman of the young Communist League of Sweden also noted that representatives of youth of many countries who participated in the work of the conference unanimously adopted a resolution in which they approved the Soviet Union's fraternal assistance to the people of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and proclaimed their solidarity with the Afghan revolution.

DETAILS OF ANTONOV DEAL AIRED

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 9 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] By putting into service the two Antonov--24 planes on the air routes served by the Bakhtar Afghan Airlines, the difficulties of our compatriots in many provinces will be solved as far as air transportation is concerned.

Stating the above in an interview with the reporter of the KABUL NEW TIMES, the President of Bakhtar Afghan Airlines, Col. Abdul Latif Lakanwal added: Afghanistan is mainly a mountainous country, and due to lack of motorable and paved roads in some parts of the country, our compatriots are faced with tremendous difficulties as far as transportation is concerned. To remove these difficulties and for the well-being of the people, which is the main objectives of our revolutionary government, the DRA government decided to further develop the air transportation within the country. Thus, the Bakhtar Afghan Airlines, a domestic airlines with a fleet of six planes which are of smaller tonnage and limited seating capacity, was instructed to purchase bigger aircrafts with larger tonnage and seating capacity.

Following this instruction the Bakhtar Airlines contacted the friendly country of Soviet Union and inquired about the kinds of plans that could be used in small airports and could accommodate large number of passengers. The friendly country of Soviet Union recommended the Antonov-24 (AH. 24-PB) type plane.

The two Antonov-24 planes, the purchase agreement of which was signed recently in Kabul, will be used for domestic flights, both for passengers and cargo. The Antonov-24 main seating configuration provides for 50 passengers seats and two cushioned baby cradles which can be substituted by two passengers seats. If the plane flown without additional fuel tanks it can carry upto 75 passengers.

The Antonov-24 engine is overhauled after 3,000 hours flight and that its body after 45,000 hours flight. Its overall tonnage is four and half tons. The cruising speed of the plane is 450 km per hour and its recommended flying altitude 6,000 metres. It can land and take off on airports with 600 metres runway.

The Antonov-24 plane consumes 760 kgr fuel in one hour which is economical. Similarly, with four and half and six tone fuel it can fly non-stop for four and a half to five hours.

As was mentioned earlier the Antonov-24 planes will be operating on domestic air routes, however due to its technical facility it can also be used for both passengers and cargo on the air routes serving the neighbouring countries, said Col. Lakanwal.

The two Antonov-24 aircrafts, priced at 2,800,000 rubles (some Afs. 100 million) is financed from the credit of the government. Twenty per cent of total price is paid after the signing of purchase agreement, 30 per cent on delivery and the remaining 50 per cent is paid on various installments in the form of letter of credit, noted Col. Lankanwal.

In addition to four spare engines, the friendly Soviet country has also provided a number of spare parts to the Bakhtar Airlines as grant-in-aid. The training of personnel to operate the planes is also included in the purchase price.

The planes could be delivered in fifteen days after the purchase agreement was signed, however training of personnel will take three months, thus the two aircrafts can go into operation, within Bakhtar Airlines, in Qaus, 1359, said Col. Lankanwal.

The Antonov-24 aircraft is equipped with air-conditioning systems and with a system controlling the air pressure in the pressurized cabin.

DEVELOPMENTS OF KHUZESTAN WAR ASSESSED

Paris LE MONDE in French 12-13 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Paul Balta]

[Text] El Amara, at one and the same time an industrial and an agricultural town situated 50 kilometers from the Iranian border and the same distance from Desfoul and Ahwaz, has been a strategic center of paramount importance: it is there that the military from the southern sector are assembled before being distributed along the fronts of Khorramshahr by way of Bassora, and of Ahwaz and Desfoul.

On Friday, 10 October, we stopped off there to see some of the materiel taken from the enemy in these regions: some 15 Chieftain tanks, 4 Scorpion, 3 BTR 50 and 1 M113 tanks, several other armored vehicles, some jeeps, guns of various caliber and a significant amount of ammunition. The day before, other reporters had visited Baakouka, near Khanakin, to see the weapons seized at Qasr-e-Chirin and in other towns of the sector: the materiel was lighter but in a much larger quantity.

The officers whom we met strongly asserted that the industrial town of Ahwaz and in particular the Desfoul air base, Khorramshahr's strong defense, were subjected to heavy bombing. Is that the offensive warning sign pointed to a few days ago? In any case, whereas earlier in the week, mostly ammunition supply trains were seen headed toward the South, now there are truck loads of soldiers heading in that direction. And a part of the materiel accumulated around El Amara is on its way to the front.

Of considerable significance on the military level, this town is also important on the sociological plane: it is at the very heart of a region where very old highly structured Arab tribes, who carefully adhere to their ancestral customs, ride on horseback along both borders. Iraqi authorities, therefore, can expect that those who are in Iran in the Ahwaz and Desfoul regions, will be better disposed toward them--or at least will prove to be more faithful to Arab tradition--than the more mixed and more proletariat-oriented people of Abadan and Khorramshahr. Despite its Shi'ite ascendancy as in Iran, this region, like the entire South, where the holy cities of Nadjaf and Kabala are situated, is intensely Arab. It was at Nadjaf that in 1920 the revolt against British occupation broke out. The disagreements which arose with Baghdad during the past few years resulted from the Shi'ites' demand for a greater share in the ruling power. The disappointments they met with did not for all that prevent them from remaining very optimistic.

The Rift With Damas and Tripoli

El Amara, like the other towns we passed through, is covered with posters and notices. Alongside the Baas main slogan--"Unity, liberty, socialism"--the watchwords proclaim: "All the people are with you, O Saddam," "With you, O Saddam, we shall free Palestine," or again: "With our soul, our blood, we shall free the Arab lands," or lastly: "The Chatt-el-Arab is an Arab." Over the waters the Qaddissieh song endlessly floats on.

In the provinces as in Baghdad, everything has been done to activate the people and bolster the troops' morale. The weapons seized are going to be conveyed to Baghdad and there assembled in a museum. Poems commemorating the "Khanakin battle" and President Saddam Hussein, the new hero of the Arab cause, are being read over the radio. A celebration dedicated to this feat of arms is planned for 20 October, with, no doubt, the projection as a world premiere of a film by the famous Egyptian film director, Abou Seif, in which he reconstructs the bravery with which Iraq defied Persia about 13 centuries ago.

In this context, it is made clear that Baghdad had severed relations with Damascus and Tripoli. Following the attacks launched against Damascene policy for several days, the rift with Syria was inevitable. A new commentator for AL SAOUARA, a Baas newspaper, leveled a charge against President Assad, "who had sent troops to Lebanon 4 years ago to break down Palestine resistance and the Lebanese national movement with U.S. protection and Zionist endorsement." In view of the fact that the Syrian leaders took Iraq to task for having diverted Arab involvement in the "major battle"--the struggle against Israel--the paper points out that, at the time of the 1973 war, that it was "Halez El Assad who asked for a cease-fire and surrendered Golan to the enemy before it had actually fallen." And it added, "Where are the Syrian forces now?"

"The answer is to be found in Alep, Homs, Hama and Deir-Ezzor, towns which have nothing to do with the (Israeli) front. These forces are destroying Syrian towns and killing Syrian citizens. How then can a cruel man such as he teach others how to muster all their hidden powers for a major battle?" Libya--which, like Syria, was to send arms to Iran--is also severely criticized particularly for its inconsistent position. "Colonel Qadhdhafi's Libya," an officer said, "had harshly criticized the 1975 Algiers agreement, calling us to task for having ceded Arab territories to Iran. At that time we had so many problems, in particular with the Kurds, that we had no choice. Now that we are fighting to restore our supreme power over our lands and to make it possible for the Arabs to recoup the small islands in the Strait of Hormuz, we had every reason to believe that Tripoli would be on our side. Now we discover, strange to say, that Qadhdhafi is supporting Iran."

IRAQI POW SIDES WITH IRAN

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 5 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] TEHRAN (PARS) – A Second Lt. of the Iraqi Artillery who was dispatched to Susangerd, took refuge at Ahvaz was interviewed by Pars correspondent, which is as follows:

Q: Have you freely volunteered yourself to fight against Iran?

A: No, I am a soldier and bound by the orders of the Army.

Q: Have you taken part in action?

A: No, today was the first day of my mission and I have directly come to the Iranian Forces and surrendered myself.

Q: Despite your claim that you are a devoted Moslem, how did it happen that you accepted to fight against the Islamic Revolution of Iran?

A: I was ordered, and being a soldier I was bound to obey, but I have not done anything. I was just sent to the front.

Q: How is the morale of the Iraqi people?

A: They are Moslems and they dislike this war but we (soldiers) are duty-bound to obey.

Q: What percentage of Iraqi Army comprises Shi'ite Moslems?

A: 75 per cent.

Q: How unstable is the Army?

A: As I told you previously, most of the Army personnel are Shi'ite Moslem and they believe this war is nothing but useless and unwanted fratricide, and nobody except the United States and Israel can benefit from such war.

Q: What percentage of the Army personnel are waiting to flee?

A: I don't exactly know, as actually, we are afraid to discuss the subject with each other.

Q: That means, you could not even inquire about the view-points of your friends?

A: There is total strangulation, and we can not even discuss such matters with our friends.

Q: Is freedom of speech prevailing in Iraq, and are the people happy?

A: No, wherever you go, there are possibilities that you are being followed.

Q: Except for the ruling Party, are the other people happy to fight against Iran?

A: Partly yes, but most of the people are against this war – Albeit, in the beginning the Iraqi government announced that Iran had attacked Iraq and therefore, a majority of people deemed it their duty to defend their country, but when we came to know that the matter is just the opposite and that Iraq has invaded Iran and our Moslem brothers, the number of supporters of the war against Iran has diminished to a great extent.

Q: How were your conditions after arrest?

A: I am truely satisfied. I was previously under the illusion that Iranians are brutal, they were Americans – but now that I see myself, here I feel as if I am within my own family. Since I have been taken captive they have maintained a brotherly relation with me.

Q: What is your opinion with respect to the Iraqi government's claims that Iran is intending to destroy Arabs and that this is a Fars-Arab war?

A: Iraqi mass-media are propagating such claims but we see that there is no such thing and actually Iraq has invaded Iran, but the Iraqi people are Moslem and we know that Iranians are also Moslem and there is no reason for war.

Q: How did you run away?

A: I was sent on a reconnaissance mission to the region, and I ran away with the same car.

Q: Do you consider Ba'athist government as being Moslem?

A: No, they are not Moslems.

Q: Did you hear Imam's message instructing Army personnel to flee -- What was the effect of Imam's message on the Iraqi Army?

A: Yes, I heard Imam's message through the Ahvaz Radio. I myself was highly impressed. It was a message from a Moslem to another Moslem, and surely it has effected others too. But most of them are afraid to speak of their opinion.

Q: Has the non-military sector being affected by air bombardments?

A: Mostly industrial and military sites are damaged but sometimes dwelling houses nearby the sites are also effected.

Q: Have you heard that the Iraqi government puts pressure upon and hurts the families of defecting Army personnels?

A: Yes, I have also heard about it, but it is not important for me.

CAPITALISTS DENOUNCED FOR FLEEING WAR ZONE

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 9 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] Tehran (Pars)--The evening daily ETTELA'AT in a recent page article lashed out at those "Moslem capitalists" who were cowardly fleeing the war-stricken areas of the country.

The article started with statements by Imam Khomeini that "America has been slapped in the face, not by me or you, but by Islam and these slum-dwellers" and "the main defenders of the Revolution are these same masses who hold demonstrations by day and shout Allah-o-Akbar (God is Great) at night."

When the Imam made these statements, said the article, many people did not believe him, particularly when he emphasized: "The Revolution has been achieved by these deprived people residing in the slums. We need these people--not those living in palaces or the supper-class ones," and "Among the martyrs of the Revolution you cannot find anyone belonging to the well-off and upper-class people," and "the Revolution should proceed the way these slum-dwellers wish it to, not in the way the well-to-do classes desire."

At the time when the Leader of the Islamic Revolution of Iran specified that "they (the wealthy class) have from the very beginning kept themselves aloof," some could hardly believe it.

The article went on to say: "But now we can easily see that what the Imam said was true. War is, indeed, a good test. Improving godly characteristics, virtue and sacrifice, it scandalizes the well-off class and brings those who are looking after a comfortable life to disgrace themselves.

Here, war differentiates between the revolutionary, the non-revolutionary and the counter-revolutionary. In these days when our youths, the brave Revolutionary Guards, the Army, the mobilized oppressed masses and the national revolutionary forces are warmly welcoming martydrom, the upper classes, who are in fact the most wretched ones in the society, are packing up and fleeing from the war-torn cities.

This is a most shameful and vile act under the present circumstances. Shall we still rely upon traitor capitalists who complain more than anyone else and who surrender to the enemy before anyone else? Reports from the western cities of the country indicate that the well-to-do classes are fleeing these areas and rushing to the central districts. They have abandoned the Revolutionary Guards, the Army and the deprived and faithful masses to defend their empty villas and apartments!

The article concluded, "The funny thing is that most of these timid counter-revolutionaries are taking advantage of Islam and, by forming a so-called Islamic Associations, are trying to escape confiscations and the implementation of the law. By so doing they have made the people and the truly faithful people embittered and cynical towards the Revolution and have laid the ground for the enemy to misuse this disaffection against the real Moslems."

COMMENTARY ON STANDS TOWARD IRAQ-IRAN CONFLICT

JN111835 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 1600 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Text] The war for sovereignty and the regaining of rights waged by fraternal Iraq and Jordan's clear and pan-Arab position vis-a-vis this war have revealed that both the East and the West, to the same extent, do not want to see even once an Arab state that decides on its own the fate of its rights and its sovereignty. This is largely due to the oil consideration, which prompts both the West and the East to divide and weaken this region of the world.

This war has been the first waged by an Arab state to regain its rights after the opposite party became intransigent and attempted to consolidate its moral and material gains through armed force. Despite this, both the East and the West attempted to prevent this Arab state, which is Iraq, from correcting the abnormal conditions and regaining Iraq's sovereignty over its national soil and territorial waters in Shatt al-'Arab. They have also attempted to prevent Iraq from demanding the return of the three Arab islands in the Arab Gulf.

There is a clear similarity between the Iranian and Israeli intransigence in refusing to concede Arab rights. This explains Israel's clear attitude toward fraternal Iraq and Jordan. Israel declared that any positive Arab inter-reaction with Iraq is eventually a threat to Israel. Menahim Begin declared that the situation is very dangerous for Israel. This explains the hostile designs and the methods followed by the aggressors to preserve the gains acquired through wars of aggression at the expense of the Arab nation. Israel is trying to prove its regional hegemony in the Arab world and Iran attempts to preserve its regional hegemony in the Arab Gulf. The superpowers, prompted by shear oil considerations, attempt to impose international hegemony and spread their influence in order to preserve their vested interests in the Arab region.

Where do the Arab states stand vis-a-vis the attempts to impose regional and international hegemony over the Arab region? What have they prepared or are preparing to face the consequences of the battle raging on the eastern flank of the Arab homeland, the clear Israeli threats or the attempts of the superpowers to share the areas of influence in the Arab homeland?

Amid this medley of regional and international struggles to impose hegemony over the Arab world, the Jordanian pan-Arab stand emerges in support of fraternal Iraq to reiterate the importance of Arab solidarity in facing regional hegemonism. The stand taken by fraternal Kuwait in support of Jordan, which stands facing the Zionist enemy along the longest confrontation line, also reiterates the importance of Arab solidarity, particularly in this serious stage in confronting both the Iranian and Israeli threats, the Arab east is exposed to great dangers, which are revealed by the current war on the eastern flank of the Arab homeland. These dangers are also exposed by the declared Israeli aggressive intentions and the maneuvers of the two superpowers to impose regional and international hegemony over this region. The states of our Arab nation must declare their position before it is too late.

ISRAEL CONDUCTING CAMPAIGN OF LIES AGAINST JORDAN

JN110803 Amman JORDAN TIMES in English 11 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Troublemakers"]

[Text] Not unexpectedly, Israel is doing its utmost to stir the already troubled waters of the gulf by attempting to keep the present conflict between Iran and Iraq going, and at the same time, to see to it that the Arab posture of preparedness for confrontation is irreversibly weakened.

Reports in diplomatic circles in London indicate that there have been contacts between the Israeli and Iranian embassies there over an Iranian request for supplies of spare parts and military hardware for Iran's mostly American-supplied armed forces.

At the same time, Israel is acting as a dispenser of the most far-fetched rumours and alarmist propaganda, fed bit by bit to gullible Western journalists. The brunt of this insidious propaganda attack has been directed at Jordan because of its bold and forthright national stand at the side of Iraq. The picture of the impending or actual collapse of both our economy and our morale, and of allegedly prevailing siege conditions here, contrasts sharply with the true picture which we see around us.

Much more serious is the campaign of slurs and lies about Jordan which the Israeli leadership, from Begin on down, is directing, with the help of pliant pressmen, at its patron, the United States. This hysterical campaign is based, first of all, on outright factions--the presence of "Soviet ships unloading arms" at Aqaba, the movement of Jordanian troops to Iraq--masquerading as fact and given undue prominence by such normally reputable international news media as the BBC.

Moreover, Begin maintains that Jordan's stand presents a "threat" to Israel and demands that the U.S. take measures to "protect" him, lest it wake up tomorrow to find "Iraq troops massed along the Jordan River." Specifically, Begin wants the U.S. to abrogate military supply agreements with Jordan.

The aim of this Israeli campaign is clearly to weaken the Arab position when it appears opportune to do so. That in itself is a measure of Israeli self-delusion: Arab strength is at this moment manifesting itself in a vigorous and victorious effort to repel aggression and liberate occupied territory on the eastern flank of the Arab nation. Begin obviously does not wish to see such Arab strength manifested on his own front.

His Majesty King Husayn has stated that "victory there in Iraq is the beginning of victory here in Palestine." That should indeed give the Israelis something to think about. However, Jordan has made it clear from the beginning that, in supporting fraternal Iraq, we seek an early rationalisation of threats and contradictions in the gulf region, with an end to belligerency and intimidation and occupation so that peace can be restored quickly. This is the same stand which Jordan always maintains with regard to all the threats to peace in our region.

Jordan's position is absolutely clear and open for all to see. As His Majesty the King told a group of Western television interviewers on Wednesday, we are committed to support Iraq because Iraq's cause is our cause and it is right. This support extends to all fields, material, military and moral. We have as yet not been asked to provide actual forces to Iraq, and don't expect to be asked [to] do so, but we are ready if asked.

Iraq has for some time been importing between ten and fifteen percent of its normal needs through Aqaba; this traffic has quite naturally picked up as a result of the present inaccessibility to Basra. Aqaba is a free port and Iraq is a part of us and is, therefore, free to bring in whatever it needs through there. These are the facts of Jordan's position and commitment.

When Begin talks about "threats" to Israel's "security," we wonder how even the most naive of recipients of his twisted view of the world could ignore the very real and constant military threat which Israel not only poses but imposes on the civilian inhabitants of southern Lebanon as well as the occupied territories in Palestine. This Israeli capacity for aggressiveness against the Arabs now extends to apparently giving aid to our aggressors on the eastern wing of the Arab nation. Who, we ask, poses a threat to whom? As for the correspondents who have arrived here seeking the conditions of war and panic which Mr. Begin describes, do they feel their job extends to creating such conditions where they do not exist? If so, who benefits?

CENTRAL BANK GOVERNOR REVIEWS MONETARY, BANKING SITUATION

Amman AL-RA'Y in Arabic 7 Jul 80 p 5

[Article: "Monetary, Banking Situation in Country Reviewed; Central Bank Governor Explains Dimensions of Jordan's Financial Policy; Banks Urged to Exercise Self-Control in Sphere of Credit Facilities"]

[Text] Amman--Dr Muhammad Sa'id al'Nabulsi, the Central Bank governor, has spoken at the first annual gathering of the Jordanian Banks Association on the banking development, the Jordanian currency policy and the general features of the policy which the bank will follow in the future.

Latest Developments in Monetary and Banking Situation in 1979

In the sphere of deposits, Dr al-Nabulsi has pointed out that the total deposits placed with licensed banks rose in 1979 by 32 percent to reach 593 million dinars. This rise resulted from the growth in the various types of deposits. The growth in the set-term deposits has been the largest, amounting to 42 percent. The second largest growth has been in the savings deposits, amounting to 28 percent, followed by the on-demand deposits, amounting to 24 percent.

In Sphere of Credit Facilities:

The growth in the credit facilities in 1979 amounted to 40 percent and these credits reached 365 million pounds by the end of the year. Thus, the growth in the credit facilities advanced by the licensed banks has exceeded the deposits placed with them by eight percentage points.

The money supply in its narrow sense amounted at the end of 1979 to 446 million pounds, meaning that this supply grew by 26 percent during the year. In the broad sense of money supply, the supply amounted to 764 million pounds (28 percent).

The loans advanced by the specialized loan apparatus in 1979 also grew by 26 percent to amount to 131 million dinars by the end of the year.

Developments in 5 Months

Dr al-Nabulsi has also pointed out that the average monthly increase in the credit facilities during the first 5 months of the current year has almost been equal to the average increase in the deposits, (11.2) million dinars, and that these credit facilities amounted to 521 million dinars by the end of May 1980.

As for money supply, its growth rate, both in the narrow and broad sense, has amounted to 11.6 millions in the first 5 months of the current year. Money supply in the narrow sense amounted to 520 million dinars and in the broad sense to 853 million dinars by the end of May 1980. If we compare this growth rate with the corresponsing period of last year, we will find that the growth rate in the money supply in its narrow sense is three percentage points less and in its broad sense four percentage points less [than last year].

The loans advanced by the specialized loan establishments in the first quarter of this year have risen by 5.6 million dinars compared to 7.8 million dinars in the corresponding period of last year.

Public Bonds:

The standing value of government bonds rose by 7 million pounds in 1979 to reach 56 million pounds. The bonds issued by public establishments on a government quarantee remained unchanged in 1979, with a value of 11 million dinars.

The volume of the total loans advanced in Jordanian dinars by the licensed banks, the specialized loan establishments, the financial companies and a number of insurance companies amounted to 28 million dinars by the end of 1979. These loans represent an important development in the credits advanced by the commercial banks. The Central Bank has encouraged the advancing of this type of loans by excluding them from the credit-deposit ratio.

End of May 1980:

The total deposits have risen in the first 5 months of this year by an average of 11.1 million dinars monthly compared to 13.5 million dinars monthly in the corresponding period of last year. The total deposits amounted to 649 million dinars by the end of May 1980. In contrast to last year, the growth in on-demand deposits has amounted to 12 percent, followed by set-terms deposits which have risen by eight percent and then the savings deposits which have risen by seven percent.

Dr al-Nabulsi has pointed out that in the past 6 months government bonds valued at 6 million dinars and public establishment bonds valued at 9 million dinars have been issued, thus bringing up the value of government bonds to 62 million dinars and of public establishment bonds to 20 million dinars.

A contract has also been concluded this year for a collective loan of 9 million dinars advanced to 'Aliyah Establishment [Jordanian Airlines] in which the licensed banks, the specialized loan establishments and a number of insurance companies have participated.

Monetary Policy

Dr al-Nabulsi has further pointed out that the Central Bank has continued to draw up its policies that seek to control the volume of banking credit facilities and to encourage the granting of such credit to the production and development sectors. The Central Bank's most important measures in 1979 have included the measure setting a 70-percent ratio of credits to deposits and then reducing this ratio to 67.5 percent, excluding the credit advanced to the production sectors. The currency reserve has also been raised to 16 percent for on-demand deposits and to 13 percent for savings and set-term deposits. It is evident that the bank has sought through this latter measure to introduce a change in the structure of the deposits placed with the commercial banks favoring set-term and savings deposits.

The bank has also used the instrument of the interest rate to influence the cost of banking credit on the one hand and the volume and structure of the deposits on the other. It has raised the minimum interest rate on credit facilities to eight percent for residents and to nine percent for nonresidents. As for deposits, the interest rate for deposits subject to a two-day or a seven-day notice has been reduced to two percent whereas the minimum interest rate paid for deposits subject to a notice of one month or more has been raised to 5.75 percent and for deposits subject to a notice of 6 or more months to six percent.

In the preceding months of this year, the Central Bank's attention has been focused on the need for the commercial banks to take into consideration the rules of sound banking practices in advancing credits, both in terms of the volume and purpose of these credits and of the soundness of the borrower's financial position. The Central Bank has asked the licensed banks not to advance credit facilities exceeding 400,000 dinars to any resident without the prior approval of the Central Bank. This condition also applies to credits advanced to nonresidents, regardless of their value. Agreement has also been reached with the Banks Association not to advance to any customer direct credit facilities exceeding in total value 150,000 dinars except on the basis of a budget approved by a legal auditor.

The Central Bank has also required an additional compulsory reserve for the total sum by which the credit-deposit ratio set for all licensed banks is exceeded

Regarding interest rates, the Central Bank has raised the minimum interest rates to 5.5 percent for savings deposits, 6.25 percent for deposits subject to a notice of one month or more and to 6.50 percent for deposits subject to a notice of 6 months or more. The bank has also raised the minimum commissions collected by licensed banks for some types of their credit facilities by 0.25 percentage points.

To encourage the licensed banks to advance collective loans, the Central Bank has approved the principle of deducting the value of such loans used for the financing purposes approved in advance by the Central Bank in calculating the credit-deposit ratio, provided that such loans are for a term of no less than 5 years.

Main Step in Central Bank's Banking Policy

Development of Capital Market:

The Central Bank has attached and continues to attach major importance to developing the financial market in Jordan because of the positive impact of such development on mobilizing local savings and channelling them toward investment on the one hand and to attract foreign capital (especially from Jordanians working abroad) on the other hand. The Central Bank has made long strides in this regard, including issuance of the public debt law in accordance with which the 1969 treasury permits were issued and which formed the nucleus for the monetary market and the government bonds in 1971, as well as the nucleus for the organized capital market. Moreover, the liberalization of restrictions on foreign currency has undoubtedly contributed toward attracting the monies of Jordanians and of other Arabs toward investment in Jordanian stocks and bonds. One of the major steps in this regard was the creation of the Amman financial market at the outset of 1978.

To encourage the establishments necessary for developing the financial market, permits have been issued in the past few years for the establishment of two investment banks and two financial investment companies. As for the financial instruments, commercial bonds and deposit certificates have been issued for the first time in Jordan's history. The Central Bank has also strived to have the commercial bonds given the same tax advantages given to government bonds so that their use may spread. The Central Bank is currently studying the best means through which the issuance of deposit certificates, especially long-term deposit certificates, can be encouraged.

Licensing

In his lecture [sic], Dr al-Nabulsi announced that the Central Bank believes that the number of banks operating in Jordan is sufficient and that there is no need for any more banks at present. Therefore, the Central Bank policy is not to issue licenses for new banks in the kingdom, whether they are branch banks of foreign banks or banks founded locally. Moreover, the Central Bank's present policy calls for not permitting licensed non-Jordanian banks to open more branches in Amman or outside it and for confining the opening of new branches, especially outside the capital, to Jordanian banks.

As for licensing investment companies, the Central Bank encourages the foundation of specialized financial companies that do not accept deposits. The bank also encourages the foundation of companies leasing equipment and machinery and similar companies to operate in the sphere of special investment financing. As for the financial companies that accept deposits [presumably meaning savings and loan firms], the Central Bank has recently drawn up special regulations including the conditions that must be present for the foundation of such companies and defining the sphere of their operations.

Dr al-Nabulsi has also said that the Central Bank has encouraged the foundation of representative agencies in Jordan for foreign banks and financial companies because of the important role that such agencies perform in familiarizing with the spheres of investment in Jordan and, consequently, in attracting foreign capital to contribute to financing the various development projects. A number of such agencies have already been licensed and two of them have started their operations.

Since its foundation, the Central Bank has regulated and controlled the operations of money changers in the interest of the national economy. The amendments introduced to the law on money changing have sought to raise the capital of firms dealing with this work and to define the types of their activities and the spheres of their operations. The Central Bank has also made it conditional that a security of 50,000 dinars be presented to it by money changers to guarantee their meeting their commitments toward others. To raise the standard of the money-changing profession, the bank has acted strictly and has imposed the following conditions for granting new licenses:

1. Licensing only companies with a large capital.

2. Confining transactions in foreign currencies to public joint-stock companies.

3. Imposing licensing fees and annual fees.

Financing Exportation

Dr al-Nabulsi has also asserted that the Jordanian balance of trade is experiencing a big deficit as a result of the fact that our imports exceed our exports by several times. The Central Bank has been and continues to be interested in encouraging exports with all the means so as to get rid of this deficit and, consequently, to correct the structure of the Jordanian balance of payments. For example, the Central Bank has exempted for a number of years the revenues of exports by giving exporters priority in the various credit facilities. To encourage the banks to give such priority, the Central Bank advances to them short-term loans up to a period of 263 days at the discount rate in operation in return for shipping policies, export credits, deposition certificates and national goods in storage. The value of the loan advanced by the Central Bank in return for these documents ranges from 60-80 percent of the value of the goods. In the case of bills and accepted [money] withdrawals signed in accordance with the abovementioned credit terms and shipping policies, the loan is given for a period of 6 months and to the sum of the full value of these bills and withdrawals.

Guaranteeing Deposits and Loans

The Central Bank law contains a provision stipulating that the Central Bank, in participation with the licensed banks and specialized loan establishments, establish a public authority to guarantee deposits and loans in accordance with a special statute issued for this purpose.

Currently, the Central Bank, in cooperation with the Banks Association, is drafting a statute to bring this authority into existence. When founded, this authority will work to bolster confidence in the Jordanian banking and monetary system because it will protect savers (by guaranteeing their savings and the interest accruing to them) and protecting the licensed banks and financial companies (by guaranteeing their loans). The authority's activities may be expanded to include the operations to secure financing for exportation.

Amending Banking Legislation

Dr al-Nabulsi also said that he believes that the presence of the proper banking legislations is one of the fundamental elements in the development and prosperity of the banking apparatus and in safeguarding the strength and soundness of the monetary establishments. Consequently, the bank has amended the banking law more than once with the aim of developing this law so that it may not stand a stumbling block in the face of the development of the banking work based on sound foundations.

The Central Bank is currently in the process of introducing a comprehensive change into the banking law to make it compatible with the requirements of developing the banking and monetary apparatus. The new amendments will include the capital of the banking establishments and will define the conditions and spheres of the operations of the specialized financial companies and the possibility of allowing these companies to benefit from the credit facilities advanced by the Central Bank to the banking apparatus. This is in addition to adjusting the ceiling for credit subject to the approval of the Central Bank.

Observations on Operations of Banks

In his lecture, Dr al-Nabulsi mentioned several observations concerning the operations of the banks. In his observations, Dr al-Nabulsi dealt with:

A. Inspecting Banks:

The Central Bank has worked to strengthen quantitatively and qualitatively the inspection teams that it dispatches to the banks periodically by increasing the number of inspectors and sending them abroad for training courses. It is hoped that the licensed banks will strengthen their cooperation with these teams, considering that their work is in the interest of the licensed bank particularly and the interest of the banking apparatus and the monetary policy generally. It is also hoped that the managements of the licensed banks will respond to the inspection letters in time and will take the proper measures to deal with the observations and issues raised by the inspection reports.

B. Bank Branches:

The Central Bank wishes to see more branches outside Amman and the other major cities so that the benefit may spread throughout all parts of the kingdom and so that the banking habit may spread among all. As we have already mentioned, the Central Bank's present policy in this sphere is not to issue permits for opening new branches, unless they are Jordanian banks, especially outside the capital.

C. Banking Facilities:

The Central Bank wishes to see more banking facilities channelled toward the production sectors, such as industry and agriculture. But perhaps what is more important than this is that the licensed banks observe the rules and regulations of the sound banking operations and keep clear off any activity incompatible with the banking tradition, such as financing speculation in gold, foreign currencies and real estate. In this regard, a word must be said about some credit facilities advanced by a number of banks to their clients without inquiring adequately and carefully and making certain of the soundness of the financial positions of these clients. We all know that some of these clients are experiencing financial troubles that may embarrass the licensed banks themselves. It is noticed that some contractors use a very small part of their financial resources to carry out their undertakings and depend largely on the credit facilities given them by the banks. It is also noticed that on giving credit facilities to a contractor, the interest of the licensed bank is focused on the condition of the adequacy of the securities. However, the bank neglects to follow up and keep an eye on the monies [given in loans], is lenient in demanding the financial accounts and fails to study these accounts adequately.

Therefore, it has become necessary to have in the information and followup departments of the licensed banks technical cadres experienced with the work of contractors and with bids and capable of studying their conditions and of keeping an eye on the credit facilities given to these contractors to make sure that they are connected with the projects that they implement. It is also beneficial to set up an information center at the Jordanian Banks Association similar to the Risks Center of the Central Bank--an information center which gathers all kinds of information on the contractors to supply it to the banks. The Central Bank hopes that the licensed banks will refuse to offer credit facilities to any contractor unless he submits correct and certified financial accounts [qawa'im] and statements of cash flow.

D. Self-Control by Banks (Information-Inspection-Technical Setups-Bouncing Checks):

It is obvious from the aforementioned that there is an urgent need for the licensed banks to introduce information and followup sections or to inject the currently existing sections with the necessary technical cadres capable of studying and following up on all matters pertaining to the credit facilities given to the main clients and capable of verifying the degree by which the credit facilities advanced are used in the projects for which they are advanced. The banks also need to keep the necessary files and documents regulating such work.

There is also the problem of bouncing checks. We hope that the licensed banks will cooperate with us to get rid of this problem by preparing lists of the names of those who (issue) such checks to find out if some clients have the intention to misuse banking checks. Therefore, it is necessary that high-ranking officers of the deposit sections examine bouncing checks carefully. In this respect, we should also point out the need to curtail the use of printed checks through agreement between a licensed bank and its clients because the widespread use of such checks may weaken the public's trust in those who deal with checks. The Central Bank also hopes that the licensed banks will select employees with sufficient banking experience to represent them in the clearing offices so as to facilitate the clearing operation.

Concerning the role of the Bank Association in this regard, Dr al-Nabulsi has said: The creation of your association and comparing the methods of operation provide an excellent opportunity for the exchange of views and experiences among the banking apparatus officials and are the best proof of the degree of your interest in developing and improving the standard of the banking work. It is needless to say that the development and progress of the banking apparatus constitute one of the fundamental requirements of economic development under the system that we follow. It is also my opinion that the Banks Association can perform an important role as an instrument of communication and dialogue between the monetary and financial authorities on the one hand and the licensed banks on the other.

MUNICIPALITY OF IRBID COMPLETES ITS WATER SYSTEM

Amman AL-DUSTUR in Arabic 7 Jul 80 p 2

[Article: "In Interview on Projects of Municipality of Irbid, Dr Tubayshat Declares That Ample Supply of Water Reaches Every Home in City and Asserts Sewerage Project Will Be Carried Out as Soon as Its Plans Are Approved"]

[Text] Irbid--Dr 'Abd-al-Razzaq Tubayshat, the mayor of Irbid, has declared that the water crisis in the city has ended and that the drop in the quantity of water pumped ordinarily from al-Azraq to the Governorate of Irbid has been the result of a failure in the water pumps in al-Azraq which are under the supervision of the Water Authority.

In his interview with AL-DUSTUR reporter, Dr Tubayshat has said that as a result of the contacts made with the officials, it has been agreed to pump 6,500-7,000 cubic meters of water [daily] to the city of Irbid. According to the estimates, this quantity is sufficient to meet the needs of all of the city's residents, if properly distributed and used. To make sure of this, the city of Irbid has been divided into two sections so that water supply may reach the citizen regularly for a period of 3 days a week. The flow of water to high buildings may be late at times and this is normal. But there is no doubt that such buildings get their water needs.

The mayor of Irbid has assured the citizens that he supervises personally the distribution of water to make sure that it reaches every home. He has said: I am ready to examine any complaint reaching me in this respect.

Subdivision Law

As for the subdivision of Irbid lands in accordance with subdivision law No 11 of 1968, the mayor has said: From the outset, we have undertaken and pledged to serve the citizens and to adopt their causes. What has been raised regarding implementation of the [land] subdivision law is unjustifiable because implementation of the law is undoubtedly beneficial to the prosperity of both the city and the inhabitants.

The mayor has also said: I have met with the land owners to whom this law will apply. After a long discussion and after the matter became clear to them, we have agreed to go ahead with implementing the law. The citizen will certainly feel the results of the implementation of this law as soon as it is ready.

City Streets

On paving and asphalting the city streets, the mayor of Irbid has said that the municipality has invited bids for asphalting 400,000 square meters and paving 150,000 square meters. Work is going ahead day and night to complete this bid invitation [al-'ata'] in 2 months.

The mayor of Irbid has also appealed to the citizens to keep the streets clean and to remove dirt and debris from them.

Sewerage Project

Regarding the sewerage project, Dr Tubayshat has pointed out that serious studies are underway to go ahead with implementing the project so as to serve the citizens and to solve a difficult problem. As for the cost of the projects, they will become known after preparation of the studies and of the specifications.

Dr Tubayshat has added that the municipality is conducting studies on building public parks in the city to beautify it and that work will begin shortly to build a public park near The King Husayn Charitable Institution, in addition to a number of small parks for children in all parts of the city.

Industrial Town

Dr Tubayshat has also said that the municipality has carried out all the commitments it has undertaken to improve the conditions of the industrial town and to provide it with services. Streets have been opened, health units have been established and a medical clinic has been founded, in addition to a small (government) complex to serve the industrial activity in the town. Studies are currently underway to build a trucking complex in the town.

Car Parks

Dr Tubayshat has also asserted that the municipality is exerting efforts at present to secure new car parks after issuance of the decree banning the parking of cars in the streets.

SKEPTICISM EXPRESSED ABOUT UNITY PLANS BETWEEN ARAB COUNTRIES

Kuwait AL-SIYASAH in Arabic 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Editorial by Ahmad al-Jarallah: "Dangers of Escapist Slogans of Unity"]

[Text] Ever since unity between Egypt and Syria failed, projects of unity between one Arab country and another have lost their glitter. To the Arab citizen now unity of material interests takes precedence over unity of religion, language, poetry, music, hopes and dreams.

Unity between Egypt and Syria could have succeeded had it been preceded by successful preparation. The case is the same with regard to unity between Iraq and Syria which was subject to inaccurate considerations.

By the same token, the Jordanian-Syrian cooperation, which came close to unity, could have been firmer and could have lasted longer, had it not been for the feelings of caution, suspicion which plagued it as of its early days.

Likewise, talk about unity between Libya and Tunisia, or even Libya and Algeria could have served practical purposes had not the calculations made in each instance been inaccurate. The long historical dialogue about unity between the two parts of Yemen is not too different. This dialogue remained so confined to the leaders that it could make no progress.

Thus, talk about unity occasionally provokes laughter, because it is not based on serious thought and precise calculation. All successful experiments of unity on the European and American continents have shown that talk of unity will not be effective unless it is based from the very beginning on practical considerations of common economic interests. The daily life routines of candidates for unity have to be similar and based on identical theories, legislation and practices.

Without such a foundation, Arab unity proposals will remain tantamount to conversations between two deaf people, or to speeches made by leaders on ceremonial occasions, when they try to escape from the problems of the present by talking about the future. People are no longer interested in chasing a mirage or a beautiful dream. A mirage does not quench thirst; it makes it worse.

Unity means a network of interests that ultimately leads to joint political action. Unity does not mean putting on an act in the media. No one believes that a leader in power finds his seat so uncomfortable as to pursue a distant mirage which will provide neither water nor vegetation.

Real unity among the countries of the Arab world calls for economic integration without reservation or equivocation. Whimsical talk or escapist slogans can only lead to further failures.

THREE KUWAITI FOREIGN INVESTMENTS OUTLINED

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 18 Sep 80 p 16

[Text] Cairo--In August 1980, Kuwaiti investors concluded three transactions in three geographic locations: Frankfurt, London and Cairo. They relate to hotels, contracting and manufacturing. The first transaction was made in the Egyptian capital. Through it, the Kuwaiti (ARTOK) Company purchased the 10 percent interest of the British (Bryant Walker) Company in the al-Shams Hotel and Tourist Corporation. Al-Shams Corporation owns al-Salam [Peace] Hotel. Under the agreement, the British Company lost its contract to manage the hotel and its management revenues which amount to 20 percent of profits. The second transaction, signed in London, provides for purchase by al-Jazirah Construction Contracts Company of 10 percent of the stock of the French (French Care) Construction Contracts Company for the sum of 1.9 million pounds sterling. It is known that the al-Jazirah Company is an Arab multi-national corporation headquartered in Bahrain. Kuwaiti companies have invested in it. It was established to undertake major operations and construction in the area. Its capital is 53 million dollars (25 percent of it has been paid in). The (French Care) Company has been doing business in the Middle East for 6 years. It had obtained contracts in Iraq, the Gulf and in Saudi Arabia. The British Company announced that it welcomed Arab investment, because such investment would open the market in the Middle East for it, extending thereby its operations to North Africa. The al-Jazirah Company has obtained a major construction contract in Bahrain for 350 million dollars. It is also implementing another 130 million dollar project in Iraq. The (French Care) Corporation is considered a successful corporation whose profits in 1979 amounted to 8.2 million pounds sterling. The third transaction was made in Frankfurt. Through it, Kuwait purchased a 10 percent interest in the (Metalgesic Aft) Corporation which works in the areas of manufacturing, mining and production of chemical products. The company owns private transportation companies, a bank and an insurance company.

BRIEFS

JAPANESE PETRODOLLAR DEAL--Bank sources in Tokyo said yesterday that a number of principal Japanese banks began selling shares to the oil countries in the Middle East last June. The sources indicated that the Bank of Tokyo, the Sumitomo Bank and the Sanwa Bank were among these banks. The sources added that these banks' sales of shares to the central banks in Iraq, in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and in Kuwait amounted so far to about 100 billion yen, or approximately 460 million dollars. Although Japan's Ministry of Finance and the Central Bank of Japan have not commented on this news, the sources stated that these sales were important because they encouraged the flow and the circulation of these countries' petrodollars into Japan. DANY SHAM'UN COMMENTS ON SITUATION FOLLOWING JULY EVENTS

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 11 Aug 80 p 4

[Interview with Dany Sham'un, of the National Party (NLP); date and place not given]

[Text] Yesterday, Dany Sham'un made a violent verbal attack against those who perpetrated the 7 July massacre. He said that it will not change the situation at all, "since the ports are back in operation, the tributes imposed by warring factions have increased, and the confiscated hashish has been returned to its owners." He announced his support for keeping the outgoing government afloat, saying that there is nothing wrong with it. He expressed his belief that the government will not yield to the Phalangists on the matter of their taking over Channel 12. And he stressed the fact that no meeting has taken place between him and Bashir al-Jumayyil. "Such a meeting is not under consideration, and my opinion about the events at al-Safra will not change."

Dany Sham'un was asked about his assessment of the statement made by his father the day before yesterday. He answered: "Former President Sham'un has made plans for the Party, and everybody has expressed his relief upon hearing the statement. This is what was expected." Dany Sham'un talked about his view of the situation now that about a month has passed since the 7 July events. He said: "The events of 7 July will not change anything. The ports are back in operation, the tributes imposed have increased, and the hashish which had been confiscated has now been returned to its owners, with a promise that they will be able to export it."

Dany Sham'un then wondered: "What did they accomplish through the events of 7 July? The only thing they did was to weaken the ranks of existing fighting forces, because the fighters of the NLP have left the forces of the Lebanese Front."

Dany Sham'un said that the increase in migration from the eastern areas [of Beirut] is due to the fact that members of the NLP are subjected to harassment. Anyone who wants to think for himself has got to either go along with the one-party system, or face an unknown fate. This was discussed by former President Sham'un in his statement."

Concerning the disturbances which have been going on in al-Ashrafiyah, Dany Sham'un said: "They--that is, the Phalangists--are conducting inquiries, and have accused the Palestinians. In any case, they have announced through the 7 July massacre that they want to live under this type of climate of terror, and they want to impose it on the people in general."

He went on to say: "We have nothing to do with these disturbances. These actions are against the principles of the NLP. We have never engaged in such activities, and we have never believed in such a thing at all."

[Question] After the events of 7 July, some government officials demanded that the Lebanese Army take over the responsibility for security in some of the more sensitive areas. What has become of these plans?

[Answer] I do not know. These plans were mentioned as being among the actions to be undertaken by the "government of political activists." But this government has not been born yet.

(Concerning the Phalangist television station which, it is rumored, will soon start its transmissions, he said:) As far as I know, it is the government which is utilizing Channel 12. I do not believe that the government will yield to such violations of the law. This is the only information that I have.

[Question] If Mr al-Sulh withdraws as premier-designate, would you be in favor of keeping the outgoing government afloat?

[Answer] This decision depends on former President Sham'un. However, there is nothing wrong with the outgoing government, and there is no reason not to keep it afloat.

[Question] The ministry of defense has announced that the army now numbers 23,000 people. Do you believe that it is now capable of assuming broader security functions?

[Answer] This figure includes both soldiers and administrative personnel. The army reorganization project provides that, with compulsory military service, the number of personnel in the army could reach 40,000. A large number of officers and administrative personnel are needed to handle 40,000 people. And this is what is happening. The number of soldiers in the army now is only 12,000. According to my information, two-thirds of the army right now is already being used in security functions. The remaining third is a sort of reserve.

[Question] People are fearful of a new eruption in the country, particularly in the north. What do you anticipate with regard to this?

[Answer] There is a massing of Phalangist units in the north, and there are delusions about what has been called "the battle of liberation." If there is such a "liberation" move, it will begin in the north, and will kill more Christians in the north than were killed in the events of 7 July. If the situation does explode in the north, the result will be new crimes committed by Bashir al-Jumayyil's forces.

[Question] Different interpretations have been given to your visit to Jordan. What is the truth about this visit?

[Answer] There exists a deep friendship between King Hussein and me. That is why I visit Jordan, and that is why I will continue to do so.

During my whole life, I have never exploited this friendship for any personal or political reason. I went to Jordan to rest, to familiarize myself with the situation in the Middle East as a whole, and to explain what has been happening in Lebanon. This is all there was to it.

[Question] There are reports that the reason for your visit to Jordan was to try to acquire 80 tanks. Are these reports true?

[Answer] There is a matter of purchasing weapons for the Lebanese Army from the Jordanian Army. This is on the state level; it is the state which deals with these matters. I am always ready to offer any service to the state that would help strengthen the army.

[Question] Efforts are being made to redeploy the forces of the Lebanese Front. In particular, there are efforts to arrange a meeting between you and Bashir al-Jumayyil. Has anything come of these efforts?

[Answer] There have been no contacts, and no contacts are under consideration. I expressed my opinion on this matter in the first statement I made after the events of al-Safra. I am not in the habit of changing my mind every 5 minutes.

NATIONAL LIBERAL PARTY PLANS RETALIATION AGAINST PHALANGE

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 3 Sep 80 p 4

[Article: "Information About a Phalange Decision to Liquidate Al-Hanash (the Snake), Al-Zaghlul (the Squab) and Al-Wahsh (the Brute) Units of the NLP; Reorganization of Cells and a Secret Plan of Action for 'The Tigers' of NLP"]

[Text] Information received from the eastern area [of Beirut] yesterday confirmed that the dispute between the Phalange and National Liberal Party [NLP] has begun to widen within party cadres and to threaten to develop into a new phase of bloody conflict.

Contacts which took place over the past 48 hours between President Camille Sham'un and Pierre al-Jumayyil, and the meeting between President of the Republic Ilyas Sarkis and the secretary of defense or the NLP, Dany Sham'un, resulted in removal of Phalangist barricades from the streets of the eastern area, and the pullback from the approaches of al-Ashrafiyah area. Nevertheless, reports confirm that the military leaders of "the Tigers of the Liberals" are examining a secret plan of operations focussing on retaliation for the 7 July events. A statement distributed yesterday in the name of "the Tigers of the Liberals--Leadership of the Retaliators Movement--Carlos" threatened to kill 17 leading Phalangist leaders, including Bashir al-Jumayyil, whom the statement viewed as responsible for the 7 July events.

News reports state that a meeting was held the day before yesterday at the headquarters of "the Tigers of the Liberals--al-Hanash" at "the Embassy Palace" in 'Ayn al-Rummanah. It was decided to prepare a secret plan of operations, and to create three cells which would handle the task of retaliation for the events of 7 July. It was followed by an evening meeting between al-Zaghlul, al-Hanash and al-Wahsh during which the issue of the cells in al-Ashrafiyah was discussed.

Sources in the NLP indicate that the party had received information about a Phalangist plan to liquidate al-Hanash, al-Zaghlul and al-Wahsh, noting that the NLP had asked these to maintain maximum vigilance.

The same sources concluded that the party has laid down a plan to change the headquarters of "the Tigers of the Liberals."

A group of Tigers, calling themselves "the Movement for Retaliators," announced in a statement distributed yesterday, and signed by "Carlos," that the dispute of the Liberals with the Phalange is not recent.

The statement said: "The first contrived incident between the Phalange and the Liberals occurred in a bar in Juniyah near the municipal playground. The incident was over a bar girl when Joseph al-Bustani killed Muhammad al-Qadi, who became a martyr of the Lebanese cause. After this incident, the Phalangist party council despatched forces from Qism al-Rumayl, 'Ayn al-Rummanah and Furn al-Shubbak, which surrounded and blew up the headquarters of the Liberals, killing five people inside. They also occupied other NLP quarters in Sarba, burning the vehicle of President Sham'un and beating up his aides."

The statement added: "President Sham'un had always intervened to block retaliation to dozens of similar incidents, until the incident when the Phalange shelled the holy places in 'Anaya. When Liberal personnel sought asylum at the building of the Society of Saint Sharbal, following an attack on their headquarters and the shooting of a group of Liberals in spite of a ceasefire agreement, Phalangist elements shelled the building with field artillery and tanks."

The statement continued: "These incidents led to the intervention of NLP personnel from al-Safra and their monitoring of the movements of the Phalangist personnel. Therefore, the Phalangists decided to wipe them out even if it cost them, as the head of the Phalangist military council put it, 150 dead and the destruction of half the area."

The statement said that the phalangists began to create problems in the Liberals' areas, which led to the incident of the killing of Joseph Ghawi (liberal) and the wounding of his companion in Wadi Shahrur. This was followed by a retaliatory NLP decision which the Phalange Party viewed as "an effort to wipe it out of southern al-Matn." Thereupon, a meeting of the Phalangist Politburo was held on Saturday, 5 July, and "approval was given for the treacherous operation."

The statement went on to mention the deceit which the Phalange fighters used in attacking al-Safra and wiping out everyone there on 7 July. The statement concluded that the Tigers of the Liberals will not forgive the Phalangists for what they have done, and that the "command of the Movement for Retaliators" had reached the following decision, irrespective of what decision the leadership of the Tigers of the Liberals or the NLP may take:

"To warn every Phalangist official who did not have a hand in the 7 July incidents to leave the Phalange Party, announce this in the press, and leave the country." Otherwise, he would meet an inevitable fate far worse than that of the citizens of the town of al-Safra, and would be on the same black list as the leaders of the operation. These include the following: Bashir al-Jumayyil, Dib Anastas, George Sha'nin, Ili Habiqah, Marun Mash'alani, Ili Sa'adah, Ilyan al-Zayik, Khawayri, Joseph Na'im, Sasin and George Abu Shadid, Antoine Qardahi, Antoine 'Atallah, Mas'un Murad, and Qazhiya al-'Utayq. They also include the well known hero, Samir Ja'ja', and his aide, Sulayman al-Huwayk, as well as others. The decision states that the "retaliators movement" would pass sentences against all these persons, which would be implemented one after the other. This would be to pay back the culprits for what they did on 7 July, particularly to the personnel of "The Tigers of the Liberals--al-Wahsh Battalion," who would not collapse under a treacherous operation such as this.

PHALANGE MILITARY STRENGTH ASSESSED

Kuwait AL-TALI'AH in Arabic 10 Sep 80 pp 40-45

[Interview with Lt Col al-Haytham al-Ayyubi, Chief Editor and Publisher of AL-MAWSU'AH AL-'ASKARIYAH (Military Encyclopedia), and Prof Rubay' al-Asir, an editor of AL-MAWSU'AH AL-'ASKARIYAH; date and place not given]

[Text] On 7 July 1980, the Lebanese awoke to startling news: the Lebanese Phalange Party and its militia had wiped out once and for all the party of Camille Sham'un and his militia. The Phalange and Sham'un were old allies who had fought side by side against the Palestinian resistance and other nationalist forces in the Lebanese war, and both sides had good relations with the Zionist enemy.

However, over and above the political questions raised by this surprise liquidation, there are still some military questions one might ask. For example: What is the Phalange's military strength on the ground? What is the nature of its weapons and military organization? Is the Phalange, having finished off its number one ally in this savage manner, also trying to set off new battles with the Resistance and the Nationalist Forces? If that occurs, what is the balance of power between the parties concerned? We took these questions to AL-MAWSU'AH AL-'ASKARIYAH in Beirut, whose chief editor is Lt Col al-Haytham al-Ayyubi, one of the few people with extensive advanced expertise in military and strategic affairs. There, we had an interview with Lt Col al-Ayyubi; and with Prof Rubay' al-Asir, an expert in strategic military affairs and an editor of AL-MAWSU'AH AL-'ASKARIYAH.

Following are the details of this interview:

[Question] I would like to ask first about the size of the Phalange's military strength and the nature of its arms and structure.

[Al-Ayyubi] With regard to the Phalange, there is a certain amount of illusion about its military strength, arising from confusion between the number of "combatants" and a number of "armed individuals." The fact is that given the deteriorating economic circumstances, particularly in some areas such as industry and tourism, a Phalangist military-economic establishment has begun to take form. This establishment comprises those persons who are out of work, those who are living in a sort of disguised unemployment, and all those persons who joined armed organizations, their new mission becoming in reality the bearing of arms. In such circumstances, the number of those armed men rises or falls depending on the economic situation, job opportunities or working conditions. Therefore, we find that there is a relatively small number of intellectuals, technicians, craftsmen and skilled laborers in the Phalange armed organization or other similar organizations.

In fact, unskilled labor constitutes the bulk of the armed men. Their numbers are large. While some of them, probably the bulk of them, see weapons as a way to make a living, there are some who accept them merely to overcome feelings of inferiority, or because of emotional zeal honed by the glitter of a weapon, or for self-protection, etc. They all carry arms and there are a lot of them. However, they cannot perform complex military functions, for example, engaging in secret or regular military movements, for example. They are not qualified for such types of combat.

[Al-Asir] The truth is Lt Col al-Ayyubi's insight is very important and critical, as this is the substance of the real Phalangist military strength. However, we must point out that the Phalange Party has a relatively qualified military force numbering between 4,000 to 6,000 combatants. The Phalange is intent on developing a true diversified and combat-ready regular military force.

[Al-Ayyubi] I would like to make a distinction among various terms and concepts involving military affairs. There is a difference, an essential difference between the word killer [qatil] and the word combatant [muqatil], between fighting [qital] and combat [iqtital], between an army [jaysh] and a band ['isabah], and so on. These are expressions that must be used very carefully because mixing up such things can obscure the facts.

[Question] It would appear that al-Asir was not finished talking.

[Al-Asir] I wanted to say that the Phalange is in earnest about developing a regular military force. The original infrastructure of this force is a number of regular military men who served in the Lebanese army and who joined the Phalange in one way or another. The Phalange is working to make the transition from the militia stage, which Lt Col al-Ayyubi talked about accurately, to the stage of a regular military force able to engage in more complex field operations.

What al-Ayyubi said is important, because it shed light on forces in motion, and on whether the Phalange, in its present form, can operate with regular military methods. It is very difficult for the armed individual to move from one quarter to another to fight there. The militias are made up of armed men of specific locales, and they are not good at launching an offensive outside their locale. This is not the case, naturally, with regular trained and qualified military forces.

[Question] Could you acquaint us a little bit with the sources of the Phalange's regular military strength?

[Al-Ayyubi] The main sources are the unemployed and those persons who benefit from carrying arms. Secondly, there is the Lebanese army which constitutes a source of Phalangist military strength. Thirdly, there is personnel which has been trained within the Zionist entity. Lastly, there are the militia who were put in special training camps for limited periods, and whose training was supervised by Lebanese officers and possibly by Zionist officers as well.

[Question] And the sources of the arms?

[Al-Ayyubi] The Phalange has a mixed bag of arms. There are Eastern bloc arms purchased from the arms merchants who, in turn, bought them from the Zionist entity and other markets. I say from the Zionist entity, because in the 1967 war, the enemy seized large quantities of these weapons. The Phalange also buys Western arms from open markets and from arms merchants who buy arms that have gone out of service or are surplus to army requirements in this or that country. There is no moral or political impediment to the arms trade.

[Al-Asir] Weapons have no homeland or identity.

[Question] So much for the sources of weapons. I would like to get some enlightenment about the technological aspect of the Phalange's arms. Does the Phalange have modern weapons, for example?

[Al-Ayyubi] Most are light and medium weapons, from rifles to machineguns. The Phalange has infantry type weapons, light arms. The Phalange has certainly seized weapons from the Lebanese army, but we must not exaggerate the weapons of the Lebanese army itself. The weapons of the Lebanese army are no more than the weapons of an artillery brigade. In any case, the weapons of the Lebanese army have been divided up by a number of factions. However, regardless of the nature of the Phalange's weaponry, it has its very own perspective of such issues. This perspective has created a feeling on the part of the Phalange that they are strong. Are they really strong, given the balance of power?

[Al-Asir] The Phalange has MX-13 tanks. These were weapons of the Lebanese army and are light compared with modern tanks.

[Al-Ayyubi] These are tanks of the 50's. When the Lebanese army used them, they mounted heavy guns on them, but their accuracy became poor. Then came the Sherman tanks, which the enemy modified into Super-Shermans. The Phalange got them in their modified form. These were tanks of the 40's generation. Today they belong to the 50's generation of tanks. So they are not tanks but mobile gun platforms. These tanks may be very useful for the Phalange in military reviews and shows. They might attract the notice of the average onlooker at the reviews, but reviews are one thing and fighting is something else. Naturally this tank gives the owner the feeling that he has a tank. This, in reality, is a lethal feeling, because it could motivate the Phalange to move on the basis that it has a military force, when it really does not have such a force as measured by the balance of real military strength.

[Question] It appears that al-Asir wants to say something.

[Al-Asir] The colonel has defined the general outlines of the response. I would add only one observation, that is, that the Phalange's armaments do not constitute a major threat if taken in isolation from other outside forces, such as the enemy, for example. The Palestinian Resistance has military capabilities and weaponry far superior to that held by the Phalange.

[Al-Ayyubi] Arms, equipment, training, etc.

[Al-Asir] Yes, this is true, but were the Nationalist Forces forced to fight on two fronts, one against the Zionist enemy and the other against the Phalange, the Phalange's weaponry would have a significant effect. Naturally, this is a possibility.

[Al-Ayyubi] Draw a comparison between the T-34 tank and the Super Sherman.

[Al-Asir] Naturally, it has become known that the Palestinian Resistance has T-34 tanks. My observation about the point under discussion is that the Phalange is moving to improve its military capabilities. Of course, this is governed by a number of considerations and constraints, for example, the existence of sufficient manpower, the capability to absorb the weapons, and the extent of Phalange capability to secure sources of advanced support. There are also the local political constraints.

[Al-Ayyubi] There are some constraints by Arab elements which are the chief financiers of the Phalange in countering the Nationalist Forces. The fear of these forces by these elements has prompted them to slip blindly into bolstering the Phalange. However, will this support continue, if the battles resume, bearing the scenario laid out by al-Asir in mind?

I would like to say in brief that, given the existence of the Nationalist and Resistance forces and the deterrent forces, the Phalangist strength has no significant effectiveness. Its relative effectiveness will begin when Syria and the Resistance are preoccupied with the Zionist threat. In such a circumstance, any weapon becomes useable.

[Question] What is the Phalange's fundamental dilemma?

[Al-Ayyubi] It is the shrinking of the Christian territory. At the start of the Lebanese war, this territory was relatively extensive. Then the north, that is, the north of former President Sulayman Franjiyah, split away. Prior to this there was the dispute between the Phalange and Raymond Iddih, leader of the Christian Jubayl area; the repeated attempts to assassinate him; and his departure for Paris. Finally, the Phalange directed its military strike at Camille Sham'un himself. This is an aspect of the basic dilemma of the Phalange. It means that the Maronite Christian leadership is fragmenting away from the Phalange. The other aspect is the psychological state of mind of the Christian man in the street. At the beginning of the war, the Phalangist armed individual was told that he was fighting against the Syrian and Palestinian "strangers." Then it became evident that the Palestinian Resistance is not properly categorized militarily, and he was told: "You are fighting for one, democratic Lebanon." The Phalange armed individual then saw Lebanon split within itself with the Phalange liquidating its allies around it. He was told: "You are fighting for civilization and culture." Then the combatant observed that school certificates are obtained at the point of a gun now, and that murder and excesses, have become a daily policy of the Phalange. He was told: "You are fighting against the Islamic danger or an Arab threat with an Islamic stamp." Then it became evident that Maronite Christians are more zealous defenders of Arabism than the Muslims. All this has fragmented the articles and central points of faith of the Phalangist psychological mobilization.

The average Christian citizen has found that with the Phalangist authorities he is more oppressed, worried, and unemployed, and that elimination of government security has not made local security any better of a situation. All this has made the average citizen lose any tendency to be swayed by the correctness of the Phalangist plan and the credibility of the Phalangist allegations and slogans. This is a terrible crisis for the Phalange. It is covered up today only by the lack of any battles with other factions. This dilemma means that the Phalangist military strength in fact lacks underpinnings.

[Question] I do not know how accurate the postulates presented by al-Ayyubi are. I think that, after the 7 July strike by the Phalange against the militia of its ally, Camille Sham'un (which made the other militias lay down their arms), the picture has begun to change over the last few days. At 'Id Mar Ilyas [Saint Elias Holiday], the Phalange ordered that there be no firing in the air, and, in fact, this stopped. The people have begun to sense a new sort of security imposed by the Phalange.

[Al-Asir] I would like to comment on this. One must make a distinction between two levels with regard to 7 July. First, prior to 7 July, the Phalange had achieved a high military technology compared with the other militias and the militia of Camille Sham'un. This emerged clearly in the operation to wipe out the supporters of Camille Sham'un. Naturally this elimination left negative reactions at first but, with regard to the Phalange, it demonstrated that it was capable of building its own military force and sending it into battle, even against Camille Sham'un. The elimination of Sham'un's group and the perpetration of crimes does not compare with the crimes perpetrated at Tall al-Za'atar. Second, there is a stage that will follow 7 July. I think that the Phalange can gradually blunt unfavorable reactions to it. Fear on the part of the average Christian citizen of the Phalange and its violence will make it very difficult to put up any form of opposition against it.

With that, I would like to go back to another part of the interview. We talked about the Phalange's military strength within the context of the balance of power in general. The truth, as I see it, is that the Military struggle in the area has a variety of degrees. The Phalange can serve the Zionists, not only in open and extensive conflict. There are things it can come up with, such as preoccupying the Palestine Resistance and distracting its operations, for example. Even with regard to the Arab Deterrent Forces, the Phalange has been able to exercise a sort of attrition against it. We recall the battles of the Deterrent Forces against the Phalange, and we remember that the political circumstances at the time prevented decisive action against the Phalange. This could recur.

[Al-Ayyubi] True, this is true. The Phalange is required during this phase to distract, to attempt to distract the Nationalist Forces to keep Camp David going.

[Question] Let's move on to another point. Are there aspects of similarity between the Phalange's military organizations and those of the Zionist army for example?

[Al-Ayyubi] There is one and only one aspect of similarity, that is, the psychological aspect. There is no material or organizational similarity.

[Question] Then I will ask about aspects of similarity with the Zionist army, not in its present state but at the early stages of its formation, for example.

[Al-Ayyubi] Early stages are always similar and all have one and same appearance. First, militias are created. Then, they evolve into companies and battalions and armies. The fact is, however, that we have not yet found signs of military similarity, that is, after the first stage, except for the psychological aspect, as I said.

The Phalange was originally a Fascist organization which believes in the superiority of the Lebanese individual and his separateness from the Arabs. It believes in violence, and this, in fact, is not just an accusation. Shaykh Pierre al-Jumayyil, the leader of the Phalange Party, says that his highest idol is Mussolini, and he never tires of advocating "a just tyrant." We can get a feeling of the Fascist stamp of the Phalange Party by taking a look at the history of its establishment, its symbols, the uniform of its personnel and its political behavior. This party was established in the early 30's, following the Fascist development in Germany and Italy. It then borrowed the Nazi and Fascist forms of organization and relations and adapted them to its personnel. It is also a racist party. Its only concern is to control Lebanon and to dominate it by force.

The fact is that the Zionists, just like the Phalange, have a sense of being wronged. These psychological similarities between the two sides on the level of the subconscious, the individual and the organization have produced forces similar psychologically, forces that rely on widespread terrorism.

[Question] I would like to confine the interview to the Phalange. The Zionist problem is very complex. The fact is that the Maronites believe that they are a minority in a sea of an Islamic majority. What can a minority do if the majority is unjust and wants to impose upon it something contrary to its interests? This is the belief of political Maronite-ism in Lebanon and Maronites are very sensitive about this complex.

[Al-Asir] Before answering this point directly, I would like to add something about the facts of Bashir al-Jumayyil's plan. He is, in fact, trying to emulate the experience of Ben Gurion in building a unified military force. We know that even in the second half of the 40's, the Zionist parties in Palestine were suffering from a proliferation of military forces. There were the Irgun, the Stern Gang, the Palmach and others. Ben Gurion, who established the Zionist state, unified these forces; he could not, in fact, have established the Zionist state without doing so.

Bashir al-Jumayyil is pursuing this course of action. He wants to consolidate Maronite military strength. The difference, however, is that Ben Gurion did not unify them by force. Bashir al-Jumayyil appears to be in a real hurry, even if it causes the death of hundreds of persons in just a few hours, as happened to Camille Sham'un's militia. There is another point that I think is an appropriate way to approach the full question, namely, the fact that despite attempts to emulate the Fascist parties, the Phalangist plan remains a caricature of them. We understand the reasons for the rise of Nazism in Germany, for example. There were powerful economic factors behind it. The Phalangist plan runs smack into an important obstacle: the Christian brothers, even the Phalange, rely economically on the surrounding Arab sea. The second point is that Nazism and Fascism are both based on the existence of the fatherlands of Germany and Italy. The Phalangist plan is pursued, not readily or through consent, by a mere religious sect, the Phalange, just like Zionism. From this standpoint, it is trying to give religion and a sect the character of a fatherland. However, if we look around us, we see that mankind is trying to get beyond these narrow differences. Europe, for example, is trying to consolidate its strength in one bloc. This represents quite the opposite of the Phalangist plan, which has an extremely narrow sectarian range. Finally, we should point out that the Maronite Christian sect is bound by common destiny with the Arab world. These bonds cannot be eliminated.

[Al-Ayyubi] Economic bonds too.

[Al-Asir] This is very true. The number of Maronites in the Gulf area is very great, and the Maronite Christian sect is very dependent on the funds of its sons there.

[Al-Ayyubi] The fact is that the apprehensions which the Maronites raise find their justification in conditions in the Arab countries. You cannot ignore the fact that the Phalange would not be what it is today, if the surrounding Arab environment were different. The Maronites raise the issue of their fear of the tie between Arabism and Islam. Had they faced a secular Arab society that had a contemporary concept of pan-Arabism and religion as a relationship between a worshipper and his God, their fear would have no basis. However, the general thrust is to confuse Arabism with Islam, and this gives the Maronite fear some credibility in the mind of the average Maronite.

Maronite isolation from the Arab arena is basically a mistaken view. However, were the Arabs to seriously raise the banner of war against Zionism, this Maronite isolation would have no justification. But when the president of a leading Arab country makes a visit to occupied Jerusalem, he lends credence to the Maronite isolation.

In general, we note that all the Maronite arguments for isolation are mistaken. However, the Arab reality does suffice to give these arguments some passing credibility and justification. We must say here that given a strong and combative democratic, sectarian Arab society, the credibility of the arguments for Maronite isolationism would be almost spontaneously repudiated. If an Arab Hanoi or Prussia (a united militant society) were in existence, Maronite-ism would lose the focal points of its psychological strength, and the Maronites' fear would gradually disappear. The Maronites would then experience a rapprochement with the Arabs as an originally inseparable part of the Arab world.

I still should say one more thing about 7 July, when Bashir al-Jumayyil dealt a death blow to Camille Sham'un's militia. The fact is that the achievement of the "7 July Movement," as Bashir al-Jumayyil calls it, has been exaggerated. Why? It is true that the Phalange was able to wipe out Sham'un militarily in a few hours. However, from a military standpoint, if you want to occupy a position or raid a target, the first problem you face is that of information about the position or target. Most battles fail, because information was lacking or was wrong. If the information is available and is clear, as was the case with the Zionist entity in June 1967, when it was able to get extremely accurate information on the Arab armies, particularly the Egyptian army, success in battle is completely assured.

The fact is that the Phalange had detailed and very accurate information about the status of the forces of Camille Sham'un's militia. The Phalange and Sham'un's militia were allies who had fought together for years in the same trench. Everything was known: arms, disposition of forces, movements, etc. For Bashir al-Jumayyil to have had all this clear from the start gave the Phalange's battle against Sham'un a 90 percent chance of success before it ever started. Bashir al-Jumayyil only took care of the remaining 10 percent. This is in no way outstanding. The seventh of July is a big figment of the imagination; there are many similar examples. General Bashir al-Jumayyil, like General Moshe Dayan in 1967, won a victory he did not deserve. Camille Sham'un could say to Bashir al-Jumayyil after this blow, "Et tu Brute?"

LEBANESE-EEC PROTOCOL PROVIDES ASSISTANCE TO LEBANON

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 11 Aug 80 p 6

[Article: "Text of the Financial Protocol With the EEC; Departments Concerned Are Preparing Their Observations and Getting Ready To Appoint Their Members of the Joint Council"]

[Text] The ministries of economy and trade, agriculture, and industry and oil, as well as the Customs Bureau, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, and the Association of Lebanese Industrialists, are preparing their observations concerning the trade agreement concluded with European Economic Community. They are also preparing to appoint their members in the Council of Joint Cooperation provided for in the agreement, especially in view of the fact that the council's decisions will be binding on both parties entering into the agreement.

This council will consist of representatives of Lebanon and of the member nations of the EEC.

Yesterday, the president of the Association of Lebanese Industrialists, Dr Fu'ad Abi Salih, assured AL-SAFIR that the association has already completed its observations concerning the agreement with the EEC, and that it would seek meetings with officials in the EEC to acquaint Europeans with Lebanese products and commodities. This is to be done by means of meetings and symposiums in an effort to promote Lebanese goods in European markets.

Abi Salih went on to say: "Our observations include a basic demand to ease the conditions imposed in the paragraph on certificates of origin, especially in view of the fact that our industry is mainly a processing industry. What I mean is that parts of the products manufactured in Lebanon are imported, in finished form, and cannot be considered to be of Lebanese origin."

He concluded: "Concerning the appointment of a representative of Lebanese industrialists to the Council of Cooperation, we are presently discussing the choice of the appropriate person for this position."

On the other hand, a source in the department of economy [of the ministry of economy and trade] yesterday assured AL-SAFIR that the ministry has already chosen its representative to the Council for Cooperation, based on a request from the ministry of foreign and expatriates affairs. The source added that the department is presently preparing its observations on the means of implementing the agreement with the EEC.

It is learned that the observations of the ministry of economy will be based on its suggestions concerning the financial and technical protocol of the agreement. Here is the text of the protocol.

Article 1. Within the framework of technical and financial cooperation, the EEC shall participate in financing activities which will help Lebanon's economic and social development.

Article 2.1. To achieve the goals defined in Article 1, and for a period of time ending on 31 October 1981, it will be possible to conclude contracts totalling up to 30 million European monetary units, to be distributed as follows:

a. 20 million European monetary units in the form of loans from the European Investment Bank--hereafter referred to as "the Bank." These loans will be granted from the Bank's own resources, in accordance with its by-laws.

b. 2 million European monetary units in the form of loans in accordance with special conditions.

c. 8 million European monetary units in the form of aid not to be repaid.

It is possible to utilize shares for the formation of risk capital charged to the account of the amounts indicated in (b) above.

Article 2.2. To the loans referred to in paragraph 2.1.a., an interest grant, not to exceed 2 percent, shall be added, as a general rule. This grant shall be financed by means of the capital indicated in paragraph 2.1.c.

Article 3.1. The funds defined in Article 2 shall be used for financing or for participation in financing:

--Projects in which capital is invested in the field of production and of building the economic infrastructure, particularly projects which aim at diversifying Lebanon's economic foundation, strengthening its industry, and modernizing its agricultural sector.

--Preliminary or complementary technical cooperation on capital investment projects of Lebanon.

--Technical cooperation in the realm of training.

Article 3.2. EEC aid shall be set aside to cover the expenditures necessary to carry out the projects and activities agreed upon. It shall not be used to cover normal administrative expenses, maintenance expenses, or normal operational expenses.

Article 4. Conditions for financing or participation in the financing of projects and activities referred to in Article 3, in keeping with the provisions of Articles 2 and 6, shall be determined in accordance with the nature and particular characteristics of each project or activity.

Article 5.1. The funds, which must be procured each year, for each form of aid involved, shall be acquired as (evenly?) as possible over the duration of this protocol. However, amounts procured in the first phase of application may, within reasonable limits, be somewhat higher.

Article 5.2. Any balance of amounts not procured by 31 October 1981, may be used until it runs out. This shall be in accordance with the conditions laid down in this protocol.

Article 6.1. Loans granted by the Bank from its own resources shall have conditions relating to a period of time established on the basis of the economic and financial features of the projects for which these loans are granted. The interest rate shall be the rate used by the Bank on the date that each loan contract is signed, bearing in mind the interest grant previously referred to in Article 2.2.

Article 6.2. Loans having special conditions shall be granted for a period of 40 years, and have to be used within a period of 10 years. The interest rate for these loans shall be set at 1 percent.

Article 6.3. The loans may be granted through nations or appropriate Lebanese government agencies, provided that the money be loaned to the users according to conditions established with the approval of the EEC, on the basis of the economic and financial features of the projects.

Article 7. If Lebanon agrees to it, the aid offered by the EEC for carrying out specific projects may assume the form of joint financing involving the participation of international financial agencies, or credit and development institutions in Lebanon, in member states of the EEC, or in third-party nations.

Article 8. Those entitled to benefit from this financial and technical cooperation are:

a. In general, the state of Lebanon.

b. The following organizations, with the approval of the state of Lebanon, for projects or activities approved by it:

--Lebanese public agencies.

--Private enterprises in Lebanon which are active in the field of economic and social development.

--Enterprises which pursue their activities in accordance with [modern] industrial and commercial methods and which are organized as corporations in accordance with Lebanese legislation.

--Groups of Lebanese producers. In exceptional cases, where such groups are nonexistent, the individual producers themselves.

--Holders of study grants and trainees who are sent abroad by Lebanon within the framework of training projects referred to in Article 3 above.

Article 9.1. As soon as the agreement is implemented, both Lebanon and the EEC, by mutual agreement, shall establish definite goals for their financial and technical cooperation in accordance with priorities determined in the Lebanese development plan.

By mutual agreement, these goals may be revised so that they take into consideration changes which take place in the Lebanese economic situation and in the goals and priorities determined in the development plan.

Article 9.2. Financial and technical cooperation, within the framework established under Article 9.1 above, shall apply to projects and activities established by Lebanon or by other users judged acceptable by Lebanon.

Article 10.1. Users referred to in Article 8.a., or, in agreement with Lebanon, users referred to in Article 8.b., shall submit to the EEC a file concerning each request for financial aid under this protocol.

Article 10.2. The EEC shall study each request for financing, jointly with the Lebanese state and the users, in accordance with the goals defined in Article 9.1, and shall inform them of the results of its study of these requests.

Article 11. The implementation, administration, and performance of operations and activities to be financed in accordance with this protocol are the responsibility of Lebanon or of the other users referred to in Article 8 of this protocol.

The EEC shall ascertain that the use of this aid is carried out in accordance with allotments made and is carried out under the best possible economic conditions.

Article 12.1. Concerning the projects and activities which the EEC agrees to finance, participation in invitations to bid on contracts and subcontracts shall be open on equal terms to all natural and legal persons in the member states of the EEC and Lebanon.

Article 12.2. In order to promote the participation of Lebanese enterprises in the implementation of business transactions, it shall be permitted to lay down expeditious guidelines regarding invitations to bid which call for short time periods of time for the submission of bids. This will be based on proposals by the relevant agency of the EEC in situations which, by virtue of the size and scope of the project, are particularly suited to Lebanese enterprises.

It shall be permitted to set up these expeditious guidelines in situations where the amount involved is less than 1 million European monetary units.

Article 12.3. In exceptional cases, and by mutual agreement, it shall be possible to allow the participation of other countries in the transactions financed by the EEC. In addition to this, it shall be possible, under the same conditions, to allow the participation of third-party countries when the EEC participates in the financing of the operations together with other financiers.

Article 13. Within the framework of its national laws in effect, Lebanon shall apply, to the transactions and contracts concluded for the purpose of carrying out the projects and activities financed by the EEC, a suitable customs and taxation system, such as the system applied to other international organizations.

Article 14. When a loan is granted to a user other than the Lebanese state, the EEC shall have the right to attach to this loan a condition requiring the Lebanese state to submit collateral or other adequate guarantees.

Article 15. Lebanon shall commit itself, for the duration of the period of the loans granted in accordance with the provisions of this protocol, to put at the disposal of the borrowers using these loans sufficient foreign currency to make interest payments and repayments of principal.

Article 16. The Council of Cooperation shall annually study the results of the technical and financial cooperation. This council shall, when necessary, revise the guidelines of this cooperation.

SPECIAL BUREAU IN THE SOUTH TO LICENSE INDUSTRIAL PROJECTS

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 10 Aug 80 p 6

[Article by Muhammad Salih: "The Head of the Regional Bureau of Industry in the South Grants Licenses to Aluminum, Oxygen, and Furniture Plants"]

[Text] Saida--The Regional Bureau of Industry in the South has begun its work. The first thing it did was to receive applications from southern Lebanese industrialists concerning the inauguration of industrial plants and establishments, the granting of licenses for plants which are under construction, and the exempting from customs duties of factory equipment being imported for the plants of southern Lebanon.

The head of the Regional Bureau of Industry in the South Hilal Zantut, told AL-SAFIR that right after it was opened, the bureau has been flooded with industry-related applications which used to be submitted to the ministry of industry and oil in Beirut before the establishment of the regional bureau. The applications are for such things as certificates of origin from local industries (in Saida and southern Lebanon), in accordance with which goods are exported abroad, especially to the Gulf countries. Applications are also for industrial certificates about the current status of some of the plants and factories in the South, for submission to customs bureau and border posts in connection with the import of basic materials needed for industries in the south. The bureau also receives applications for certificates regarding processed and dehydrated products. The bureau is also engaged in issuing industrial certificates to existing enterprises which have large installations, equipment, and machinery, for submission to departments concerned.

With regard to new industrial enterprises, Zantut said that the bureau has conducted field inspections of six new plants in Saida and vicinity. These industries include iron and aluminum plants, a machinery plant, a furniture factory and a lumber mill. All of these plants were given licenses. The bureau also officially registered various plants in the environs of Saida--in Kafr Hunah, Jizzin, Mashmushah, and al-Ghassaniyah.

Zantut went on to say that the bureau has received an application to establish a fully equipped plant for producing oxygen. This would be the first plant of its type in southern Lebanon. Such a plant would supply oxygen to all hospitals and industrial establishments. The cost of this project would be more than 20 million Lebanese pounds. The bureau has given legal approval to the entrepreneurs so that they may proceed with bringing in the necessary machinery, equipment, and raw materials.

MONETARY LIQUIDITY IN GULF REGION DISCUSSED

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 10 Sep 80 p 16

[Article: "Liquidity in Gulf States Is Subject to Interest Rates and Freedom To Transfer Funds Abroad"]

[Text] The economic bulletin of the central banks and monetary establishments of the Arabian Gulf countries states that local liquidity in the Arabian Gulf nations, except for Iraq, was affected by various factors. The most important of these are:

1. In the economics of a free market, short term interest rates play a major role in the movement of capital from abroad into the country. Therefore, the interest rate has a direct effect on the condition of the balance of payments, and, consequently, on fluctuations in the rate of growth of local liquidity (the money supply).

2. The nature of the makeup of the money supply in the six states differs from that in Iraq. One notices that the volume of deposits is predominant among the elements of local liquidity, be it with regard to the money supply in the strict sense of the term [M1], or with regard to the money supply in the broad sense of the term [M2]. The table below indicates the ratio of currency in circulation to the money supply for the period between 1974 and 1978.

The volume of the money supply is affected by the conduct of three sectors of the economy: the monetary authorities, the commercial banks and the public. Since it is the public which keeps the currency in circulation, the ratio of the currency to the total money supply is an indication of the public's conduct and reflects the public's desire to hold on to the currency, as opposed to depositing it in banks. In other words, the decline in the ratio of currency to total liquidity in the six Gulf states means that monetary policy can utilize quantitative and qualitative currency measures available to it in a better and a more effective fashion than it otherwise would, had the ratio of currency to the money supply been high.

3. The financial and money markets in some Gulf states are growing, and foreign exchange operations are conducted freely in these markets. This means that the incentive behind demand for currency may not be confined to business purposes, but extends to investments and speculation in the local financial and money markets or in the international markets.

4. The nature of the banking system's business and the private sector's interest in it require that the monetary authorities use their quantitative and qualitative measures with flexibility and in a progressive manner for the purpose of influencing the performance of these banks, and, consequently, influencing local liquidity. For all these reasons, the monetary authorities in the six Gulf states (except for Iraq) have to resort to several measures to achieve the required state of equilibrium and influence excess local liquidity. The following are some of these measures:

First, influencing the ability of commercial banks to grant credit through measures based on the ratio of reserves to deposits, the rediscount rate, and open market operations. The first and second measures may be the most suitable for the monetary authorities in the Arab Gulf states.

Second, adopting a flexible interest rate policy consistent with prevailing international interest rates, to influence the stable movement of capital from and into these countries.

Third, working to pay for construction contracts in foreign currencies rather than in the local currency.

Fourth, resorting to issuing bonds in local currency for either the local family sector or for foreign lenders. In addition to absorbing [excess] liquid funds available to the public, this measure would develop the financial market, and, accordingly, increase the effectiveness of open market operations to influence local liquidity.

The State	The Ratio of Currency to the Money Supply in the Narrow Sense [M1]	The Ratio of Currency to the Money Supply in the Broad Sense [M2]
Iraq	76.5 percent	54.2 percent
The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia	45.3	41.2
Kuwait	33.8	10.4
United Arab Emirates	26.2	10.2
Qatar	24.8	14.0
Bahrain	27.5	11.6
Oman	52.6	30.8

MZALI ADDRESSES UTICA CONGRESS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 26 Sep 80 pp 4-5

[Speech by Mohamed Mzali, prime minister and secretary general of the Destourien Socialist Party, at the opening of the Ninth UTICA [Tunisian Union for Industry, Trade, and Crafts]: "National Unity Can Last Only If It Is Based On Social Justice"]

[Text] Dear brother Ferjani Belhaj Ammar, congress chairman;

My dear colleagues;

Honorable guests;

Dear brothers and sisters:

I am proud to declare this congress open on behalf of the Supreme Fighter President Habib Bourguiba. I thank your organization for having invited us and given us a fraternal welcome. I wish your congress success. I wish that it be not only the occasion for drawing a balance and evaluating the results of 5 years of activity but that it also include the drafting of a plan for the years to come and be a substantial contribution to the next Sixth National Plan which, as you know, for the past several months has been the target of our preparations and concertations, and for which we are providing all the necessary prerequisites for success.

I would like most particularly to join my brother Ferjani Belhaj Ammar in greeting our brothers once again, the Arab businessmen who are honoring us with their presence and who have honored us in the past by holding their congress in the capital of the Republic of Tunisia. The holding of their congress in Tunis and their presence among us today mark a new constructive and generous start in the field of horizontal and fraternal cooperation among the economic activists of the Arab fatherland. That is what I told them yesterday. I believe that by developing such cooperation and rediscovering ourselves after centuries of intellectual and political isolation from the Arab countries we are multiplying our strength and insuring more firmly the invulnerability and independence of the Arab nation, for the Arab fatherland has all the necessary prerequisites for success: human potential, a steadily growing and enthusiastic youth, natural resources, particularly rich agricultural potential, and cadres of all kinds. However, this great Arab fatherland has been unable to coordinate its possibilities or formulate plans which could promote the renaissance of the Arab peoples because of colonization which not only sucked our blood and took away our wealth but developed in us a number of complexes and mental deformations. Some people among us could see things only in a vertical way, if I may say so, and were afflicted by a kind of blindness whenever they tried to see things horizontally. This was the result of colonization, cultural colonization in particular. In order to heal ourselves from the ill of colonization and get rid of the shame of its consequences we must carry out a cultural revolution in our minds. We must undertake an examination of our consciences and adopt a new view of realities. We must open our arms to one another, shake hands, help one another and jointly struggle for life. In your name, therefore, I greet them.

I hope--this being a hope rather than a simple wish--that this meeting will become the starting point of a very important stage in the area of cooperation. I ask the Tunisian businessmen and merchants to make an effort in this direction. Tunisia is a country known for its open nature and Arab-Muslim authenticity, the patriotism of its children and the ability of its people to win over difficulties and even achieve the impossible despite modest resources. Today we must gradually triumph over the consequences of colonialism in order to become truly free in the same way that yesterday we defeated colonialism.

I also greet the small merchants, the Tunisian merchants and businessmen you represent. I take this opportunity to recall with pride the participation of the UTICA in our victory in our struggle for national liberation. I do not believe it would be historically wrong to claim that the UTICA is the first national organization founded by the party immediately after World War II, in 1945. Our elders recall the contribution of the marchants, the petit merchants in particular, to the national movement.

The great majority of merchants, the petit merchants in particular, actively participated in the national struggle. Small or big, they supported the national movement by supplying the necessary funds or joining the resistance. A large number of them died for the fatherland. Those who are still alive recall the concentration camps and the jails. One of them is Serjani Belhaj Ammar. He effectively participated in the struggle and is familiar with jails and concentration camps. The comrades who are here today and many others have struggled, suffered, and lost their possessions. Our elders know that it was the petit merchants and craftsmen who went on strike and faced colonialism.

When the Supreme Fighter was arrested on 18 January 1952 all shops in the country remained closed for weeks on end. Again, when the great leader Farhat Hached was assassinated, it was the merchants who struck for days on end. This is a historical reality which we shall never forget.

We believe that the various social categories of the Tunisian people--merchants, craftsmen, workers, farmers, officials, teachers, and others--belong to a single family. There are no big gaps between these categories, there are merely a few small differences. It is this united family that rallied around the party and closed ranks under the banner of the great leader, the Supreme Fighter Habib Bourguiba.

Ever since we regained our freedom and our dignity, ever since the independence of our country, we have worked to strengthen the attributes of our sovereignty. We declared a merciless war to underdevelopment and poverty. All Tunisian population strata are continuing to contribute to this struggle.

This is the reason for the firmness of the ties uniting the PSD [Destourien Socialist Party], the UTICA, the UGTT [Tunisian General Federation of Labor], the UNA [National Farmers Union], the UNFT [National Union of Tunisian Women] and the youth organizations. This is not the result of an accident or of official considerations. Our answer to some of our brothers or friends who, unaware of our realities, are surprised by this, is that this is a historical reality; this is what we call national unity.

This national unity which is considered by some observers or some young people an empty slogan is flowing in our veins. It is a part of our being and it is vibrating in our hearts and our minds. It was born in the jails and it developed and strengthened at a time when our members were being killed by bullets. We believe that this national unity, which we built with our tears, hopes and sufferings at times of trial, must be considered essential, even vital if we want to remain united, challenge poverty and underdevelopment, build up our economy and build a strong, firm, dignified and prosperous state.

The struggle goes on. In the past its target was to free the country politically. Now its purpose is to eliminate the consequences of the colonial age and, specifically, poverty and underdevelopment inherited from centuries of decadence and aggravated by foreign domination.

Consequently, we cannot abandon our national unity. We must protect it from all ills. Our social strata must remain healthy. We must immunize our society against the viruses of imported ideologies which claim with Marx and his supporters that there are no classless societies.

For this reason, the state and the individuals must avoid in their economic activities anything which, in the long run, could trigger hatred and class conflicts. This would be detrimental to the country and provide with arguments the supports of foreign ideologies.

That is why we remain attached to our national unity. We not only consider it a historical reality and an essential factor, but we also think that it has its own values, its special framework, its own conditions and characteristics, the most important of which is our determination to eliminate the causes of oppression and tyranny.

We must, at all costs, eliminate any kind of exploitation of one Tunisian by another. In popular language this is known as "drawing benefits from someone else's sweat." This is nothing but exploitation, in the full meaning of the term. Let us not kid ourselves, this could not last indefinitely. An employee may be exploited for one, two or even three years. However, he would not endlessly tolerate an intolerable situation. Someday his resentment would necessarily turn into rancor and be followed by an explosion. The hatred triggered by the exploitation of man by man engenders violvence, the class struggle and, in the final account, civil war. The national unity which should protect us from all such risks is not a static feature. It is a principle and a reality. It is also a dynamic principle which must continuingly be adapted to the political, economic and social imperatives, to the development of the young people and of the minds. Nor should we lose sight of the fact that a national union is a reality with which we have lived since our youth, a reality we believe in and which has been very useful to us in the course of the liberation struggle. Let us make an effort, therefore, to preserve this important gain and let us make an effort to protect it from any deviation which, God forbid, could trigger a class struggle, resentments and upheavals. I honestly believe, and this is not merely view but a view shared, I am convinced of this, by my companions within the party, since it expresses a truly Destourien principle which has always been supported by the party since its establishment, that national unity can last only if it is based on social justice. Social justice requires more than statistical data and averages. It consists of a sustained effort to create and increase the wealth--which is our role--and to distribute the results of this growth as stipulated by the party resolutions after the Sfax Congress, as even-handedly as possible. Total justice will remain an ideal which we may not be able to achieve but for which we shall continue to struggle.

Let me now discuss the type of human relations which must prevail between employers and employees. I expressed my viewpoint on this subject, as you may recall, on 1 May last, at the meeting organized on the occasion of the Labor Holiday. I repeated it that same month, at the meeting of the chairmen and directors general of public enterprises. I am convinced that the ideas I expressed represented your belief. Yet, as our religion encourages us to repeat endlessly the good word, allow me to use this occasion to mention it yet once again. One of the conditions for safeguarding national unity and preventing the development of hatred and of a class-mindedness is, in fact, the need to work for peace in the hearts and for developing between employees and employers harmonious and fraternal relations. The worker must have the feeling that the head of the enterprise is sympathetic with his fate and is working for the improvement of his situation as though he were a member of his family, not to mention the fact that the manner in which something is given is worth more than what one gives. This applies to the importance of human relations. In this respect let me cite the old Tunisian adage, "Keep for yourself this bread you are giving me with a frowning expression." In other words, something which is a right should not be presented as a favor or as charity. Concern for human relations is strongly rooted in our Arab-Muslim traditions. This same spirit must prevail in human relations in such a way that the worker will not be led to believe that the chairman-director general or head of an enterprise, the engineer, or the official are made of a different substance. Along this line, the employer must not deem it useful to establish relations with his employees only under the pressure of a crisis, a strike, or any type of agitation within the enterprise.

An intelligent head of an enterprise should be like a doctor who is convinced of the great importance of preventive therapy. He must react to any change in the atmosphere among his personnel, a change which may show up as an increase in absenteeism or in any other type of malaise. He should use this to start a dialogue with his employees. Obviously, there are others who, thank God, are few and, I hope, rarely found in the public and private sectors, prefer the use of coercive means to a dialogue. Such people, even though very rarely encountered, are paradoxically convinced that social peace can be achieved through force only. They are greatly mistaken.

In fact, it is an error to believe that the structures of dialogue and enterprise committee are useless. Some owners are wrong in their belief that by mixing with the workers, listening to their concerns, and discussing with them expansion and improvement prospects, their dignity would be lowered and affected and, therefore, the dignity of the system. It is inconceivable, today or in the future, that social peace in the enterprises could be achieved through the force of bayonets or police clubs. Such protection would be illusory and ineffective.

As you unquestionably know from what you have read or your contacts with foreign countries, today a new "race" of businessmen has been born in the developed countries, believing that managing the human potential is more important than the proper management of facilities, possibilities, or existing structures. They are convinced that without people programs and plans remain unattainable utopias. Conversely, everything is possible with available human potential.

From specialized journals and other publications I have learned a number of facts on what is taking place in the United States, Europe or Japan on the level of human relations within enterprises. I learned, among others, that in Japan it is not infrequent to see the boss and the engineer wear the same type of clothing as the workers and frequently eat in the plant's cafeteria among their employees. Such contacts eliminate mistrust and misunderstandings. In other words, the articles and studies I have read have proved to me that trade union activities, and I wish that my brothers in the trade unions would not misinterpret my statement, become meaningless when the worker, the boss and the engineer live in good harmony, work hand in hand, share the same concerns, experience the same constraints, and strive to achieve the same objectives. In such cases what would be the purpose of trade unions? Evil be to him who thinks it! I myself am a former trade unionist and the reason for which I have cited these examples is to show you the point we have reached, for in such a situation the role of the trade union movement would be changed. The trade union would no longer have as its purpose to rally the workers to defend themselves against the owners and for the recognition of their violated rights. In such cases, naturally, the trade union has the right to formulate claims. Nevertheless, in the future this role could change into a positive role of promoting awareness, education, training, and information. In that case social peace and trust would prevail. Actually, our future will be what is today the tangible reality of the big enterprises in Europe and America. This has made some leftist parties in Western Europe panicky at the thought that if the owners would act intelligently and win over the trust of the people these parties would remain purposeless. This is because the reason for their existence is found in crises, malaises, and the discontent of the workers. They enter the struggle presenting themselves as the defenders of the rights of the weak and the oppressed. I have not invented this but have found it in serious works on some extremist parties and trade unions in Europe. Actually, I have recopied some excerpts which I have sent to the heads of public enterprises and which should be sent to the heads of private enterprises as well.

As I said, these left-wing parties and trade unions obviously fear that an improvement in the social climate would deprive them forever of their battle horse and their reason for being.

This is because in their subversive activities such foreign extremist organizations exploit the cause of the workers for the sake of promoting disorder in the means of production, disturb social peace, and cause trouble to the existing system. They are not pleased with a calm behavior and a serene social climate.

They are afraid of the owners who display a new spirit and are more understanding. They prefer the somewhat arrogant behavior of some heads of enterprises. This gives them grounds for engaging in venomous propaganda. They would very much like the dissemination of the arrogance of some bosses and of their tendency to consider the worker as a negligible quantity. These are attitudes which unquestionably create resentment and which these fishermen in troubled waters do not fail to exploit. Actually, they are to society what microbes are to the human body. As long as the body of an individual is healthy it can defend itself against such microbes which pollute the atmosphere.

When microbes attack a healthy organism they are immediately hunted by leucocytes. This is known as phagocytosis. The same applies to society: As long as the social body is healthy and is developing in conditions of stability and social peace, it has no reason to fear the nefarious activities of pathogenic agents. That is why we must act like vigilant physicians and forewarn Tunisian and Arab society against any microbial aggression. We must launch preventive measures and not wait for the fire or the disease to break out. In the latter case only major means could help, as is the case with antibiotics when the body has been severely infected. We have seen the major means in action, in our country on 26 January, or on the occasion of other events which shook up the Arab world and even Europe half a century ago. However, the major means, like antibiotics, could provide salvation once or twice....without guaranteeing success a third time. That is what leads me, as an activist like you, to draw your attention to this question. Here I address myself to all those in charge of managing personnel and enterprises: businessmen, chairmen and directors general of public or private enterprises, engineers, administrators, or managers. All of them must promote the preservation of social peace and avoid reactions of despair triggered by resentment and hatred. I believe it to be my duty to speak out frankly, for I find it unpleasant to be agreeable whatever the circumstances.

I believe it to be my duty to express my views even should this be hurtful to some people. Actually, it is only those whose conscience is not clear who would be disturbed. Even though our country is healthy, there are some elements in whom selfishness prevails and who are ruled by the lure of profits. Seeking profit is a legitimate ambition which, however, should take place within the framework of respect for the laws and fiscal stipulations. No one intends to nurture feelings of envy toward the "haves." However, it is indecent to try to become rich by all means, even though illicit. The accumulation of insolent fortunes which are as huge as they are illicit, within a short period of time, cannot remain unnoticed. The young, the university students above all, are watching. People of modest means are watching as well. In such cases, resentment and hatred could take over the hearts and the minds. This, God forbid, could lead to convulsions and rebellions.

In the second place, I turn to you in the name of Islam and morality. I do not wish to address you as a specialist but I firmly believe in the goodness of man. I am addressing myself to those Muslims who believe in God, who obey his laws, and who seek his mercy. It is possible that in the six million believers there may be some who engage in speculations or fraudulant activities leading to considerable profits. To them I would say that such practices are condemned by religion and moralicy. Recently, as a result of the raise in taxes on some kinds of fruits, their prices have doubled. Overnight the price of peaches thus rose from 480 to 840 millimes. It was this that led the weekly BILADI to state that, "Freedom is expensive....for the consumer."

It is not my intention to examine the political or administrative aspects of this problem. However, I would like to consider the moral aspect of this question. Whereas it is legitimate to seek as reasonable profit, exorbitant profit is illegal in terms of morality and religion. Such individuals should consider what their situation could become when, as a result of their behavior, difficulties or general strikes would affect the country's progress. Their urge to earn excessively would cost them everything. Even if they personally would be spared, it is not certain in the least that 20 years later the new generation would let their young benefit from the wealth they had amassed. Justice will thus be done, for God may postpone but never abandon his retribution. Therefore, we could only wonder about those who are draining the blood of the people remorselessly. Are they unaware of the existence of an immanent justice or that they would pay through their flesh the price of their unscrupulous greed? I would like to whisper in the ear of such irresponsible people to get hold of themselves, to come back to God, and to understand that ill-gotten gains benefit no one. Big fortunes only exacerbate quarrels among the heirs. On another level, whatever they may do to remain unnoticed, their behavior triggers anger toward and criticism of those in charge. I say this without trying to moralize, for I envy no one. Personally, I have chosen to live modestly for the rest of my days. My happiness is serving the country. That is why I think of you, I think about the future of your children and the future of our country. Disorder must not prevail and resentments must not lead to a class struggle. There must not be a privileged minority whose position would trigger envy and hatred.

I hope and am even convinced that the government will not be forced to resort to repressive laws to protect by force the interests of the economically weak and the consumers in general. May you be able to protect one another and wish the others what you would like to have yourselves. Why should the government be forced to set the price of fruits by decree whereas the middlemen should protect on their own goodwill the intersts of the poor and the weakest. I would be willing and disposed to discuss the matter all day long with four or five such insubordinate people among the middlemen. I have nothing against them and I do not like to govern by force. I merely wish for a change in their mentality. For it is inadmissible for some still to be trying to exploit others, trick customs agents or engage in big deals.

Naturally, we are in favor of the normal development of economic activities, of the creation of fortunes and, consequently, the emergence of a growing number of businessmen. However, such fortunes must be created in a healthy manner which would guarantee to those who acquire them and to their children security and peace and would be redistributed in a spirit of justice, far from any extremism. This may lead some to say that those are very nice words for, in their view, there is no third way other than the classical alternative offered by the two big economic concepts. Personally, I do not believe this and I do not believe that I am wrong.

Within our party we do not agree with the concept of liberalism which turns economic options loose. Nor do we support the socialist ideology which boasts of being scientific.

Our party is a socialist party. However, our socialism is not nurtured by class hatred. I disagree with the proponents of the omnipresence of the state which should direct and control everything. I prefer to this the Bourguibian way, the way which does not consider the Tunisian people lost, which trusts them, which supports them in the field of political activities, i.e., which resorts to training and education. This was the way chosen by Bourguiba during the struggle for liberation and after it, the way which made it possible to change the Tunisian people. I am convinced that it is not too late and that we retain the possibility to avoid the dilemma of a blind socialist dictatorship or excessive and unfair liberalism. Therefore, we have chosen the middle way, as our society is a society of a just environment which believes that all Tunisians are brothers and for which national unity, far from being an empty slogan or a myth, becomes a concrete reality. Whether they are workers, merchants, businessmen, physicians or unemployed, all the Tunisians are sincere patriots. If the leadership can pursue the difficult path of a just environment, and if it is direct and permanent contact with the masses, with a view to changing their mentality, we are certain to succeed as we succeeded in our liberation struggle. For example, Hedi Ben Jaballah was a 19- or 20-year-old man at the time when, in accordance with the President's directives, he had volunteered to execute a traitor. He said, "I am not married and I have neither father nor mother." Subjected to torture, he tirelessly shouted, "Long Live Bourguiba," and "Long Live Tunisia."

Sentenced to death, Hedi Ben Jaballah died as a martyr, leaving to future generations the example of extraordinary courage. Ben Jaballah had never gone to school. He was a young Tunisian like many others at that time. It was Bourguiba's school which took him over and changed him, turning him into a true activist. This was the case of a large number of activists such as Ferjani Belhaj Ammar who, as he himself recalls, without his apprenticeship in Bourguiba's and the people's school would have remained a modest craftsman. Jail turned him into an activist, for even in jail the Destourien activists learn and train one another. Without all this they would have remained simple merchants exclusively concerned with making a living, supporting French colonization with fatalism and resignation. However, thanks to the extraordinary efforts to educate and make the people aware, undertaken tirelessly by Bourguiba, joining the party in large numbers, the Tunisians defied the occupation authorities and faced death with courage and dignity.

Therefore, if during the struggle for national liberation it had become possible to trigger among the activists through the promotion of their awareness a spirit of sacrifice which let them stand up to bullets and jails, today, thanks to direct contacts and education, it should be easier to convince some profit-thirsty individuals of the need to temper their appetites. I am convinced that this is possible. Therefore, I believe that in addition to the party's activities and the efforts of our press, radio and television, and the lessons which President Bourguiba continues to teach, both the UTICA and the UGTT should spare no effort to enhance the level of awareness of the working people so that they may produce more. Unquestionably, this activity is being pursued by the enterprise owners. It is a question of pursuing it, of consolidating educational work and of determining the range of the general interest and the limits of private interests. It is in the very interest of these same individuals to treat the people with consideration, to fear God and to restrain their grubbing. I am deliberating using such words to emphasize the severity of the problem, for what we should fear is to suddenly discover, 10 or 20 years later, too late, that the class struggle has become established in our society and that our children are paying its price.

This is a vital question and I hope that my statements will be interpreted accurately. This is because some people could question whether I am a socialist or not and, proceeding from the viewpoint of a simplistic Manichaeism, reach the conclusion that he who is not with them is necessarily against them. I am convinced that by promoting awareness it is possible to establish a climate of harmony and solidarity which would augur better days, providing that the national organizations persevere along this way in cooperation with the party which, in this respect, faces the important task of guiding and rallying. It is thus that, hand in hand, we shall secure for ourselves a better future. Conversely, should everyone persist in pulling the blanket on his side of the bed and exclusively look after his own interests or the interests of a small plan or else plunges into politicking and partisan deals, the results would be null. We must understand that this is a problem which concerns the future of the country.

I wish to address all working people, whether owners, engineers, or workers in the language of faith, reason and patriotism and tell them that national unity, based on tolerance, harmony, justice and rejection of exploitation, should be maintained and consolidated in order to protect our country from any threat of difficulties and destabilization.

I owe it to the truth to say that since independence and, above all, in recent years our country has witnessed the appearance of a large number of specialists in the field of economics and trade, with acknowledged level of competence and enterprise and who have developed viable projects. We are proud of them and wish to encourage them further and to protect their interests so that they continue to be the dynamic element of our economic development. This, however, should be with the stipulation that it would not lead to an exaggerated increase in prices but would allow our enterprises to remain competitive abroad.

Currently these initiative-minded people are studying, together with the services of the Ministry of the Economy, and with the owners' organization, the modalities of price setting. This would result in a certain number of specific measures which would turn our words into actions. On 1 May I stated that the petit merchants and craftsmen needed the special attention of the government. I discussed this with Ferjani Belhaj Ammar who informed me that he had kept a file on this project since 1973, i.e., roughly for the past 7 years. I answered him that this file should be reviewed as soon as possible. In the course of a meeting of the Political Bureau, chaired by the Supreme Fighter, I asked Ferjani Belhaj Ammar to present the question to the party's chairman and the members of the Political Bureau. The Supreme Fighter then recommended to us to help the small merchants. The reason I mention their case is that we wish to encourage them, for it is possible that their voice is not always heard even though they are the keystone of the national economy. It is they who are struggling at the base to insure its upsurge. Therefore, price restraints should not be to their detriment and they should not be the only ones to bear their burden. Actually, they are workers even though in some cases they may employ a few people who, occasionally may be making more than they do. They are Tunisians who have played a role in both the struggle for liberation and for development, who support families and whose situation, therefore, should be of proper concern to us. I have the pleasure to inform you that the file is ready. In a week or two Abdelaziz Lasram, minister of the national economy, will announce decisions which have been made and to which I had hinted in my 1 May speech. Thus, only a few months after the speech we have results. This will be the answer to some people who are operating behind the stage saying that not only words but actions are needed. These people are trying to raise doubts.

We are like the ant in the story, which is building and producing while others play the role of the grasshopper, liking their leisure. We shall let them fiddle away. As far as we are concerned, we shall continue to roll up our sleeves to serve our fellow citizens, willingly letting others engage in discourses, intrigues, and shady deals.

We are relying on those who work, who produce and expend their forces to be useful to others. As to the others, the "debaters," Let them pursue their intrigues and confused theories. They could not go very far. As I emphasized only yesterday, addressing the personnel of the Tax Court, God has wished our country well and, with his help, you will see only good from the Supreme Commander and his government. Actually, you will have a new proof of this expressed in the decisions which will be imparted to you by Ferjani Belhaj Ammar, the minister of the economy.

Another remark I would like to make has to do with the purpose of your organization, the UTICA. Its role is to contribute to economic development, the creation of wealth, and the motivation and utilization of youth energy. I say this in all sincerity without back thoughts. Actually, in this very hall, invited by the Junior Chamber of Commerce, I met with young Tunisians who are admiral from all points of view. The members of the Junior Chamber of Commerce Bureau then visited me in my office. On that occasion I was able to appreciate the reasonable terms, in literary Arabic rather than in "Franco-Arabic" and the clarity of views and constructive approach of the young and the promising nature of their ability which blossomed after independence was gained, thanks to the policy of the Supreme Fighter in the fields of education and training. Meeting with them gave me great satisfaction and deep faith in the future, for one day these young people will take up the torch from the hands of their elders. As in a relay race the young will take over the "witness" from the hands of the less young and go on with the struggle. I am convinced that they will be closer to the people even though they did not participate in the struggle for independence. Yet, they are no less imbued with the patriotic spirit which Bourguiba inspired in them. Personally, I trust them totally.

Naturally, Ferjani Belhaj Ammar is very encouraging toward them. Nevertheless, I would like to urge you to open for them further the road leading to Jendouba, Kairouan, Bizerte, and elsewhere, not to mention Tunis, Sousse and Sfax. Each of these areas is rich is competent young people who must make their contribution in accordance with our policy based on maintaining the balance among these areas.

The point is that Tunisia could not develop or achieve progress by being satisfied with the development of nothing but the coastal cities. Quite to the contrary, the development effort must spread to the other areas as well, such as Jendouba, Kef, Siliana, Kasserine, Sidi Bouzid, Gafsa and Medenine. Furthermore, as I have already announced, the next plan will be focused on these areas in order to avoid or reduce any imbalance.

However, in order to achieve this we must rely on this youthful energy found throughout our country. Was I not invited by young people to chair the conclusion of a seminar in Kairouan? In both the public and private sectors such competent young people are becoming energized and meeting difficult assignments. I am firmly convinced that such people do not scorn the workers and know that equal attention should be paid to everything.

May your organization always welcome more young people who will bring it fresh healthy blood.

On the other hand, I must emphasize the need for a dialogue between the various organizations. This, in my view, is an essential matter. In this connection I am pleased to congratulate the UTICA and its president who, last year, despite difficulties, constraints and legitimate economic considerations, supported us in our social policy, in our policy of collective bargaining and in the dialogue with the working people. I am convinced that they will continue to give us their full support, for we are firmly resolved to go forth in the way to social justice. We are firmly resolved to reexamine in the months and years to come collective agreements and enterprise committees. Yet, this can be accomplished only to the extent to which industrialists, merchants and workers will contribute as well. The same applies to the National Farmers' Union. We must consider the problems of prices, wages, economic growth and psychological climate. The dialogue among the different partners should not astound us, for we are all patriots trained in Bourguiba's school. However, we would like in the months and years to come to see this dialogue broaden, strengthen, and become crystalized to prevent malaise and sporadic difficulties.

Without intending in the least to exaggerate, I would like to emphasize in this context that some foreign parties are bothered by Tunisia's success. The point is that despite the modest nature of our resources we are steadily blossoming and increasing our strength despite very limited means. Our success sticks in the throat of those who have chosen a different way. Those people are not helping us. Worse, occasionally they try to disturb us and to hit us by encouraging strikes and troubles with a view to worsening our situation and blocking the access to our development. I am convinced that the leadership in the trade unions, the economy and agriculture are aware of this. Naturally, they occasionally have diverting views and create tempests in teapots. Nevertheless, all they have to do in order to come to their senses, is to remind themselves of the existence of enemies and of latent dangers which threaten us and to remember that our economy remains fragile, developing within the context of an international economy ruled by the law of force. In this context disinterested help could come from friends alone and even they have a tendency to make more promises than to act upon them. Consequently, we must rely on ourselves. Merchants, farmers, industrialists, workers, engineers and employees must tighten their ranks to save the fatherland which is not the sole ownership of anyone. Do not forget that there are dangers threatening us! Do not forget that our children have the legitimate ambition to live a life better than ours! Let us be on the level of the hopes of the young generations in order to avoid convulsions, plots and traps laid by some! Let us be united in protecting our country from anarchic strikes.

We have no objection to legitimate strikes triggered by injustice or abusive exploitation. No one should consider this detrimental.

Conversely, if the enterprises, the public enterprises in particular, are used for the purpose of bringing the government or the system down on its knees or to promote someone, we would find this totally intolerable. The opening which we favor is not synonymous with laxity, not to say slackness. We cannot allow disturbing elements to harm the enterprises or promote anarchy within them. Just as we are asking of the industrialists to help us to eliminate any type of abusive exploitation, we are calling on the workers, on the other hand, to help us by enhancing their awareness and education. In turn, the government guarantees the economic and social security of all citizens, whether producers, merchants or consumers. In other words, the government plays the role of the umpire and the guarantor and is not a party to the game. As the Supreme Fighter has emphasized it so many times, the state must act toward the citizen like an attentive father, correcting all the faults that are noticed and eliminating all exploitation with the help of words and laws but not coercion. Actually, we have never supported the strong method, being entirely convinced that moral force is far more persuasive than physical force.

Nevertheless, when thoughtlessness becomes anarchy, hegemony or striking omnipotence, we call upon the verdict of the people, denouncing those who attempt to harm the enterprise and, through it, the fatherland.

In this connection, it is important to have on our side a strong owners' organization and a powerful workers organization which would be truly and democratically representative of the workers. Democracy is expressed through elections and not through the predominance of a category of people. All trade union federations and primary trade unions must hold their congresses and nominate the delegates to represent them at the UGTT congress. Being the supreme power, the congress will make the decisions. We shall thus have accomplished something useful and taken into consideration the general interest.

This is the policy of adventurers, of those who preach the policy of doom! On our part, we shall not turn them loose, for the government and the state have both human and other means with which to neutralize agitators and fishermen in troubled waters.

I am saying this for I clearly perceive what will take place in the next few months. As long as we keep our ranks tight and maintain a firm national unity, bearing in mind the interests of the fatherland and fight exploitation, we have nothing to fear concerning the fate of our nation. Even if a crisis were to break out we would be able to face it like an airplane which resists an atmospheric turbulence and eventually lands safely. Like passengers in an airplane hitting an air hole we shall buckle up our safety belts and resist the crisis until it is past, for it always eventually disappears thanks to the skill of the captain who, in this case, is Bourguiba. As long as the Supreme Fighter will be holding the rudder and guiding this state, as long as he will be assisted by a coherent and united government, as long as harmony prevails between the party and the national organizations and, above all, as long as the government will have the trust of the people we have nothing to fear.... Our government is not a government locked in an ivory tower. Stemming from the people, it has made the people the sole judge for it has nothing to hide from the people. This must be known and understood by everyone.

May Tunisia go forth always! May your great organization, which was the first to be created by the party, remain always in the vanguard! May we, with its help and with the help of all other national organizations, tirelessly strengthen the party in order to consolidate the trust of the people, its serenity and its ability to take up the challenges of poverty, underdevelopment, envy and laziness!

May you continue to act with the same zeal for the good of Tunisia and all Tunisians!

May God crown with success the work of your congress!

POLISARIO SAID TO BE READY FOR DIRECT NEGOTIATIONS WITH MOROCCO

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 5 Sep 80 p 3

[Report on Interview with Nur al-Din Ahmad 'Ali, Member of the National Political Office of the Polisario Liberation Front; date and place not given]

[Text] Nur al-Din Ahmad 'Ali, Member of National Political Office of Polisario Liberation Front Says, "We Accept Any Mediation with Morocco, and We Accept Unity With It."

Nur al-Din Ahmad 'Ali, member of the National Political Office of the Polisario Liberation Front said that his visit to Kuwait is in the context of a tour that includes Arab capitals to explain the front's point of view in the struggle with Morocco.

In an interview with AL-QABAS, Nur al-Din Ahmad 'Ali added that the front is fully prepared to accept any Arab mediation whatsoever, provided that the nature of the struggle between the front and Morocco and not the struggle between Morocco and Algeria be investigated.

He said that the OAU had agreed to hold negotiations through the Committee of African Arbitrators this month, but it seems that Morocco changed its mind.

Ahmad 'Ali said that the front is prepared to unite with any Arab country whatsoever. He emphasized that "Unity must take place between us as two states. It must not be imposed on us. We are prepared to unite with Morocco through a democratic, constructive dialogue, not through an accomplished fact imposed on us."

Ahmad 'Ali said that the purpose of the aid offered by colonialist countries is to preoccupy the Arab Maghrib [Morocco] with secondary questions at the expense of the real Arab problems.

He affirmed that the front had advocated unity between Libya, Algeria, Morocco and Mauritainia, and said: "This is because we are advocates of unity. We believe that the Arabs will not have any strength, unless they unite. This is the basis of our outlook. The Sahara was divided in 1884, and remained occupied until Spain left it. We wanted independence, but Morocco and Mauritania wanted to annex the people of the Sahara, and we did not want that. We are fighting now so that we can assert our will." He added: "Mauritania has become convinced that the people of the Sahara have rights, and it has withdrawn from its agreement with Morocco."

He said: "We want to put an end to Arab bloodshed. We want to have direct negotiations with Morocco so that we can establish a just and permanent solution similar to that which happened with Mauritania."

'LE MONDE' DESCRIBES CLAIMED POLISARIO SUCCESSES AGAINST MOROCCANS

LD240859 Paris LE MONDE in French 22 Oct 80 p 7

[Dispatch by Daniel Jungua: "A 1,000-km Foray With the Polisario Fighters"]

[Excerpts] Hassi Hafed Boudjemaa--In taking some 10 journalists, mainly French and Spanish, on a 3-day tour of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic [SDAR] "liberated territories," the Polisario had two objectives: to prove that it effectively controls virtually all this region abandoned for almost 2 years now by the Moroccan army, and to establish on the other hand that the current fighting is taking place on Moroccan territory in the Oued Dra region. The demonstration struck us as convincing.

Our escort only began to take precautions when we approached the border with Morocco in order to reach the Ras-el-Khanfra zone where violent clashes have been taking place for the past month. Ras-el-Khanfra, a small hill in the foothills of the Zini Mountains, looks out over a valley which gives access to Tan-Tan through Abatteh, 17 km further on. That is one of the routes taken by the Polisario battalions to reach northern Morocco. This enables them to attack the coast road from Tan-Tan to Tarfaya which is the supply route for conveying men and military equipment to the Hagunia-Semara-Bojador fortified triangle in the West Sahara. This fortified triangle encompasses El-Aiun--the territory's capital--and especially the Bou-Craa phosphate deposits. Together with the city of Dakhla (formerly Vialla-Cisneros) further to the south, these are now the only points at which Moroccan troops are still deployed in the former Spanish colony.

"For this operation intended to protect its communication routes, the Moroccan army," Polisario command council member Omar Hadrani told us, "has deployed some 20,000 men at Abatteh, commanded by Colonel Ben Othman. Last August 12,000 of those soldiers were installed at three positions spread over some 30 km, one in Saharan territory at Khreibichat, the second at L'Bouba on the border and the third at Ras-el-Khanfra, a few kilometers inside Morocco. As a result of our attacks the first two garrisons were forced to withdraw between 16 and 18 September. They went as reinforcements to Ras-el-Khanfra. We are continuing our attacks and have already penetrated their command post once, destroying heavy artillery batteries and Stalin organs [presumably a multiround tube-type rocket launcher]."

Protected by a providential fog which prevented aircraft reconnaissance, our group reached a point only 5 km from Ras-el-Khanfra whence the sound of explosions could be heard at intervals. The terrain, which was slightly uneven, was covered with traces of violent fighting over the previous days. We saw the wreckage of a Mirage F-1 aircraft shot down on 21 September scattered over several hundred square meters; further on we saw the blackened and twisted shell of two South African-made armored troop transport vehicles. Our guides then showed us a gigantic caterpillar bulldozer which looked out of place in that desert-like scene. "Our fighters siezed it at Ras-el-Khanfra," Omar Hadrani explained to us, "and they succeeded in bringing it here. However, the engine is burned out. We have already destroyed four of these vehicles. The Moroccans use them to dig ditches and build protective dikes."

We then visited the positions abandoned by the [Moroccan] Royal Armed Forces at Kreibichat and L'Bouba. Signs of the Moroccan withdrawal could be seen everywhere. There were individual dugouts and trenches, littered with empty tins, there were artillery and mortar positions littered with munitions cases and boxes, overturned land rovers and a burned-out tanker truck. Here and there we could see a few mounds of fresh soil: "graves which we dug for Moroccan soldiers," one of the members of our escort told us.

"Who Is Rounding Up Whom?"

According to Omar Hadrani, some 600 Moroccans have been killed since the beginning of this series of operations. "This is a good opportunity for us to attack the best enemy units--the few thousand men who constitute the spearhead of the royal armed forces. We are engaging them before they have time to entrench themselves."

A reference to the "rounding-up operations" which, according to Rabat, have eliminated the Polisario in the southern part of Morocco, made Mr Hadrani smile. "Who is rounding up whom?" he asked pointing to the royal army's successive retreats. "Southern Morocco," he added, "is facing a growing threat as shown by our attack on M'Hamed-Les Gazelles near Ouarzazate which is level with Agadir." A little later, on the return journey, after the traditional meal: roast goat meat, rice and green tea, Mr Hadrani, sitting under an improvised tent made from blankets, drew conclusions from the last OAU meeting in Freetown. "We agree to a referendum on self-determination," he said, "and a cease-fire provided the Moroccan army withdraws completely from our country. There can be no referendum under the threat of Moroccan weapons. The OAU has tried to throw the king a last lifebelt. He has not even taken hold of it. We are now giving priority to the struggle to secure the departure of the Rabat troops."

LONDON PLO AIDE CONDEMNS, DENIES INVOLVEMENT IN ANTI-JEWISH VIOLENCE

LD150801 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 14 Oct 80 p 2

[ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT report: "PLO Denies Link With Attacks on Jews in Europe, Denounces Exploitation of Attacks"]

[Text] London--The PLO office in London has denounced the recent acts of violence against the Jewish communities in Europe and totally rejected the Israeli foreign minister's 8 October statement to the effect that the PLO is involved in backing fascist organizations in Europe.

PLO representative in London Nabil Ar-Ramlawi said: "We regret that the Zionist leaders are now trying to intimidate the governments of the EEC through the cheap exploitation of acts of violence being committed against the Jewish communities in Europe."

Ar-Ramlawi added: "Zionism--the political dogma of the state of Israel--is the direct result of hostility toward the Jews and their persecution in Europe in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Any reemergence of organizations hostile to the Jews in Europe would only strengthen the Zionist movement and encourage Jewish emigration from Europe to Palestine, which in turn would strengthen the movement that imposed dispersion and banishment on millions of Palestinians, both Muslims and Christians, from their home in Palestine."

Ar-Ramlawi said: "The Palestinians, therefore, share the concern of Jews in Europe for the need for the relevant authorities to take drastic action against those who use or incite violence against the Jewish communities."

The PLO representative said in his statement: "Any solution to the Palestinian problem that the EEC is now trying to reach rests not only on respect for the Palestinian people's legitimate right to return to their home and establish an independent Palestinian state, since the basis of any solution requires that Jewish communities wherever they may be must be able to live free from discrimination and violence against them."

Concluding his statement, Ar-Ramlawi denied that the PLO had anything to do with anti-Semitic organizations whether in Europe or anywhere else.

PALESTINIAN REPRESENTATIVE IN AMMAN LAUDS JORDAN, CONDEMNS ISRAEL

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 19 Sep 80 p 17

[Interview with Najib al-Ahmad by AL-QABAS, in Amman; date not given]

/Text/ Mr Najib al-Ahmad, director of Mr Yasir 'Arafat's office in the Jordanian capital, said that Zionist designs are not just restricted to Palestine but go beyond it, to what is called the land of Israel, from the Euphrates to the Nile--as was openly resolved at the first Zionist conference held in Switzerland in 1897. He said that the occupation, incorporation and judaization that are taking place now are only the exact implementation of what was resolved at that conference.

Mr al-Ahmad asserted, in a conversation with AL-QABAS, that Israel is now launching an aggressive attack which is aimed at eliminating the Palestinian revolution and paralyzing the movement of Syria and Jordan in order to subject and force them to proceed along the capitulationist Camp David road. In this, it is relying on unlimited American support and the connivance of the Egyptian regime.

The director of Abu 'Ammar's office in Amman stated that Jordanian-Palestinian relations are fraternal and excellent and that the two parties are standing together in the face of the Zionist attack and the Zionist schemes against our people in the occupied nation.

Mr Najib Ahmad, who was born in the village of Rumanah in the District of Janin, participated in successive Palestinian revolutions in 1936, 1938 and 1939. The British imprisoned him for a year during their mandate. He participated in the 1948 war as a commander of combatants in cooperation with the Palestinian Holy War Forces, the Arab Salvation Army and the Iraqi Army, which gave him the rank of honorary officer.

He worked with the International Red Cross as an overseer for refugee affairs in 1949-50 and was elected member of the Jordanian Parliament as a delegate from the Janin area for four successive terms, from 1951 to 1963. He was a founder of the National Socialist Party and a member of its Central Committee. He was chosen a member to the first Palestine National Congress in 1964 and took part with the Jordanian Arab Army in the 1967 war as a commander of the popular forces in Janin. He resisted the occupation, was arrested by Israeli enemy authorities and was sentenced to 2 years' imprisonment, of which he served 13 months. The occupation authorities then banished him with his family to Jordan in early September 1969.

After that he worked with the Palestine Liberation Organization as a commander of the Western Sector in 1970 and was given the rank of honorary officer in the honor ary officer in the Palestine Liberation Army until 1973. After the October War he was appointed representative to the Political Department of the Palestine Liberation Organization in Jordan until 1975, then worked in the Political Department in Damascus, and recently as member of the Palestine National Congress, which he still is. Finally, he was appointed director of the office of Mr Yasir 'Arafat, chairman of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Herewith is the te of the meeting between Mr Najib Ahmad and AL-QABAS:

Activities and Powers of Abu 'Ammar's Office

/Question/ What are the activities and powers of Mr 'Arafat's office in Amman?

/Answer/ The activities of the office of the Liberation Organization Executive Committee chairman are defined by the chairman himself. They are not specific but are diverse. Abu 'Ammar's office has been assigned to follow up on matters of supporting our brothers' perseverance in occupied Palestine in implementation of the recommendations issued by the Islamic Conference Organization in Jiddah and numerous other matters related to our people living in occupied Palestine.

The Decree Incorporating and Uniting Jerusalem

/Question/ How do you view the latest Israeli decree unifying Jerusalem and considering it an eternal capital of the Jewish state?

/Answer/ The Zionists' designs on Jerusalem and all Palestinian territories, and all Arab territories from the Nile to the Euphrates are not far from our minds and our eyes. They were declared in accordance with the resolutions of the first Zionist conference held in Switzerland in 1897. May I remind one of the Zionists' attempt in 1929 to take over the noble Alborak, also known as the Wailing Wall, and the bloody revolution that caused in Palestine.

After the Zionists' occupation of the city of Jerusalem and all Palestine in 1967, the enemy government, on 27 June 1967 specifically, issued a law titled "Amended Judiciary and Administration Law for the Year 1967," by virtue of which the Arab sector of Jerusalem which was occupied in 1967 was incorporated into Israel. It then issued a decree according to this law by virtue of which it incorporated the Arab areas surrounding Jerusalem into the state of Israel. These areas comprised the areas of the villages of Bayt Safafa, Sur Bahir, Salwan, al-Tur, 'Anata, al-'Isawiyah, al Ram, Sha'fat, up to Bayt Hanina. These areas were included in the boundaries of the municipality of Jerusalem, so that the united holy city of Jerusalem became the capital of the Jewish state. Residing in these Arab areas, which were affixed to Jerusalem, which had been occupied since 1948, are 100,000 Arabs.

On 29 June 1969, the enemy government issued a decree calling for the dissolution of the board of trustees of Arab Jerusalem and took over all its records, combining them with the records of the unified municipality of Jerusalem. It then banished the mayor, Mr Ruhi al-Khatib, to Jordan.

On 28 October 1969 elections were held for the unified municipality of Jerusalem, including the Jewish and Arab inhabitants. One should bear in mind that the Arab residents boycotted it.

Abrogation of Jordanian Laws

The occupation authorities abrogated all the Jordanian laws which had been in effect at that time, including the Education Law. They appended educational affairs to the Israeli Ministry of Education and even linked the Islamic law courts to the Jaffa Islamic law judge, on grounds that he was an Israeli judge. Israeli identity documents were issued to the Arab inhabitants of Jerusalem, and all government offices supervising West Bank affairs were moved from the courts to the al-Tabu Office in Ramallah.

On 21 August 1969, the occupation authorities burned the blessed al Aqsa mosque then established residential buildings in Jerusalem to which they moved tens of thousands of Zionist emigres. They established a wall of residential buildings like citadels around the city of Jerusalem and changed the archaeological features of the city. Isn't that enough to demonstrate the incorporation of Arab Jerusalem into the Zionist entity?

Mr Najib Ahmad went on to say, "I assert that the issuance of the incorporation law is only a sort of Israeli arrogance and presumptiousness. It occurred as a blatant challenge to the United Nations, the Security Council and the nations of the world, headed by the Arab and Islamic countries, and showed disdain for the person of the Egyptian president, the patron of the Camp David agreement.

The Canal Linking the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea

/Question/ Israel intends to dig a canal linking the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea. What is your view?

/Answer/ Israel is striving to take over all sources of water in the area. It had previously used the waters of Lake Tiberias when it transmitted its water in big pipes to the Negev, the south of Palestine. It also destroyed Arab installations when the Arabs decided to make use of the Waters of the al-Yarmuk, Baniyas and al-Hasibani rivers and threatened war, and is now striving to take over the waters of the al-Litani River in southern Lebanon.

Mr al-Ahmad declared: "Israel has been intending to dig a canal from Haifa via the Marj ibn 'Amir Plain to the town of Baysan and the River Jordan and south along the Graben of the Jordan to the Dead Sea. Since this project can be carried out only with the agreement and participation of Jordan, which forcefully refuses, Israel has adopted the notion of establishing this canal from Gaza via the south of Beersheba to the Dead Sea. The project aims at completing the circle of dominance over all Palestinian and Arab territories."

He said, "Israel is the only state in the world whose borders are not determined, on the basis of the Zionist rule: 'Your borders, Israel, are where you set your feet.' If that Zionist foot is not severed it will be set on more Arab and Palestinian territory."

Incorporation of Golan

/Question/ The terrorist Knesset member Ge'ula Cohen, patroness of the plan to incorporate Jerusalem, intends to present the draft of a plan to incorporate the Golan Heights into the Zionist entity. What is your comment?

/Answer/ The Zionists view Syrian Arab Golan as part of what is called the territory of greater Israel. Since 1967, 27 settlements have been established there. This year they issued a law according to which the Ministry of the Interior tried to issue an Israeli identity to every Arab residing in Golan 'who wanted it!' It is not strange that Cohen should want to incorporate Golan into the racist entity.

Southern Lebanon

/Question/ Israel claims that its military escalation in southern Lebanon against the joint Palestinian-Lebanese forces and the refugee camps is part of an attempt to respond to the activities of the resistance and a preventive strategy aimed at preventing the implementation of guerrilla activities against its vital targets.

/Answer/ The purpose behind the escalation is completely clear. Israel is working to evacuate the Lebanese inhabitants from southern Lebanon up to the al-Litani River with the goal of taking over a south without inhabitants, and the river and its waters as well.

Israel and its Camp David allies also know that this agreement will never last as long as the Palestinian resistance exists and speaks firmly in rejecting the agreement and its conclusions, supported by the Lebanese national forces and the Syrian army.

He went on to say, "From this state of affairs, bitter as far as the Camp David partners go, Israel, with American support, exploiting sorrowful disputes among Arab countries and the American elections, is trying to strike out at the Palestinian resistance, crush warm relations with the Lebanese national forces, and threaten Syria with a lightning war to push the Camp David agreement through, subject Syria and consequently to weaken the firm Jordanian position and try to make it take part in the Camp David negotiations it intensely rejects."

Mr Najib al-Ahmad said, "The firm Palestinian position, derived from the rigidity and obstinacy of the fighting man and his command, represented by the Palestine Liberation Organization, fully cognizant of his cause and the Zionists' goals, stands as a deterrent barrier to the enemy's vicious attacks."

The European Position

/Question/ What is your opinion about the European Common Market countries' recent position on the Palestine cause?

/Answer/ It is great that the countries of Western Europe recognize the failure of the Camp David agreement but solutions to the Palestine cause can progress only through the people whose cause it is, namely the Palestinian Arab people, represented by their legitimate authority, the guarantee of their legitimate national rights to their nation Palestine, and their right to return to it, determine their destiny, and establish their independent national state on their national soil.

He said, "In spite of all this sympathetic European behavior, the recent position by the Western European countries has not been wholly supportive of Arab rights and we therefore are requesting the countries of the European group to be more practical in supporting the just cause of the Palestinian people free from American influence."

Egypt and the Arabs

/Question/ Do you expect Egypt to return to Arab ranks?

/Answer/ Egypt is genuinely Arab and its people were in the vanguard of those fighting for Arab causes. The history of Egypt and its people is full of heroic acts and it is not strange that Egypt should return to Arab ranks--what is strange is that it has not returned yet.

The Jordanian-Palestinian Dialogue

/Question/ Where has the course of the Jordanian-Palestinian dialogue reached?

/Answer/ Since the Egyptian president's lowly visit to occupied Jerusalem, the agreements that followed it and resulted from it, the vicious campaign by the Zionist state, and its unlimited support from the United States of America in judaizing Palestine, alienating the Palestine Liberation Organization, failing to recognize its leadership and the right of the Palestinian people to their nation, and removing Jordan and all the Arabs from their sacred cause, Jordan and the Palestine Liberation Organization have therefore set out to implement the resolutions of the Baghdad and Tunis summits, in their awareness of the gravity of the situation and the need to work together against the liquidationist schemes, foremost of which are the Camp David agreements.

He went on to say, "Relations are fraternal and excellent and we are working in a spirit of cooperation and solidarity to stand up to the Zionist attack and the enemy's liquidationist schemes against our people in the Arab nation."

Mr Najib Ahmad expressed his hope that the meetings would continue and deepen in order to create further fraternal solidarity in order to struggle with the enemy and liberate the nation.

Mr al-Ahmad concluded his conversation by saying, "The liberation of Palestine will not occur with a proliferation of hollow statements and threats, or festivals, parades and epic speeches, but through the unification of ranks and Arab efforts in heart and soul to prepare for the coming stage, taking into consideration the need to benefit from the aid and support of friends in the Islamic world, the nonaligned countries, and the Socialist countries, headed by the Soviet Union, and through conviction in the statement that what has been taken by force will be regained only by force."

PALESTINIAN LEADER VOICES SUPPORT FOR IRANIAN REVOLUTION

NC141224 Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 13 Oct 80 p 11

[Text] Nayif Hawatimah, secretary general of the Democratic Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, has said that "the war on Iran represents the third phase of the imperialist, reactionary and Arab rightist plan to destroy the Iranian revolution now that the political war and the starvation and economic blockade campaign have failed."

Hawatimah outlined "the basic motives behind the enthusiasm by King Husayn and other Arab reactionaries for this war against Iran" and said: "Destroying the revolution, which placed Iran in the front lines against Camp David and alarmed the reactionary thrones, will clear the way for striking against the Palestinian revolution and its Lebanese national ally by putting them between the pincers of the Zionist enemy and the Phalangist statelet."

Addressing groups of trainees of the democratic front organization, Hawatimah added: "Destroying the Iranian revolution will also lead to encircling Syria by the Iraqi-Saudi-Jordanian axis, injecting internal terrorist, reactionary and class sabotage operations and disrupting the establishment of the unitary state."

He noted that all of this was "connected with the imperialist plan to dictate a capitalist solution of the Palestinian question under a western European initiative that complements the Camp David accords concerning the Palestinians."

Hawatimah declared that "the Palestinian people and revolution support the right of the Iranian revolution to exist and develop, as this is a Palestinian national and pan-Arab necessity against U.S. imperialism, Zionism and reaction."

HAMMADI URGES INTEGRATED ARAB DEVELOPMENT FINANCING

Amman AL-DUSTUR in Arabic 8 Jul 80 p 18

[Article: "Iraqi Working Paper Calls for Allocation of $10-15 Billion To Finance Arab Development"]

[Text] Amman--Dr Sa'dun Hammadi, the Iraqi minister of foreign affairs, said that the most important feature of the Iraqi working paper is its seriousness, for it means to realize what it calls for. Its intention is to move Arab economic relations to a serious stage which will witness development in the direction of Arab economic unity.

With regard to what the conference aims for in Arab political and economic cooperation and Iraq's commitment to that end, Dr Hammadi said: "We will strive for this because the general Arab political and economic situation is not positive at this time. We, however, cannot give up but will work toward moving the Arab political and economic situation in a positive direction." He expressed his belief that Arab economic relations would finally shift from a negative to a positive financial situation.

Concerning the Iraqi suggestion to draft a joint pan-Arab economic plan, Dr Hammadi said that Iraq is suggesting a pan-Arab project, not an Iraqi one. He said there is a need for such economic cooperation in which all Arab states, not just the rich ones, would share in this Arab economic effort for development: "We think that this effort is possible, even if difficult.

In an interview with a reporter for the radio station, the Iraqi minister spoke highly of Jordanian-Iraqi relations describing them as good, brotherly and founded on cooperation and solidarity in various fields. He said: "We are very pleased with these fraternal relations."

The working paper stresses the concept of the eighties as the first decade of Arab economic development. The paper aims to prove effective tools for establishment of a common ground for joint Arab economic strategy. The proposal embodies Iraq's commitment to the principles of the Nahm'al charter which Mr Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi president, announced. Also, the proposal will contribute to the development of the resolutions made at Baghdad and Tunis summits.

The working paper pointed out the need to allocate $10-15 billion for development financing in Arab countries for the next 10 years.

It points out that the decade of development is only one part of a more comprehensive issue related to the economic and political independence of the Arab countries which will take place with a minimum of pan-Arab involvement in international polarization. Charting an independent course for development will increase opportunities for Arab economic integration and will direct the human and natural resources of the state to the cause of the liberation of Palestine and other Arab soil, aiming never to allow a foreign presence for any reason.

This working paper included comprehensive joint Arab economic action by all Arab countries, unification of a central authority which will be in charge of Arab development planning, relating this central authority to the Arab League; while it is economically, administratively, financially and technically independent from the League, and a clear definition of the goals and programs of the central authority.

The Iraqi working paper suggests an agreement on joint Arab economic strategy which is sanctioned by the economic council of the Arab League and is distinguished by clarity of goals and requirements. Iraq proposed the working paper be approved by the Arab summit which will recommend a commitment to its implementation in order to achieve more serious, better planned and better organized Arab economic action.

Likewise, the paper noted that, in its annual meeting or a special session, the summit should set standards for each Arab country's utilization of development assistance; this assistance should be given for integrated Arab economic projects in which participation and management is limited strictly to Arabs.

The Iraqi paper included a statement about the necessity for Arab countries of limited means to pay a part of the cost of a project erected on their soil in local currency; it would be up to the Arab countries participating in the joint project to set the respective shares of the public and private sectors according to the economic system.

The paper stipulated the preservation of the right of any Arab country to participate in a project, along with the countries originating the project, even after activity is underway, giving the project sufficient tax, financial and legal privileges, linking the input and output of joint Arab projects to an Arab common market including all Arab states, providing collective Arab protection for Arab investments, and conducting joint Arab development on a basis of real investments according to integrated and interrelated programs.

The paper stated that the first decade of Arab development must work to give an economic content to Arab coordination on various current international economic problems and strive to establish a new order. In addition the paper referred to prospects for the first decade of Arab development including the boycott of the Zionist entity and the strengthening of the blockade around it in addition to the development of a joint Arab economic apparatus.

The paper advances a number of proposals in the area of developing the joint Arab economic apparatus. As a first stage, the paper proposes some legal changes in the mutual defense and economic cooperation among the countries of the Arab League.

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 2 Oct 80 p 1

[Article: "Following Four Days' Official Visit in Algeria: 'Rapprochement Between the Algerian and Mauritanian People, Unity of the Maghreb, Arab-African Cooperation' Are Stressed by President Ould Haidallah As He Leaves Algiers"]

[Excerpt] Algiers (APS)--Following a four days' official visit in Algeria, the Mauritanian president, Mr Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidallah, left Algiers at 1300 hours for Nouakchott; as he left, he was greeted by the president of the republic and general secretary of the party, Mr Chadli Bendjedid, who was accompanied by Mr Rabah Bitat, member of the political bureau, president of the National People's Assembly, and Mr Abdelghani, member of the central committee and prime minister.

Before taking his seat in the plane, the head of the Mauritanian state greeted members of the central committee and of the government, party and government officials and members of the diplomatic corps in Algiers.

A salute of 21 gun-shots was fired to honor the illustrious guest of Algeria who, next to President Chadli Bendjedid, had listened to the national anthems of the two countries before "reviewing a detachment from El-Haras El-Djoumhouri" who were presenting arms.

In the official reception hall of the airport, President Ould Haidallah, speaking to the press, drew the conclusions of his official visit; among other things, he stated that his conversations with President Chadli Bendjedid "dealt with regional, Arab, African and international questions."

"Of course," he added, "bilateral cooperation and the means to revive it have received particular attention. I am leaving with the conviction that this visit will contribute to a rapprochement between our two brother nations and to the unity of our beloved Maghreb, to Arab-African cooperation and to the unity of the Arab world."

In concluding, the head of the Mauritanian state thanked President Chadli Bendjedid and the Algerian people and government for the warm welcome and hospitality extended to him and his delegation during his official visit to Algeria.

After leaving Algiers, the president of the Mauritanian Islamic Republic made a technical stop at the Bechar airport, in southwestern Algeria, at 1500 hours.

As he left the plane, the Mauritanian president was greeted by civil and military officials in Bechar, including the governor and the head of the third military region, before reviewing a detachment of the People's National Army who were presenting arms.

After resting a while at the official reception hall of the airport, the presidential delegation flew back to Nouakchott.

Official Communique

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 2 Oct 80 p 3

[Article: "'Considerable Agreement' Underlined in Algerian-Mauritanian Joint Communique"]

> [Text] Algiers (APS)--Following the official visit of the Mauritanian president, Mr Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidallah, an Algerian-Mauritanian joint communique has been published; we are reproducing it in its entirety:

At the invitation of Mr Chadli Bendjedid, president of the Algerian Democratic People's Republic and general secretary of the FLN Party, His Excellency Lieutenant-Colonel [Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidallah], president of the Military Committee of National Safety, head of the state and of the government of the Mauritanian Islamic Republic, made an official visit to Algeria from 28 September to 1 October 1980.

During their stay, President Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidallah and the delegation accompanying him visited various agricultural and industrial projects and had the opportunity to appreciate the efforts made by Algeria to strengthen its independence in all fields.

The two presidents had conversations to which the following also took part:

For Algeria: Messrs Ahmed Taleb Ibrahimi, member of the central committee, minister to the Presidency of the Republic, Abdelhamid Brahimi, member of the central committee, minister of Planning and National Development, Djelloul Bakhti Nemmiche, member of the central committee, minister of Veterans' Affairs, Abdelaziz Khellef, member of the central committee, minister of Commerce, Smail Hamdani, member of the central committee, Mohieddine Amimour, member of the central committee, adviser to the Presidency of the Republic, Mohamed Salah Dembri, general secretary at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Abdelouahab Abada, director of the African department at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and Ahmed Dekhili, assistant director at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

For Mauritania: Major Gabriel Simper, member of the Military Committee of National Safety, assistant chief of staff, Messrs Mohamed El Mokhtar Ould Zamel, minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Mamadou Cissoko, minister of Industry, Mines and Commerce, Abderrahmane Ould Saibott, head of the presidential staff, Mohamed Ould Mohamed Mahmoud, ambassador, Kamara Ali, director of administrative affairs at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Mohamed Ould Hamadi, press adviser to the presidency.

During these conversations, which took place in an atmosphere of fraternity, harmony and mutual understanding, the two parties reviewed their bilateral relations and matters of common interest, and exchanged opinions concerning the development of the regional, African, Arab and international situation. These discussions showed that considerable agreement exists between the two countries, which reflects the nature and strength of the many ties between the Algerian and Mauritanian people.

Reviewing their bilateral relations, the two parties were pleased at their present development. They reaffirmed their conviction that a fruitful and mutually advantageous cooperation, based on mutual respect, fully answers the legitimate aspirations of the two people for development and well-being, just as it reflects their century-old relations of friendship and neighborliness. In this respect, both parties are of the opinion that the positive results achieved by the recent meeting of the mixed Algerian-Mauritanian committee for economic, scientific and technical cooperation are a concrete confirmation of their mutual desire to develop exchanges between the two countries in all domains. They also consider that the decisions arrived at on this occasion represent a significant milestone in the development of Algerian-Mauritanian relations based on fraternity, solidarity, neighborliness and the respect of each other's national sovereignty.

Reviewing the situation in their region, the two parties reaffirmed the attachment of their countries to the principles and ideals of the Charter of African Unity. In this respect, they reaffirmed the commitment of the two countries to promote relations of friendship, fraternity, neighborliness and close cooperation between themselves, and to continue to work toward the creation of a climate of mutual trust and understanding which could promote the realization of the aspirations of the people in the region as a whole for peace, liberty, security and material progress. In this spirit, they renewed their full adhesion to the principles set forth in the political declaration of the Fifth Summit of Saharian States, which in both parties' opinion represents an adequate basis and frame of reference for the development of regional cooperation.

After carefully reviewing the question of Western Sahara, the two parties expressed their great concern with respect to the threat which this question represents to peace and security in this region of the continent.

The two parties were pleased at the efforts made by the international community, especially the United Nations Organization and the OAU [Organization of African Unity] to help the people of Western Sahara exercise its imprescriptible right to self-determination.

They made a point of giving credit to the ad-hoc committee of the OAU, and more particularly to the heads of state which comprise it, for their efforts to arrive at a just and final political solution of the question of Western Sahara.

The two parties renewed their determination to work toward a strengthening of the OAU which they consider to be a privileged instrument in achieving complete liberation of the African continent, and in struggling for the economic and cultural development of the African people and for the creation of a climate of peace, security and concord.

In this respect, the two parties profoundly regret the tragic situation now prevailing in Chad. They expressed their appreciation for the continued efforts of the African community, and especially of the OAU, to preserve the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of Chad. In this spirit, they reaffirmed their support to the Lagos agreements which should enable the provisional national union government to accomplish its mission of restoring peace and establishing concord.

Concerning the situation in South Africa, the two parties stressed their adhesion to the modalities providing for Namibia's accession to independence, and their desire to see these modalities applied strictly and immediately, according to the decisions and resolutions of the United Nations; and the two parties reaffirmed their indefectible solidarity with the Namibian people in its legitimate struggle, under the leadership of its one and only representative, the SWAPO.

The two parties repeated their strong condemnation of the inhuman policy of apartheid and they expressed their indefectible solidarity with the people of South Africa in their struggle to achieve freedom and the recognition of their fundamental national rights.

The two parties reaffirmed their belief in a common destiny for the Arab and African people. They consider that, just as many century-long traditions have created ties between the two regions, new and intensified relations of solidarity and cooperation must develop between Africa and the Arab World to achieve the development of their people and to preserve their independence.

Analyzing the situation prevailing in the Middle East, the two parties stated again their firm condemnation of the Camp Davis agreements and stressed the dangerous implications that these agreements contain for the liberty of the people in this area and for international peace and security.

The two parties consider that any settlement of the Middle-East problem should provide for the restitution of all occupied Arab territories, including El-Qods, and the return of the Palestinian people to their usurped homeland.

They reaffirm their continued and indefectible support to the Palestinian people in their struggle under the leadership of their one and only representative, the Palestine Liberation Organization.

The two parties have considered with great concern the armed struggle opposing Iraq and Iran. After informing each other of their respective stand on this question, they expressed their deep concern in view of this fratricidal war which could have the most nefarious consequences in a region where the natural solidarity between all Arab and Islamic countries should be affirmed against their common imperialist and Zionist enemy. Attached to the higher interests of the Arab nation and of the Islamic community, and to the cohesion of nonalined countries, they express the hope that a rapid settlement of the dispute will restore peace and concord among Muslim countries and strengthen their front against imperialism, Zionism and underdevelopment.

The two parties also reaffirmed their complete adhesion to the principles and objectives of nonalinement, and stressed the fact that the policy of the nonalined movement remains, now more than ever, an irreplaceable factor in the struggle for the liberation and emancipation of the people, the settlement of international problems, the promotion of international cooperation and the safeguard of peace and security in the world.

They also consider that the withdrawal of foreign forces and the dismantling of all foreign bases now existing on the territory of Third-World countries will represent a decisive contribution in ensuring peace in the world.

The two parties have given particular attention to the question of development and the restructuration of international economic relations and they have also underlined the fundamental part which all developing countries must play in establishing relations of a new type between developing and developed countries.

They have reaffirmed their determination to increase the coordination of their efforts to strengthen solidarity between developing countries, especially through actions undertaken within international organizations, to obtain satisfaction for their legitimate demands concerning a new international economic order.

The two parties expressed their pleasure at the atmosphere of brotherliness which characterized their conversations, and at the results which have been achieved. They decided to intensify the exchange of visits at all levels so as to ensure an increased development of the cooperation between Algeria and Mauritania, in line with the new prospects outlined during these conversations.

President Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidallah warmly thanked President Chadli Bendjedid for his invitation and expressed to him and to the Algerian people and government his sincere gratitude for the brotherly and warm welcome which was extended to his delegation and to himself during their stay in Algeria.

President Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidallah invited President Chadli Bendjedid for an official visit in the Mauritanian Islamic Republic. The invitation was accepted with pleasure. Its date will be determined later on.

CAMP DAVID ACCORDS CRITICIZED, ARAB REACTION DESCRIBED

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 18 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Two years ago, on 18 September 1978, Anwar Sadat, along with Begin and Carter, signed the first pact of high treason that an Arab head of state ever set his name to in the history of our nation. For Sadat, Camp David was the crowning glory of his "political escapade" at occupied El-Qods (Jerusalem), on 19 November of last year. The "Pax Americana," long seen by the Arabs as a serious danger, found a much-heralded beginning in Sadat's Egypt. From east to west, the Arab nation has reacted against the crime of the "cursed son of Mit Aboul Koum." The Arab nation is even ready to take the offensive.

The Arab rejection front, which includes Algeria, Syria, Libya, Democratic Yemen and the PLO, has formulated a platform of action to oppose the danger of Sadat. The Arab masses, very sensitive to the reaction of these progressive nations, enthusiastically show their support and their satisfaction. Denunciations of Camp David are heard from Kuwait to Algiers.

Two months after the Camp David accords were concluded, the Arab kings and heads of state unanimously decided at the Baghdad summit to join in retaliatory measures advocated several months earlier by the Arab rejection front.

The political, diplomatic, economic and cultural boycott against Egypt today ensures her isolation.

Meanwhile, Tel Aviv and Washington are seeking to exploit this breach in the Arab world. How?

1) With Egypt: the establishment of diplomatic relations and exchange of ambassadors in Tel Aviv and Cairo.

The reopening of borders between the two countries was followed by commercial exchanges and official visits to the two capitals.

2) Militarily: despite all the assurances given by Washington, the intransigent Begin refuses to accept total Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai. Unfortunately for Sadat, the withdrawal will be gradual and spread out over several years in order "not to endanger Israel's security."

Egyptian-Israeli military cooperation, one of the secret clauses of the Camp David accords, will assuredly make rapid progress. The agents of Sin-Beth and Mossad now have tea in the velvet-walled rooms of Qasr En-Nil along with their Egyptian colleagues of the "moukhatarate" and the CIA.

The presence of Israeli and American secret agents is eagerly requested by Sadat in an effort to protect himself against any danger of a coup d'etat by free officers.

3) Egypt has also taken on a new role: that of the new policeman in the region, after the fall of the Shah of Iran. In April 1980, Sadat's Egypt was transformed into a base for aggression. The military planes that attacked Tabas in Iran took off from a newly established U.S. airbase a few dozen kilometers from Cairo. Two other bases, meant for the stationing of B 52's and having a special mission, have now opened, encouraging Sadat to propose the intervention of the Egyptian army into any Arab country...

4) The Egyptians, Israelis and Americans were not able to provide for an important clause in their accord. The plans for the "autonomy" of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip were denounced and rejected by the Palestinian people. Washington, Tel Aviv and Cairo then tried to push for the emergence of a "third force," capable, in their opinion, to evict the tenants of the PLO. There too, they are failing miserably.

5) This summer, the annexation of El-Qods (Jerusalem) replaced the spectre of Camp David at the forefront of international events. The next Arab summit, to be held next November in Amman, promises to be a decisive stage in the Arab reaction to Zionist expansion. In reporting to President Chadli on the evolution of the Near East situation, Mr Abdelhalim Khaddam, Syrian foreign affairs minister, restated the fact that "the Camp David conspiracy is aimed at isolating the Arab nation."

The danger has not yet been averted.

INSIDER'S BOOK ON FLN REVIEWED

Paris LE MONDE in French 8 Aug 80 p 14

[Book Review by Paul Balta]

[Text] Here is one book[1] that cannot fail to set people's teeth on edge and create controversy: without qualms, the author publicly washes the dirty laundry of the various clans in the Algerian family. In fact, he announces in his opening lines that he wants [the book] to be "an analysis of the controversies and conflicts that tore apart the people's nationalism in Algeria between 1946 and 1962." There is more, however. Going back to the origins of the national movement that asserted itself in 1926 with "L'Etoile nord-africaine" [North African Star], although it had deeper historical roots, this work "represents the first part of a broader project involving Algerian society."[2] In its present form, it unfolds on several levels.

In the first place it is a historical compilation. This is a book to be reckoned with, even by its critics--and it already has some. Until now, the main authority on the Algerian War had been the "foursome" by Yves Courriere[3]. Everyone used it as a reference, even the Algerian cadres.[4] Nothing more exhaustive was available. This is no longer the case. Mohammed Harbi read everything written concerning his country, he had access to many unpublished documents, he questioned many witnesses and then he dissected, analyzed and examined it all critically.

In addition, this is a researcher's work: Although one may not share many of his conclusions, his book is filled with facts that cannot be ignored. Thus, with regard to the assault on the Oran post office on 5 April 1949, he reveals that, contrary to the usually accepted version, Ben Bella was not responsible for that attack: the former president only gave some assistance to Ait Ahmed, who had prepared the operation based on information provided by Nemiche Djelloul, while a commando group which included Mohammed Khider took responsibility for the execution.

The book abounds with unpublished details, supported by documents or by first-hand testimony, regarding the ulterior motives of neighbors on the Maghreb side or those of Near-Eastern rulers, about personal rivalries, ideological differences, the attitude of a particular leader or the part played by a particular event. Also worthy of mention are the biographical footnotes and the index--all too often lacking in French publications--that make it possible to easily pinpoint and find confederates.

Next, [this book is] a sociological study. Taking the opposite tack to contemporary historians who have been stressing the urban nature of Algerian nationalism, Harbi, for his part, is placing the emphasis on the importance from the very beginning, of Algerian emigration, which has an essentially rural origin. He subtly shows the "plebeian" nature of that revolution and how the village often took precedence over the city. Also notable are his analysis of the "populistic ideology" of Messali Hadj and other leaders, as well as his analysis of the Berber phenomenon in its natural manifestations, the Berbers being one of the nation's [ethnic] components, as well as in its excesses and deviations.

The book also contains ideological thoughts. The author has "attempted to show that, during this entire period (1946-1962), crises and frequent turnovers in political personnel were but moments in the formation of a new social force: bureaucracy." Even though, in this respect, "Algeria represents a borderline case in the history of decolonization" as the author points out to justify his argumentation, his too-thorough analysis regrettably gives the impression that Algeria has a monopoly on bureaucracy, ignoring the fact that this phenomenon has developed in many other nations, where it has reached hypertrophia.

A Pamphlet

By placing in context, as he does, Messali Hadj's personality and his work, and without hiding any part of his shortcomings or errors, he greatly contributes to restoring the good name of the founder of the nationalist movement, whose evolution he analyzes in detail: from the "Etoile nord-africaine" (March 1926 to 1 November 1954) via the Algerian People's Party (March 1937-September 1939) to the Movement for the Triumph of Democratic Liberties (November 1946-November 1954) and its offshoots including the OS [Special Organization], which originated in February 1947. He also shows with relevant examples how the FLN is the final link in that line of descent, even though the FLN, having become the one and only party, is reluctant to admit it.

Finally the book is also a political tool, as the polemicist shows through under the veil of ideology--although this aspect of the book is not its best. Before 1 November 1954, for instance, Harbi takes praiseworthy care to examine the motivations of the various political tendencies and of the men representing them, while, as we near the year 1962, the account of personal rivalries competes with ideological content. There is such overemphasis that we end up wondering how Algeria was able to achieve its independence and through what miracle the FLN managed to create a doctrine--which appears in the various charters, including the charter of 1964, in which Harbi participated--and how it was able to define a remarkably consistent foreign policy which finally, in 1974, sparked the idea of a new international system.

The author points out a consistent aspect of modern Algeria which he apparently deplores: every time the nationalist movement is shattered, he writes, it "regroups around its most centralizing and authoritarian core, the OS in 1954, the ALN [National Liberation Army] on the borders in 1962." Similarly, he points out that many of its leaders, including Messali Hadj and Boumediene, are "radicals and centralizers." One may wonder--he hardly does--whether the Algerian nation has not put up with that centralistic tendency because of its centuries-long troubles due to the lack of a strong and structured government. The question would have been worthy of further investigation.

In conclusion, while long chapters are devoted to one or two-year periods, eight pages are considered sufficient to take care of the 18 years following independence, which are judged, on the whole, to have a negative balance. This is only an epilog, to be sure, but the author could have saved himself the trouble, as it closely resembles the clumsy gesture of a cook who at the last minute ruins the sauce he had carefully concocted. Harbi, who had his share of the power structure until 1965, with a group that shared his ideas, describes at length the rivalries of the Algerian political class and deplores them, which does not prevent him from settling his accounts, too, and enjoying it. In spite of the above reservations, "FLN, Mirage and Reality" remains a major book.

SOVIET-ALGERIAN AGRICULTURAL COOPERATION TALKS BEGIN

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 12-13 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] Algiers (APS)--The Algerian-Soviet agricultural talks began Thursday morning at the Ministry of Agriculture and the Agrarian Revolution.

The Algerians were represented by Mr Bouzid Hammiche, secretary general of the Ministry of Agriculture and the Agrarian Revolution. The Soviet delegation was led by the Soviet Vice Minister of Agriculture, Mr B. A. Rounov.

After welcoming the Soviet delegation, Mr Hammiche stated that the main object of the official opening of the working sessions between the two parties was the development of conditions for the carrying out of a number of projects relating to Algerian agricultural development.

The agricultural subcommittee, organized as part of the joint Algerian-Soviet committee, has provided for a geobotanical study for the plains area, another for increased cereal cultivation and a third aimed at the strengthening of scientific and technical cooperation, especially in the fields of research and training. A fourth project deals with the Green Dam of the Aflou region. As for Mr Rounov, he stated that he was pleased to collaborate with those responsible for agriculture in Algeria, specifying that the first working session would determine the means for carrying out the proposals already made. He emphasized that the price of food has continued to rise and that some countries are making a political demand of it. He stressed that "being self sufficient in food has become a necessity." In this context, he stated that 27 percent of the USSR budget is devoted to agriculture.

It is to be noted that the working sessions to follow will be approved by an official report which will be signed Wednesday, 16 September.

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 28 Sep 80 p 2

[Article: "Algeria-Congo: To Develop Further the Friendly Ties Which Exist Between the Two Countries"]

[Text] Algiers (ASP)--At the invitation of Mr Rabah Bitat, member of the political bureau, president of the National People's Assembly, a large Congolese parliamentary delegation headed by Mr Jean Ganga Zandzou, member of the political bureau of the central committee of the Congolese Labor Party, invested with the people's powers and president of the National People's Assembly of the People's Republic of Congo, has been staying in Algeria for an official visit since 25 September 1980.

During its stay in Algeria, the Congolese parliamentary delegation is escorted by an honorary committee chaired by Mr Djelloul Melaika, member of the central committee and vice-president of the National People's Assembly, and by several deputies.

On Friday 26 September 1980, the Congolese parliamentary delegation went sightseeing to Tipaza, and they visited the tourist complex of Sidi Fredj and the Palace of Nations.

On Saturday morning, 27 September 1980, the Congolese parliamentary delegation, accompanied by Mr Djelloul Melaika, went to the El Alia cemetery to meditate and deposit a wreath at the Martyrs' Square, on the tomb of President Boumediene.

That same morning, the first conversations between members of the Congolese and Algerian parliamentary delegations, headed respectively by Mr Jean Ganga Zandzou, member of the political bureau, invested with the people's powers and president of the National People's Assembly, and Mr Rabah Bitat, member of the political bureau and president of the National People's Assembly, took place.

During these conversations, the respective socialist development policies of the Congolese and Algerian republics were examined, as well as questions pertaining to present international problems.

The Algerian and Congolese parties were pleased to note the similarity between the options on which their development strategies are based, their common will for political and economic independence, their active solidarity in the struggle against imperialism and colonialism.

The Algerian and Congolese parliamentary delegations agreed that this visit will contribute to further develop the friendly ties which exist between the two countries.

During the afternoon, the Congolese parliamentary delegation will visit projects of an economic character, among which the Meftah cement plant in the Blida governorate.

Finally, Saturday evening, 27 September 1980, the Congolese parliamentary delegation were guests at an official dinner given by Mr Rabah Bitat, member of the political bureau, president of the National People's Assembly, to which members of the FLN Party and of the government were also present.

STABILIZED CONCRETE SEEN AS SUBSTITUTE FOR CEMENT IN CONSTRUCTION

[Text] Oran--The National Center for Business Initiatives and Information in the Construction Sector (CNAT) has developed an indepth study on "stabilized concrete," a substitute material which can replace, to a great extent, the exclusive use of cement. In 1971, the problems of the supply of construction materials, acutely felt in the remote southern regions, prompted researchers from the Ministry of Housing to begin studies aimed at "using local soils in order to obtain a material with technically acceptable characteristics for the construction of durable housing." In Algeria, the use of untreated earth is very widespread and the constructions have always met with the satisfaction of the local population.

Two villages of the Agrarian Revolution, one part of 100 houses in Haich, in the Biskra region and the second made up of 200 houses in Maâder, in the district of Bou-Saâda, are presently being used as a testing ground for housing technicians. These socialist villages now being built are constructed of stabilized earth, a kind of mortar called "stabilized concrete" (BTS).

The technicians believe the BTS can be used as a replacement for concrete cement in the form of bond-stone. These bond-stones are made at the building site using earth from the excavations. For constructions of a lesser size, they are made manually. Mechanization is necessary for the building of large sections of housing. The studies carried out have also helped the technicians discover that BTS is an excellent thermal insulator. The bulletin of the CNAT explains to this effect that "the variations of temperature of the Saharan climate are adjusted by the fact that the energy stored during the day by the BTS is released outside during the night. What is more, the CNAT bulletin concludes by stating that a type of architecture based upon the arrangement of doors and windows creates an indoor atmosphere that is quite pleasant.

ANALYSIS OF SNS ACTIVITIES GIVEN

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 9 Sep 80 p 2

[Article by A. Boutrahi]

> [Text] As a company with a strategic role in the general development of the country, the SNS [National Iron and Steel Company] was the subject of a recent article which appeared in these same columns. As one article cannot give a complete picture of an expanding company which, because of its growth, encompasses several areas, Mr Hamoutene, company director, was willing to supply us with further information that is often unknown to the general public.

With regards to the production objectives of the SNS for several commercial products indispensable in many areas, 820,000 tons of cast iron were produced in 1980 with an objective of 1,236,000 tons in 1981. For liquid steel, 463,000 tons in 1980 and 994,000 tons for 1981.

Welded pipes: 180,000 tons in 1980 and 200,000 tons for 1981.

Seamless pipes: 41,000 tons in 1980 compared with 51,000 tons in 1981.

Gas and iron pipes: 30,000 tons in 1980 and 31,000 tons in 1981. With regard to steel for construction, 270,000 tons of ferroconcrete were produced in 1980 with a view to 300,000 tons in 1981; 50,000 tons of machine wire in 1980 and 85,000 tons planned for 1981. The production of welded gratings was 26,000 tons in 1980, which will be maintained in 1981. For light metal girders: 6,000 tons in 1980 and 7,000 tons in 1981. For the first two items, one must be aware that the amounts produced represented 50 percent of market needs.

In the area of cold-casted extrusions used in metal casings, automobile bodies, metal joinery and furniture making, 55,000 tons were produced in 1980 with an objective of 60,000 tons in 1981. Thirty-two thousand tons of metal wrappings, casings and frames were produced in 1980 and 35,000 tons are planned for 1981. One million, two hundred thousand units of gas cylinders were made in 1980 and 1,300,000 will be produced in 1981.

Zinc electrolytes: 30,000 tons in 1980 and 1981; welding electodes: 6,000 tons in 1980 compared with 7,000 tons in 1981. For welding flux, the total demand was covered.

Industrial gas is a very important area of the SNS. The installed capacities for oxygen, nitrogen, protoxide and acetylene exceeded demand. Since 1972, when the SNS took over this area, the initial capacities have been increased 100-fold. Work has begun on a new facility in Arzew for carbon dioxide.

To return for a moment to steel for construction, we have learned that 50 percent of market needs for ferroconcrete have been met, exports accounting for the remainder.

In the area of manpower, the SNS has 41,000 workers, while in 1970, it had 7,700.

A very large distribution network has been realized in order to bring the product closer to the user, while permitting the establishment of stocks which protect the commercial sectors.

In the area of SNS and production: the company has two engineering firms: URPTD and SERSID and four construction firms: REALSIDER, TRAVOSIDER, GENISIDER AND COSIDER. They are chiefly used for company needs, but also lend their services to other companies, taking into account their actual needs, especially in the area of housing. There are also subsidiaries such as SIDAL [Algerian Iron and Steel Company], which deals with production studies, maintenance, medical or cryogenic facilities, technology used in the areas of stocking and distribution of gas in liquid and gaseous forms, deep-freezing, freezing, transport under controlled temperature and the safety of transporters of methane.

This subsidiary also deals with technical diffusion in the area of welding, while ensuring the training or recycling of welders.

In the area of professional undersea diving, it trains specialists who deal with the safety and development of underwater techniques not previously mastered in our country.

Furthermore, in the development of iron and steel products, the PROSIDER company has the role of developing the uses of SNS products, especially those of portable arched panels, which permit the rapid construction of stocking areas and small workshops. Using these materials, the firm has produced in response to the social needs of its workers, a multisports stadium in Kouba in record time. In this regard, it is interesting to note that this light structure, whose recovered costs challenge any competition, is attracting the attention of many companies, especially local authorities and regions with small means of production.

Nonferrous metallurgy, especially the first and second conversions of aluminum, is an area which the SNS hopes to develop very rapidly, taking into account the imperatives of national development and the increasingly large place of aluminum in many areas, from tools to aspirin containers to packaging and metal joinery, to name only a few examples.

Aluminum is indeed becoming an ideal product for substitution and it is time to provide for the development of this sector.

Before concluding, we must mention that the SNS, like many companies, is confronted with problems which it must resolve at any price.

It remains that the impression the company gives is that of wanting to face up to its problems, further mastering other technologies and continuing to evolve and progress. As in the example of SIDAL, one realizes that the SNS has far-reaching goals, which must be considered encouraging in many respects.

MINISTER OF EDUCATION MEETS WITH DISSIDENT STUDENTS

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 22 Sep 80 p 17

[Article by Sami 'Imarah: "Message from al-Manamah: Bahrain Minister of Education in Lengthy Interview with Students Studying Abroad; 'National Union of Bahrain Students Is Non-Existent; We Will Not Recognize It Because It Is Not in Bahrain;' Comprehensive Dialogue Around Decisions To Organize Students' Missions and Restrictions That Have Been Imposed"]

[Text] There was a candid dialogue between Bahrain's minister of education and Bahrain's students abroad during the meeting that they had. The dialogue was about the recent decisions that had been made by the Ministry of Education regarding student missions abroad. The students regarded those decisions as restrictions on their freedom.

The minister candidly explained the objectives that led to these decisions being issued. He said that the purpose of every text mentioned in these decisions was to protect the future of the students who are needed by the state because they are its real wealth. The state also wants to protect them from involvement in problems that may hurt them and hurt their future.

The meeting took place at the Summer Activities Center for Students of Higher Institutes of Learning and Universities at the old Eagles Club. The meeting was attended by al-Shaykh 'Abd-al-'Aziz ibn Muhammad al-Khalifa, the minister of education; Dr Jalil al-'Arid, undersecretary of the Ministry of Education; and Mrs Safiyyah Dawighar, the director of the Students' Mission Office at the Ministry of Education.

Al-Shaykh 'Abd-al-'Aziz ibn Muhammad al-Khalifa said at the beginning of the meeting, "I would like to express many thanks to our sons the students who provided us with this opportunity to meet and to speak about matters that are of interest to the students. I would like to be clear from the beginning. We welcome any meeting with our sons the students. We welcome everything that would close the gap between us and unite us because we have one objective and because we consider ourselves responsible for the interests of our male and female students. It is the interests of the male and female students that lie behind all the measures that are taken. We are prepared to take students' opinions and observations into consideration, and our readiness to do so is based on the certainty that when our actions are predicated upon our duties, they are dictated by the public good and what we see as our duty to serve the public interest. I do not want to be long-winded. I want you to have the full opportunity to ask all the questions that you have."

The dialogue began with a question about the reasons that led the Ministry of Education to issue the recent decisions regarding the student's missions. The person who posed the question said that he considered his question to be an introduction to the dialogue process.

The minister said, "I will try to answer this question as comprehensively as I can. I said from the outset that the purpose of everything we do is to serve the students--male and female. There have been new circumstances and surrounding conditions that have required the introduction of amendments to the regulations for students' missions which were drawn up in 1960. A few fraternal countries nearby have operated on these regulations. What these countries have indicates the extent of the developments that have been introduced into the students' mission regulations. We are trying to have Bahrain students studying abroad devote themselves to learning and to acquiring the necessary qualifications so that they would return to their country and serve it in the area that it needs. We must keep male and female students from becoming involved in conduct that would not be beneficial to them at present or in the future. Therefore, it was our opinion that the students' mission regulations include conditions that would make the male or female student devote himself or herself to learning.

"We found that the student whose father has vouched for him and signed a pledge on his behalf may be in a position to think before he becomes involved in conduct that would not benefit his present or his future. The amendment we introduced to the students' mission regulations is not a novelty in those regulations. It has its analogues in regulations governing students' missions in nearby fraternal countries and in other fraternal countries. As we know constitutions copy each other, and the regulations governing students' missions which we heeded and referred to are those of Jordan and Qatar, for example. We find that in those regulations, whether the parent makes a pledge for his son, secures a financial bond for him or pays back the money that was spent for the student if he exhausts the number of times he can fail and is expelled from the university, the parent has to pay back the money that was spent for him. This is enforced in Qatar even though the financial capability is available there. Nevertheless, this condition is mentioned and can be found in the regulations that are applied in Qatar."

Regarding a question around the reason behind the decision to ban coeducation in Al Khalij [Gulf] University despite the fact that education in Al Khalij Industrial College and in Bahrain University College is coeducational, the minister of education replied, "I do not know to what extent my colleagues [on this panel] are willing to entertain this question, because it would sidetrack us from the subject of this meeting, which is being held to discuss decisions that were made recently. Nevertheless, the answer is that this was a decision made by the congress which approved the establishment of Al Khalij University. [This] congress represents a number of ministers of education in the area, and it is their opinion that education at Al Khalij University should not be coeducational. This was the decision of the congress. It would be difficult for us to change it or to have the freedom to change it. Bahrain is host to the university, and since there are seven countries [sponsoring the university] with every country having its opinion, a decision is made on the basis of what the majority decides, and it was the opinion of the majority that education should not be coeducational.

Governmental Decisions

One of the students asked about the agency that made the recent decisions. Was it the Ministry of Education or another agency? The student said, "If it was the Ministry of Education that issued the decisions, would it not have been more useful for the ministry to discuss them with the students just as it is doing so now?" The student said, "The decisions have been put into practice and have been implemented, and I do not know what possible use our meeting now could have! Will we be able to change some of these decisions at this meeting?"

The minister of education replied, "I would like to mention here that I had the honor of meeting the prince and the prime minister with the representatives of Bahrain students' clubs abroad. [Our] colleague Hasan al-'Abasi here was listening. Colleague al-'Abasi began by saying that he thanked the Ministry of Education for the decisions it issued. When it was the prime minister's turn to speak, he was careful to say that the decisions that were made were government decisions even though they were issued by the Ministry of Education. The decisions were issued, and it was natural that they be issued by the Ministry of Education because this is its area of jurisdiction."

The minister said, "I do not think that these decisions infringe upon a student's freedom. What was intended was to designate and to determine the area of specialization. The country needs specializations, and the material capabilities are limited. Therefore, it was important to confine the scholarships and the grants to the areas that are needed by the country. In this, there is no infringement whatsoever on the student, or on his freedom to choose, as some are saying.

"We did stipulate that the student not be involved in any political activity because we know from experience that a number of male and female students ruined their futures because they were interested in politics. We know that there are political organizations that try to take advantage of students, and it is our duty to keep our children the students away from this exploitation so that they would have the time to study because the country needs scientific cadres."

One of the students asked about the reasons that led to issuing a decision to prevent students from traveling to other countries, other than the one country where each has his scholarship. He also asked about the need for a student to return to Bahrain during the vacation. The student who raised that question said that with this decision the Ministry of Education was preventing the student from practicing one of his rights as a citizen, which is the right to travel, a right provided for him by the constitution.

The minister of education replied, "The assumption behind issuing any one of these decisions is to protect the student and safeguard him from everything that might hurt him." He said that the passport determined the countries where the student may travel; however, students did travel to other countries and got into trouble.

"The student says that such conduct is freedom, but it may be explained as involvement in problems that the student does not need. A student who is studying in Kuwait is asked to go to the place of his student mission in Kuwait, to study and return to Bahrain. In 4 years he graduates; and after he graduates, he can go anywhere he wants to go. But while he is a student, he is not to travel to any country that is not mentioned on his passport."

Mrs Safiyyah Dawighar director of student missions said, "With regard to the condition to return to Bahrain, the minstry thinks that this condition represents the tie that exists between it and its students abroad. Summer is a period during which the student can consult with the Ministry of Education, and the ministry can consult with the student. Likewise, the student has a ticket for 1 year only, and it would not permit him to travel to any other places. Some students get themselves into trouble by traveling to places other than those provided to them by their tickets."

Abiding by Regulations

One of the students said, "I consider this a curtailment of freedom. A student is not a child. The law gave him rights, and when he reaches the age of 18, he becomes an independent person and he does not even need the approval of his parent to travel abroad." The minister of education replied, "If I am permitted, I would like to add that obeying regulations does not mean curtailment of freedom. A passport is a document issued by the state to determine the countries to which the passport bearer can travel. Abiding by this means abiding by regulations. Abiding by regulations does not mean renouncing personal freedom. There are instances in which some students departed from the mandate provided for them in the passport, and they traveled to countries that were not mentioned in the passport. We are being asked by the state to ensure that the students conduct themselves well and that they follow the instructions determined in the travel document carefully."

Dr Jalil al-'Arid said, "Stipulating that the student not leave the country where he is studying during the period of his study came about because there were instances when a male or female student left the country of the student mission. This resulted in several problems. Let me give you an example. The father of one of the female students came to us and told us that his daughter had left the country where she had been studying with a non-Bahraini citizen. They had gone to a neighboring country, and they did get married without the knowledge or approval of the father or of the embassy of Bahrain in that country.

"There is the case of a student who left the United States with handbills, and when he arrived to another country, he was arrested. The handbills were taken away from him, and his passport was stamped so that he would not be permitted to enter that country. When he returned to the United States, they stamped his passport, 'Not to be admitted to the United States.' When he arrived at the airport of one of the European countries, his passport was stamped, 'Not to be admitted to that country.' They asked him, 'How much money do you have?' When they found out that he had enough money for a ticket to Bahrain, they reserved a ticket for him, and they returned him to Bahrain. Hence came the special decision not to allow a student to travel to any other place from the country where his student mission is located."

The Question of Traveling

One of the students said, "The undersecretary brought up the question of traveling, and he brought up a subject that touches me personally. I am the student who was denied admission to Canada, to the United States and to Britain. I am that student. But why was I denied admission? Why did that happen? This happened for political reasons that pertain to the Palestinian question. I came here, and the Ministry of Education was supposed to have defended me as a student who had reached his fourth year. But the ministry did not defend me. It did not even agree that I should continue my studies at my own expense in the area where I was studying. I met with a number of officials in the Ministry of Education, and they said that the subject was outside the scope of the Ministry of Education and that I would have to deal with the Ministry of Interior on that matter even though it is purely an educational matter."

The minister of education commented on the student's comment and said, "I would like to thank my friend for two reasons. First, [because] he is practically the only one who is raising questions, and this is making the debate lively. The second reason is that he did in fact give us the example, and he proved that we are truthful when we say that we are trying to spare the students involvement in problems not even the Ministry of Education can solve."

The Union Is Non-Existent

One of the students asked about the paragraph which pertained to the political organization and which was mentioned in the decisions. The student said, "Does belonging to a political organization mean the National Union of Bahrain Students?" The minister replied, "The National Union for Bahrain Students is not implied in the special paragraph pertaining to belonging to a political party for the simple reason that officially and legally the union does not exist. I remember that this union was trying to obtain official recognition from the government 6 years ago. The response of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs--and it is this ministry which is authorized to give official permits to clubs and associations--was that it would be difficult for us to recognize this union because it does not operate in Bahrain and we would not be able to become acquainted with its activities. The problem continues to exist because the union is outside Bahrain."

The same student commented again on the right to travel and the question of marriage. He said, "The student is a citizen, and the constitution and the law have guaranteed him the freedom to travel. Likewise, the subject of marriage is a personal subject that pertains to the student's rights. It is governed only by the general laws which govern the country."

There was a discussion between the minister and the students about the possibility of presenting these decisions to the students for their opinion before they are issued. The minister said, "From a practical point of view this is not possible. If we had a parliament, we would have presented these decisions or any other decisions before issuing them."

The Gap and Sensitivities

One of the students touched upon the gap and the sensitivities that exist between the students and the government, represented by the Ministry of Education and the embassies abroad. The student proposed the idea of establishing a dialogue between officials and students. He said, "As a national union for Bahrain students we ask why don't we have this dialogue?" Then he said, "Do the clubs for Bahrain students represent the students of Bahrain? There are organizations that represent the vast majority of Bahrain students in the country and abroad, but they have not been recognized. If it has been said that there was a union for Bahrain students abroad, then there are also clubs for Bahrain students abroad."

The minister said, "The National Union of Bahrain Students is an organization that officially does not exist. Today, a number of students came to my office asking to meet with me. I asked the secretary to notify them that I would welcome meeting with them at any time as students who are citizens of Bahrain [and studying] abroad, but that I could not meet with them as representatives of any union because the student's union is a non-existent organization."

One of the students said, "The minister mentioned that there was a group of male and female students who had ruined their futures. But what we see, however, is a group of male and female students who were confronted with a set of difficulties after they arrived in Bahrain, and specifically those who are members of the National Union for Bahrain Students. Is the fact that those students are members in the union the reason for their being subjected to these difficulties?"

Limited Capabilities

The minister replied, "All that I want to say is that Bahrain is a country of limited capabilities. Bahrain's real wealth lies in its students. We acknowledge that there is a number of male and female students who become involved in political matters and who antagonize the government. This makes the specialized authorities in the country take measures against them that are necessary. It is within the jurisdiction of security agencies and security authorities to establish security in the country. If they find elements that are dangerous to the security [of the country], they have to take all the measures to limit the effectiveness of those who work against security and its establishment in the country."

One of the students raised the question of not recognizing the National Union for Bahrain Students a third time. He said, "The union applied for recognition 8 years ago. Why didn't the ministry approve this request despite the fact that the authorities have recognized Bahrain clubs and union members are many times more than Bahrain club members?"

The minister replied, "It would be best to be extremely candid here. With regard to recognizing the National Union for Bahrain Students I have already mentioned that the agency which has the authority to grant such recognition in the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs which did say that the reason for not recognizing the union was the fact that it practices its activities outside Bahrain.

"Second, it is not unknown to anyone that the union has adopted a political line that is almost antithetical to that of the government. Examples of this are numerous. There are handbills, pamphlets and numerous other positions that the union took.

"The state began to wonder why the students of Bahrain were conducting themselves in this manner? Why did they oppose the government? Was it because the government had failed to look after the students? The state has always been asking why some students were against the government and against the state? Then the state perceived some reason, moderation and realism in some students. Those students are the students [who are members] of Bahrain clubs abroad. They are student who have not engaged in excesses. They are students who criticize but who do not exaggerate. Therefore, the state recognized the request of the clubs abroad and created for them this summer location because they represent the kind of students who must be helped."

One of the students spoke about the gap that exists between the students and the government. He said, "The minister has asked why there was a gap between students and the government, and I am responding to this question. The National Union of Bahrain Students submitted a request to the Ministry of Education after the conference that established it which was held abroad. The union requested that it be granted legitimacy so it can work in Bahrain and so it can convene its first conference in Bahrain. The response from the ministry was clear: it was rejection. The natural situation is for the union to have its organization inside the country just as it is in Kuwait. In Kuwait the National Union for Kuwait Students exists in Kuwait. We, however, for circumstances that were forced on us pursue our activities abroad.

"After 1975 all the conveniences that used to be offered to the National Union of Bahrain Students were cut off. I would like to ask the minister why the conveniences were cut off when the clubs for Bahrain students were established in 1976. There may be a gap, but why does this gap exist? The Ministry of Education should have listened to students' opinions. The National Union for Bahrain Students is prepared to engage in a wide-ranging dialogue with the ministry regarding students' opinions and regarding establishing a student organization for us just like those that exist in all the countries of the world."

Why Did Students Occupy Bahrain Embassy in Kuwait?

One of the students asked about the secret behind preventing some students from continuing their studies this year, and he asked why the passports of some students were taken away. He asked about the role of the Ministry of Education in treating this subject.

The minister replied, "It is unfortunate that a limited number of male and female students subject themselves to strict measures. The strictest measure that may be taken against a student is to prevent him from continuing his studies. There are hundreds and thousands of students. Why were they not subjected to such decisions? If a student is engaged in activities considered by the security authorities to be infringing upon the security situation in the country, he has to bear the responsibility of his action."

One of the students suggested that a student who is deemed to have engaged in measures that threaten [the country's] security should be taken to court. The minister said, "There is no need for the courts if the measure of taking away the passport or that of preventing the student from continuing his studies is adequate. All these measures are practiced in other countries. A student is taken to court if he does something that requires taking him to court. Only those who engage in poor conduct, and they are few, have measures taken against them."

The minister said, "A very small number of male and female students behave very poorly, such as the attempt to occupy the embassy of Bahrain in Kuwait and the offices of the Arab League in New York."

One of the students commented on the subject and said, "The minister spoke about students occupying the embassy of Bahrain in Kuwait and the Bahrain consulate in Texas. I believe that Bahrain's problems are neither easy, nor are they few; they are growing every day, I believe that the embassies neglect the rights of students abroad." The student said, "When students resort to occupying an embassy, they are using the wrong approach, especially if [their action] is accompanied by sabotage. But for students to go to an embassy and to have a sit-in in that embassy is only a way of protesting."

The student said, "Regarding the fact that Bahrain students occupied the embassy of Bahrain in Kuwait, what happened is that students entered the building in a peaceful manner and sat in the building. This was a proper method for expressing their views. This would not have happened had there been communications between the ministry and its students or between the embassy and the students.

"But why did the students occupy the embassy? It is because the Muslim ambassador refused to meet with the students. It is because the Muslim ambassador refused to solve the students' problems. It is because the Muslim ambassador decided to take possession of the student's passports. It is because the Muslim ambassador adopted a method of exerting pressure on the students when he suspended the grants which are designated for their living expenses. But is suspending students' grants to exert pressure on them an educational method?"

Leftist Exremism Is Rejected

The minister said, "I disagree with the colleague about the matter of not meeting with the students. I was in Kuwait to attend the Fifth Conference for Ministers of Education, and I met with you for 4 hours, and the Muslim ambassador was with me. Everything that could have been said was said during the 4 hours. The students insisted nevertheless on their position. If there was any intransigence or stubborness it was unfortunately on the side of the students.

"However, I would like to say that we consider all students our children: we consider students who are union members to be our children. We are prepared to sit with them, to talk with them and to do everything that is in their interests. But leftist political extremism must be confronted by the authorities of the state. This is indisputable and incontrovertible. We are not prepared to acquiesce in extremist political activities that are carried out by some people."

One of the students asked about why there were no scholarships in Cairo and Kuwait. Mrs Safiyyah Dawighar replied, "Regarding scholarships in Cairo and Kuwait, Bahrain needed specializations in medicine, engineering and physical therapy. Our cultural attache in Cairo submitted these applications, but we did not get anything in these specializations. Regarding the other specializations, they are available at University College in Bahrain. With regard to Kuwait, Kuwait suggested that these scholarships be granted to Bahraini citizens who have the Kuwaiti secondary school certificate. With regard to studying at the College of Medicine, there are five scholarships and all Gulf citizens are competing for them. The rate of acceptance comes to 96 percent."

16 Students Were Politically Involved

The meeting was concluded with a question from one of the students. He said, "If a student is prevented from studying abroad because he was accused of participating in a party or in a political organization, for example, does he not have the right to know what he is being accused of, and does he not have the right to defend himself? This charge may be based on erroneous foundations and information and mere doubts and suspicions. Does he not have the right to defend himself?

The minister replied: "What I know is that the number [of students who became politically involved] did not exceed 6 students who had scholarships and a limited number of grant recipients that may amount to 10. If the matter pertains to 16 students who became involved politically and gave security authorities enough evidence so they can make a decision to prevent them from traveling, the objective is to prevent them from futher political involvement. If this is the case, the situation is not dangerous; but if the case pertains to forming a political party or otherwise, I do not have jurisdiction to take action in this area."

PROBLEM OF DETERIORATING BUILDINGS IN CAIRO

Cairo AL-AHRAM AL-IQTISADI in Arabic 25 Aug 80 pp 14-17

[Article by Dr Milad Hanna: "The Tragedy of Collapsing Buildings Is Not Over Yet!"]

[Text] On one of the days of the month of Ramadan, at dawn, there was once again the tragedy of a building collapsing, this time in al-Sharabiyah. It resulted in the death of a large number of our citizens. This tragedy, which is becoming an occurrence which happens almost every year, has brought up the question of building maintenance, prolonging the life of the buildings and examining the dossier of the "hypothetical life-span" of the buildings. This is a term which has been used a great deal by engineers without this term having any realistic meaning or scientific basis; as far as I know, this subject has not even been brought up yet.

The Economic Life-Span of Buildings

I can perhaps understand why economists discuss the life-span of a building from the investment point of view. This question is worthy of being studied, especially since there has been a change in the type of ownership of real estate, which used to be that the individual owned "all of the land and the buildings on it." In that case, at least the individual owned the land even after the buildings collapsed, that is, when the life-span of the building itself was over. Right now there is a noticeably strong trend toward having the ownership of apartments and residential units. In most cases, the sales contracts between the original owner, who owns all of the real estate, and the owner of the single apartment stipulates that the latter not share in the ownership of the land. That is, the owner of the apartment owns the walls, floor and roof of the location where he lives. That is, he has the space, the air and the use of the area, but he does not have the land. For this reason, if the building collapses for any reason, then the investor who bought this residential unit ends up with practically nothing when the life-span of this residential unit is over, in spite of the fact that the "ownership" of the unit has been "transferred" to him. This is especially true in the case of concrete structures in tall buildings, because it becomes extremely expensive when you want to tear them down and get rid of them.

For this reason I believe that, at the beginning of the next century, the subject of a building's economic life-span will have to be presented in light of these new facts. Up till the beginning of the seventies the prevailing trend of thinking was that the building yields profit which is equal to the amount paid into it--during the course of about 20 years at the most. That is to say, it would yield an average net return estimated at about 5 percent of the value of the real estate. There were additional expenses for maintenance, real estate taxes, water supply, use of electricity for the stairway, the doorman and so on. These expenses were estimated at about 3 percent of the annual rent payments.

A lot of people engaged in this type of investment from 1952 to about 1974. They did so on the basis that it was a semi-permanent and stable means of earning profit. In addition to this, it was known that the prices of real estate and land were steadily going up, year after year. That is, the rise in prices of land and real estate was more or less keeping pace with the rate of inflation. But the current situation is such that the matter of investment in buildings and constructing residential units for the purpose of renting them out requires that the investors make an economic study in light of the high rate of inflation as well as in light of the rise in interest rates for bank deposits.

At the outset we must concede that the language of Law No 49 of 1977, which makes stipulations concerning rental property, is already economically dead, and it is in nobody's interest to print its obituary.

This law allows for a profit of 7 percent of the value of the land and 10 percnet of the value of the buildings on it, without allowing for any expenses or consumption of water and electricity. What investor is going to choose to construct an apartment building to rent out units in it at these rates of profit when he can deposit his money in Type B investment certificates which yield a constant profit of 11 percent, without him having to expend any effort or undertake any risk, as is the case in business dealings involving different kinds of foreign currency which yield even greater profit?

Let us suppose that an average investor wants to invest his money in a condominium apartment, and that the value of the apartment, for some reason, is as low as 10,000 Egyptian pounds. Let us also suppose that he is able to rent it to an average family at a rate which gives him 12 percent of his capital (in order for him to recieve a rate of profit which is at least a little bit higher than in the case of Type B investment certificates). This means that the basic monthly rent will be 100 pounds, and does not include any of the services or taxes which must be paid extra by the tenant. All this presumes that he has been successful in finding a tenant who is able to pay this amount of money and that the apartment will never be unoccupied during the course of 10 years. The apartment owner will have made a profit equal to or being slightly more than his capital. Most likely his profit will be a result of the fact that the value of the apartment will have gone up in order to match the rate of inflation which has taken place during the course of these 10 years. Otherwise, he will have suffered a loss because if there has been inflation of 200 percent, that is, an inflation rate of 20 percent per year, then the market price of the apartment would have to be 30,000 pounds. And it is doubtful that this would happen.

This being true, the apartment must have a long life-span--at least 30 or 40 years--and its value must constantly increase at a rate which is higher then the rate of inflation. Otherwise, people would not venture to buy apartments for the purpose of renting them out.

It is clear from all of this that investing capital in the construction of apartment buildings for the purpose of renting out the apartments is not the most appropriate way of investing large amounts of capital for people who build large multi-unit buildings. Likewise, it is clear that the purchase of one or several apartments for the purpose of renting them out unfurnished is not the kind of project which average investors feel encouraged to engage in. Thus, it is certain that the private sector will not enter into the problem of housing for the purpose of solving it. Instead, the private sector will invest its money in the construction of buildings and the sale of apartments in these buildings. This is because this is an operation of limited duration, involving a fixed number of years, in which the investment of the capital is carried out, the profits are earned, and then the investors switch over to some other business operation.

Another thing for certain is that a single apartment is not purchased for the purposes of investment. It is purchased for the purpose of use, in the sense that whoever buys the apartment is basically doing so because he wants to use it and live in it. Thus, it is the housing problem which is the motive for those with small amounts of savings, especially in the case of workers who work abroad, to purchase the commodity which is known as an "apartment." There is a demand among such people for apartments and they are forced to buy them in spite of the fact that they are expensive because it represents the only means of obtaining housing.

If concern about economic problems were left to those who specialize in that field, then the readers would perhaps expect me to write in more detail about the construction life-span of buildings. In this regard, it would be best at the outset to differentiate between what is called a building's utilization life-span, from the point of view of design, and the building's construction life-span, which has to do with its capability of standing up before it is finally torn down.

A Building's Architectural Life-Span

The utilization life-span of a building represents the period of time in which a building performs its function, from the point of view of utilization and benefit, in the time and age in which it exists. Let me illustrate what is meant by this by giving some simple examples which are widespread and well-known in the realm of housing.

Numerous palaces were built during the last century on the basis that their inhabitants were wealthy people. It was understood that families living in them consisted of numerous children, that the heads of the households had perhaps more than one wife in the same residence, and that the families had either a small or large number of servants who took care of them.

Because of this, there was the "haramlik" [women's quarters] where the female members of the family lived, there was the "salamlik" [reception room] where receptions and parties were held, and other areas of the palace which served the life-style which prevailed during those times.

As the years passed, the generation of people inheriting all of this disappeared. They were replaced by a new generation of people who were not content with the life-style which was lived by their fathers and grandfathers. They preferred to live in a simple apartment in which every square meter of floor space was utilized, in contrast to the empty, sprawling spaces, which were not utilized, in a structure which at one time was considered to be very valuable, but is no longer considered appropriate in this modern age.

This phenomenon is not something which is restricted to Egypt or to the countries of the developing world. It is a change in life-style which is occurring in all parts of the world. This has also actually taken place in England and in a number of European countries. For example, a number of sons of lords and other such people have abandoned their castles in the countryside and preferred living in regular apartments in large cities. They have announced the sale of these castles to wealthy Arabs, for whom this life-style is more appropriate in our modern times.

On the other side of the coin, peasants on large feudal estates lived--and in some cases continue to live--in places which more nearly resemble lairs or shelters consisting of walls which protect a person while he is sleeping. They are not residences in the modern sense of the word, made for self-respecting human beings to live in. But then the new generation refused to live in these shelters and dens and started demanding modern residences having bath and heating facilities and other such facilities corresponding to modern man's growing needs.

For this reason, it is a difficult job to determine in advance, and for certain, the utilization life-span of a building. This is because whoever undertakes to construct the building usually constructs and designs it according to what he visualizes as being his own needs and the needs of his children. He sees these needs as being constant and eternal. But soon his generation goes, and it is replaced by another generation whose needs have changed and whose aspirations are different.

In Egypt, for example, since the end of World War II we have witnessed many social changes which have had a direct effect on people's needs in terms of housing. In addition to this, there has been the appearance of new appliances which have had their effect on life inside the household--such as television sets, refrigerators and electric irons. They have become normal everyday things in most city households. Also, aspirations have quickly developed for appliances such as heaters, air conditioners and things of this sort. All of these things have a definite effect on the utilization life-span of residences. The amount of floor space covered by the residence is constantly changing and the relation between the rooms and different parts of the residence is constantly undergoing development and modification. For this reason, the building which was suitable for living in around the end of the 19th century may not be suitable at all for the life of, and utilization by, a family in the 20th century. And no doubt the generations of the next century will reject the thought of living in residential buildings such as we have now. Thus, it will be decided to tear down many of these buildings. This is not because they have reached the point of collapsing or because they do not provide appropriate economic profit. We make the decision to tear down such buildings because the formation, "arrangement," amount of surface area and perhaps even the height and facade of the buildings--and in some cases even the materials that they are made of--are no longer considered to be appropriate for the times. In such cases we say that the utilization life-span of the building is over.

Stopping Deterioration In the Buildings Or the Construction Life-Span

Perhaps the most important thing, when discussing the life-span of buildings, is the matter of sudden collapse of residential buildings. This is something which is extremely important because it usually concerns an even greater tragedy, that is, the end of the lives of some of the people who live in these buildings.

Up till now no one has been able to come up with a clear scientific approach or accurate method to determine the life of a building in terms of days or hours or to predict that this or that building will collapse in a month, a year or several years, as they are able to make predictions concerning some malignant diseases which attack man.

The Great Pyramid is still standing and challenging the passage of time, and it is expected that its life will continue for thousands of years more. At the same time, engineers are doing their utmost to save the Leaning Tower of Pisa in Italy.

It is true that there are complicated and ever-changing engineering theories involving the design of buildings, bridges, transmission towers and so on. These theories have been reduced to the status of laws in the forms of exact specifications which must be heeded when working out the blueprint of anything to be constructed. These extraordinary studies determine what engineers generally refer to as the "safety factor." This means that a structure will not collapse when it bears the limit of what the structure was designed to bear according to the specifications. The building or structure is able to stand up to a load twice as much as this, or even more, before it collapses. In such a case it is said that the structure's safety factor is "2." Perhaps the clearest example of this is the fact that a bridge is usually designed to withstand the weight of a 70-ton tank. But in fact the bridge is capable of withstanding twice as much weight as this before it will start to crack.

Thus, the majority of modern structures have actually been designed according to specifications and load limits which are known and have been determined. Then the construction of them is supervised in order to make sure the construction materials are used in conformity with the technical provisions which are fixed in the specifications. Then the result will necessarily be a structure which is safe and will not collapse. This is, of course, unless the structure is subjected to forms of stress which are basically unexpected, for example, fires, explosions and bombs.

In spite of all of this architectural knowledge, none of the specifications in Egypt or any other place in the world are capable of determining the number of years after which a given structure will collapse. From the purely theoretical point of view, the life-span of structures such as this which are well-designed and which have been constructed with care, with safety in mind, and without cutting corners, will extend for hundreds of years. Thus, they would not reach the point of collapsing. But they will be torn down due to other factors, previously referred to, which involve the economic or utilization life-span of the strucutre.

But there are older buildings which have been constructed "with God's blessings," and without any designing. There are others which are constructed according to well thought-out and exact design, but the construction is carried out with inferior materials and according to non-technical principles--or there is stealing and pilfering of the construction materials. Or else additional stories are put on buildings without exact technical studies being made beforehand. All structures constructed in this manner are dangerous and their life-span cannot be determined because no detailed study has been made to find out the actual status of all of these structures.

This is why, my dear readers, you see that we stand before a real and serious catastrophe concerning everything that has to do with this endless number of buildings about which nothing is known. The majority of residential buildings in our country have no blueprint and were not constructed according to any specifications. The construction of all of them has been a matter of expertise of the owner and the builder who was either skilled or unskilled and was called the "banna" ["builder" in the colloquial Egyptian dialect].

This being true, I can expect--as I have expected in the past and as many others also expected--that the collapse of the building in al-Sharabiyah will be followed by the collapse of other buildings in al-Sharabiyah and in other places. Unless people stop adding additional stories to older buildings about which nothing is known, then there will be many more such collapses of buildings and all of the human tragedy which they entail.

I do not have any complete and comprehensive solution regarding existing buildings. But one very good solution would be to take all possible precautions concerning construction in the future. Licensing for building construction should not be granted except on the basis of technical principles and specifications which are sound and which must be followed in practice.

I sympathize with those who, because of the building and houseing crisis, are forced to violate the law. Investigations have shown that owners of buildings have not violated the law because they wanted to cause a catastrophe to themselves, their families and their neighbors. What they have wanted primarily is to solve the housing problem for their children, neighbors or relatives. Experience has taught us that as long as we do not put thought into solving human problems and try to provide human beings with the possibility to lead a decent life, the logical result of this negligence and negative attitude, on the part of the government agencies concerned, will be to push people into following a path and engaging in practices which are crooked. The result of this will be the backwardness and destruction of the social, human and economic structure of our country; this is why mention must be made of this.

MINISTER ANNOUNCES EXPANSION OF TELEPHONE SERVICE

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 20 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] In an exclusive interview with the PARS NEWS AGENCY, the minister of Post, Telegraph and Telephone, Dr Mahmud Qandi, spoke about the new programs of his ministry and about the plan for the development of telephone and post facilities and services in the country.

Regarding the plan for the development of the telephone services in the provinces Dr Qandi said that priority in the plan would be given to the deprived provinces and to those cities and districts that had been neglected under the previous regime. "Our present potential," he said, "would provide about 100,000 telephone installations for applicants." If the economic and technical conditions permitted, the project would be expanded in the coming years, he pointed out. The minister of PTT then spoke about the part-time telephone project which called for the sharing of telephones by the people and the government departments. About the possibility of the expansion of this project he said that the project had been started for some time and that it could be continued. A number of telephone lines had been allocated under the new arrangement. As regards the manner of using such telephone numbers, he said that his ministry had written letters to various government agencies and asked them to put at the disposal of the communications company the telephones that were not in use during the whole 24 hours of the day so that these telephones could be used for allocation on a part-time basis.

Dr Qandi underscored the shortage of postal services in rural areas and in distant towns. The entire postal manpower of the nation was 10,000 persons, he said. With a view to the speed in postal services, this force must be augmented, he added.

The minister also said that it was part of the policy of the postal administration to fight against corruption in and abuse of postal services in connection with the contraband of illicit goods and with the illicit movement of goods. It was a general policy of the government to extend postal services to the faraway and underprivileged parts of the country, he said. However, he added, the expansion of roads was a prerequisite of postal services expansion because, he reasoned, the development of postal services would not be possible without first securing road communication. The minister of PTT then spoke about the expansion of telecommunications and the contracts signed with foreign countries. Many of the contracts had been abrogated and those which were worth implementing had been modified so that they would become reasonable, he said. Another issue under consideration was the appropriate cooperation that the minister of PTT could mutually establish with technical companies. Some companies, however, had previously installed certain equipments in Iran and had subsequently failed to fulfill their financial and technical obligations during the revolution on various excuses. Such companies, he accused, would not extend the necessary cooperation for the improvement and advancement of the contracts. They were thinking of economic ban on Iran, he said. "We watch the behavior of these companies closely and intend to prepare a long-term schedule to phase these companies out," he warned.

In conclusion, the minister of PTT spoke about relations with the populace. He said that there was a stream of requests from various provinces and city regions for converting the magnetic system telephone to an automatic central switchboard system. "We know that the nation suffers from many deprivations in the area of telecommunications," he admitted. But, he explained, the people should realize that the nation's economic and technical resources were limited. The government, he assured, is doing its best, though. The people should be realistic and note that the government needed time to materialize all the needs of the people, particularly in this case which involved technicality. "We have many deficiencies in technology and industry," he argued. "God willing (Ensha'allah)," he promised, "all these deficiencies must be made good in the future." At any rate, the progress made after the revolution has been more positive and all operations have been more effective than in the past despite the economic ban and severance of relations by foreign countries. Consequently the expansion of telephone services during this period was more than 10 percent of the entire work done in the last 10 years. Operations of the telecommunications and postal services were on a much faster pace than before. Moreover, these operations were of a basic and fundamental character and were free from the window dressing aspects of the content-poor projects of the past, he said.

[Text] Supply of Coke to Esfahan Iron Smelting Plant and Its Present Bottlenecks

The Esfahan Iron Smelting Plant which had been originally planned to achieve an ultimate production capacity of 8 million tons of steel a year after implementing several projects (1 - 4) is still in its first phase of productivity, viz. 600,000 tons of steel per annum, 15 years after the contract of the industry was signed.

The second project of this institution--which is nearing completion--would boost production to 1.9 million tons of steel per year. However, the additional production capacity has remained idle and stagnant because of lack of coal or because there are no mines ready for exploitation. That this plant has not been developed over a long time is, of course, a big issue open to debate. It calls for a separate analysis. However, it can briefly be said that if any industry was to be established in Iran the West wanted it to be dictated according to a precise scheme so that the imposition of the imperialist technology would follow and so that Iran would become even more dependent on the West. On the other hand, the introduction of the direct reduction method--a new and as yet untested method in many ways, posing many problems for its developers--in the development of Iran's steel mill was in itself a dangerous pitfall and a snare in the mesh of dependency of the recipient on the donor country. The development of the Esfahan steel mill along this line made for further sinking of Iran in the quagmire of foreign dependency--one from which it would virtually be impossible for Iran to disentangle herself. As we see today, after the victory of our magnificent revolution, under the unrelenting leadership of the "chain-busting" Imam Khomeyni, these wicked contractors have left the projects half-finished and thus inflicted billions of tumans of additional economic damage on Iran.

Iran's Coal Mines and Their Coking Capacity

Geological surveys indicate that Iran has coal deposits totaling 6 billion tons of exploitable coal, more than 4 billion tons of which can be turned into coke.

It is notable that 1.5 billion tons of coal is concentrated in the Kerman region while the other 4.5 billion tons is scattered in the region of the Alborz Range. A further deposit of 500 million tons of high-grade cokable coal has been discovered in Tabas region in Khorasan Province. About half a billion tons of coal of KJA and KJB grades is available in the Kerman coal mines which can achieve the desired coking quality once mixed with other types of coal at varying ratios. As can be noted, a considerable quantity of this coal is cokable and can meet the metallurgical needs of our iron-smelting industry.

The Present Deficiencies of Iranian Coal

At the beginning of the revolutionary era we took note of the deficiencies and problems of Iran's iron smelting industry, especially in the area of coal supply. We dispatched a team of students to Esfahan to study the case so that the physical quality of the coke, including its increased erosion-resistance can be enhanced by the research section of the plant. Unfortunately, the traditional bureaucratic problems of underemployment and lack of interest in research were encountered from the very outset. Basically, the engineering group did not believe in tackling the task. Consequently, we failed to carry out the intended experiments. However, in the process of our studies we came across the records of years of research and survey that had been consigned to oblivion. Obviously, the old criteria could not easily be removed from the iron smelting plant which was chiefly a window-dressing proposition, and the problems that we wanted out of the way could not exactly be solved radically. At any rate we believe that the problems of the Iranian coal that have been studied by us can be summed up as follows: More than 20 coal mines in Kerman and Alborz regions which are exploited mostly have varying degrees of ash and a low rate of erosion resistance. Since they were not bent on the development of the coal mines in the past, they purchased some quantity of coal from West Germany and mixed it with the Iranian coal to offset this deficiency.

The documents which have been examined and researched indicate that if appropriate quantitative and qualitative use is made of the coal presently extracted from each mine, and if they are mixed correctly, this problem can be obviated to an acceptable extent.

Solution of the Problem

In order to expand the Esfahan Iron Smelting Plant to a production capacity of 8 billion tons of steel per annum, the coal mines of Kerman and the Northern region must be developed. This development must begin as soon as possible. As for making Furnace No 2 operational, since the second phase of the project which raised the production level to 1.9 million tons a year would be very lucrative, this development should be attempted as soon as possible.

1. There are many small coal mines around Esfahan which are superficial and can be strip-mined. In order to be able to put both furnaces of the plant on stream, the local people should be encouraged to exploit and sell the coal to the plant.

2. The mine should be inspected as soon as possible and in case its coal is found to be of high quality, it should be used. Therefore, efforts should be made for obviating this problem.

JAPAN REPORTEDLY TO CEASE BUYING IRANIAN OIL

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 22 Sep 80 p 11

[Text] The FINANCIAL TIMES reported that four Japanese companies which have imported heavy crude oil from Iran during the past year based on concluded contracts have announced that at the end of their contracts' period in the coming week they will no longer import oil from Iran. REUTER said that a Japanese commission is now spending time in Iraq in order to increase Japanese oil imports from that country from 8 million to 11 million tons annually.

According to the report by the FINANCIAL TIMES heavy petroleum imports from Iran are the remainders of the year's trade of crude oil imports which have continued since last April, when Iran raised the price of a barrel of its light crude to $35 and Japan refused to purchase it.

After Japan's abstention, Iran refused to load Japanese tankers but continued its heavy oil exports according to contract. This contract expires at the end of September. The four companies, "Mitsui," "Marubeni," "Mitsubishi" and "Siaytuh" have expressed no interest in extending the contract.

One of these four companies announced yesterday that for political and economic reasons it does not desire to renew its contract with the National Iranian Oil Company. The oil company, independent of its light crude exports, is very interested in exporting its heavy oil to Japan.

According to the former contract, 2.8 million tons of heavy oil have been delivered to Japan in nine months. Japanese purchasers had accepted the relatively expensive price of heavy oil on the condition that light oil also be exported. Even if Japan agrees to again purchase heavy oil, doubtless the amount of purchase will be much less than the amount in the former contract.

The Japanese companies which have oil deals with Iran say that the National Iranian Oil Company has the right to claim damages from the Japanese companies because of their refusal to accept light crude at the April price. But up till now the Iranian oil company has not announced that such damages are demanded. Any type of legal action by Iran against Japanese companies will certainly close possibilities of new negotiations concerning oil purchases from Iran. The four contracts which elapse next week make up the remainder of Japan's main petroleum imports from Iran. However, several small contracts will continue to hold for several more months. If the Japanese companies are so inclined, light Iranian oil is available to them at the price of $35 a barrel. But the Japanese companies are no longer inclined to purchase Iranian oil because of political and economic reasons. The selling price of Iranian oil is expensive in comparison with similar oil arriving for sale on the spot market at $32 a barrel (from the Middle East and other oil-producing regions).

MULLAHS SEEK AID FOR SISTAN, BALUCHISTAN

Tehran SOBH-E AZADEGAN in Persian 20 Sep 80 p 10

[Text] A number of the Ulema (religious authorities) of the Sunni Sect met and discussed with Dr Ebrahim Yazdi, the supervisor of KEYHAN newspaper and the people's deputy at the Islamic Consultative Assembly (Jales), yesterday afternoon at the premises of KEYHAN newspaper. The Sunni religious leaders talked with Dr Yazdi about economics, culture, religious security and the wishes of the people of Sistan and Baluchistan. Dr Yazdi promised that they would receive all kinds of assistance and that their problems would be solved. These people then sat down to chat with KEYHAN's reporter and answered his questions.

[Question] Would you explain why you came to KEYHAN?

Molavi Shahdad: We came here to attend the "unity camp" organized for wider relationship with our brethren, as well as to discuss our problems and difficulties.

[Question] What issues are at stake in Sistan and Baluchistan these days?

[Answer] There are many bottlenecks. Economically, culturally and agriculturally Baluchistan is crippled. Of course, there is expansive land but there is need for deep wells and motor pumps. Many roads have not been asphalted. Job opportunities must be generated in Sistan and Baluchistan. I mean that by building factories, jobs are created, too. Schools and university should be established here so that our youths do not go abroad.

Wishes of Sunni Religious Leaders

[Question] As religious authorities of the Sunnis what do you want from the government?

[Answer] Firstly, the Radio and Television should not blaspheme the sanctities of the Sunnis. They should watch their words.

Such profanities against the Sunni brothers would provide pretext to the counterrevolutionaries to sow the seeds of division and hatred. The press should refrain from printing material against the Sunni religious leaders and their sacred things. In courts of law and offices of the government the Sunni religious authorities should be given a role just as the Shiite religious leaders are given roles in other cities.

One of the wishes of the Sunni religious leaders is to have the educational records of those Sunni Ulema who have studied in foreign countries, such as Pakistan, and have toiled for a lifetime to obtain their academic degrees, evaluated and to give these Ulema jobs in educational and theological centers. The Ulema should be active in education so that the youth do not deviate. At present, the agnostics have penetrated the educational system and incite the people. If the Ulema are employed in education, such deviations would be precluded.

[Question] How true is the statement, as it were, that there is a schism between Shiism and Sunnism? If it is not true, which group brings it up most?

Minor Differences

[Answer] The difference between Sunnism and Shiism, like those among the religions based on the prophet's traditions, are minor, but the previous regime blew these differences up to promote its own interests. But these differences were not extensive and they are now being gradually removed. After the victory of the revolution we did not have the kind of differences that could lead to mutual hatred.

[Question] Have the revolutionary organs been active and effective in Sistan and Baluchistan?

[Answer] The reconstruction campaign people have, to be fair, worked and are still working very hard. But these revolutionary organs lack adequate resources. The Reconstruction Campaign and the Corps have rendered effective service. The government should supply more resources to them and support them.

The Molavi Ulema said that so long as no purging took place in other departments, no revolutionary work could be performed. They endorsed the governor of Saravan and cited him as a sympathetic and revolutionary man.

[Question] Are there any other issues being discussed in Sistan and Baluchistan in connection with the people?

[Answer] The important issue is the poverty of the people. There is no trade in Sistan and Baluchistan. There are only two ways to make a living: to migrate abroad in order to pursue a livelihood or to engage in contraband. This is because employment is not correct in this region. To put an end to such problems, factories and productive centers should be set up and mines should be exploited.

Dr Yazdi's Suggestions

At this point Dr Yazdi suggested that an "Office of Sistan and Baluchistan" be created for coordinating the efforts for the solution of the problems and difficulties of Sistan and Baluchistan. He further suggested that some of the visiting Sunni Ulema remain in Tehran so that their problems would be followed up. Dr Yazdi said, "We are anxious to have your problems solved as soon as possible. Any problem is referred to us, we are for you and ready to serve."

Dr Yazdi also touched on the long-term mission of the Sunni religious leaders and said, "You should tend to the minds of the young people. If, God forbid, they deviate, you are to blame. Just as the Shiite Ulema have moved the young people, you, too, can change the minds of the youth." Dr Yazdi added, "Unfortunately, there has not yet been any strong Islamic movement of a progressive nature in areas inhabited by Sunnis. In Baluchistan, it is you who should guide the youth. You should guide the youth and the people in the direction of Islam. Our revolution is an Islamic one and it has strengthened your position among the Baluchis and has attracted the attention and favorable attitude of the people to you."

At a later point, Dr Yazdi said, "In the beginning the Khans (chieftains) would obstruct any constructive work. They incited the people against the government and the Reconstruction Campaign. Now they have realized that the campaign is here to work for them--to sink wells and to install electricity. They asked themselves that if the campaign people wanted to do something positive why should they stop them?"

[Question] If you have any statement in the way of a message, please make it.

Attention to Theological Centers

[Answer] We want the theological centers of Sistan and Baluchistan to be given fundamental attention. We want the Sunni religious authorities to be used in the educational departments and judicial courts. We also want the theological degrees that you have earned abroad, such as in Pakistan, after 15 to 20 years of hard work for learning theology to be evaluated and put to use. We want the residents of the border strip to be given jobs so that they may stay put and defend their fatherland instead of going to other places."
Dr Yazdi also had a message addressed to the Majles asking the Majles to keep the Sunni religion, too, in mind while making laws.

Statement of the Representative of the Imam's Publicity Office

At the end of this visit, the representative of the Imam's Publicity Office who had accompanied the Sunni religious authorities to KEYHAN from the Theological Center of Qom told the KEYHAN reporter: "In order to further strengthen the unity of the Shiite and Sunni religious leaders, such organs as the Reconstruction Campaign and the Corps had requested that a representative from the theological center visit Sistan and Baluchistan. I went there on my own accord.

In order to promote the unity, we began the preliminary stages. For instance, we organized the Holy Koran Camp which was attended by the pupils of Sistan and Baluchistan city regions. We also staged various cultural and military mobilization programs there.

"When I went there I witnessed that the deprivation there was really stupendous. The officials who were mostly the agents of the previous Khans and did not want to imperil their interests refrained from doing anything for the people. As even the name of Baluchistan was distant from the minds of the authorities we decided to have Baluchistan's cry heard. I had two interviews in that province in which I warned the officials of the office of the governor-general, the revolutionary prosecutor and the security centers. Later they began their attacks on me.

"The problems are numerous. The most important issue is the governor-general. He should be a decisive, efficient and sympathetic person, not connected with any interest group, but must be supported by the central government as well."

ECONOMIC TRANSACTIONS WITH FRANCE ON INCREASE

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 20 Jul 80 p 33

[Article by Ghassan Ma'luf: "In Addition to Providing Iraq With Promised Nuclear Station, French-Iraqi Economic Relations Open the Door for Iraq To Become an Industrialized Nation"]

[Text] The advanced state of French-Iraqi relations attracts attention. Iraq considers France as the only Western country characterized by independence in foreign policy and a clear position with regard to the Arab cause. France considers Iraq as the most stable Arab country, an oil supplier second only to Saudi Arabia and a potentially very large market for French products and equipment, both civilian and military.

Since 1975 Iraq has established unique relations with France resulting from the personal ties between Mr Saddam Hussein, vice president of the Iraqi Revolution Council at the time, and the French Prime Minister Jacques Chirac. France has become the third-ranking economic partner of Iraq after Japan and West Germany. In addition, Iraq, which is a member of the nonalinement movement, has something in common with France, which, relatively speaking, has maintained some sort of independence from the two superpowers. Iraqi-French relations have been strengthened by the visit of Mr Raymond Barre, the French prime minister, in July 1979, and the return visit of Mr Sa'dun Hammadi, the Iraqi minister of foreign affairs, to Paris in June 1980, when he confirmed that President Giscard d'Estaing will visit Iraq next fall.

Unbalanced Trade Exchange

Transactions between France and Iraq are numerous and cover various economic sectors. Trade between the two countries has increased rapidly during the past years, rising from a total of 2.5 billion francs in 1973 to 6.6 billion in 1975, 11.7 billion in 1978, and 17.6 billion francs in 1979. However, the growth of trade between the two countries was not balanced, for it resulted in a French balance of trade deficit of 1.8 billion francs in 1973, 3.1 billion in 1975, 7.2 billion in 1978 and 10.9 billion in 1979. This deficit was basically due to the increase in Iraqi oil prices and oil exports to France, which amounted to 20.3 million tons at a cost of 9.5 billion francs in 1978, a 13-percent increase over 1977. These exports reached 24.9 million tons in the first months of 1980 [sic. should read: in 1979] representing 20.2 percent of total French oil imports.

Thus, Iraq has become an oil supplier of France second only to Saudi Arabia, whose oil exports to France have reached 34.5 percent of total French oil imports. In comparison, Iraqi imports of French civilian goods were estimated at $540 million in 1978, putting France third in exports to Iraq after West Germany (approximately $800 million) and Japan (approximately $1 billion).

In 1979 French exports of civilian goods to Iraq increased by 50 percent over their 1978 level, and were estimated at 3.38 billion francs [1978 data are in dollars]. The same year, French industrial firms concluded with Iraq contracts valued at 8 billion francs. This is in addition to a contract to build the new airport in Baghdad at an estimated cost of 3.7 billion francs.

Contracts in 1980

At the beginning of 1980 several contracts were signed between Iraq and France. The most important of these contracts was that signed with the (Jashnib?) French company to build a plant for the production of gas separated from oil in Zubayr in southeastern Iraq. Moreover, contracts still under consideration include one being negotiated by the Thompson Company for the construction of a plant for electronic equipment at an estimated cost of 6 billion francs. According to French sources, there are about 200 French companies operating in the Iraqi market.

Yet, this increase in French exports of civilian goods to Iraq did not close the gap in its balance of trade, especially as France needed to buy an additional 5 million tons of oil at higher prices to overcome the shortage resulting from the decrease in production of Iranian oil. This additional need in 1979 resulted in an increase of 50 percent in the cost of oil imported from Iraq, which jumped from 9.47 to 14.27 billion francs.

In its efforts to modernize and reinforce the equipment of its armed forces, Iraq, which depended essentially on Soviet military equipment in the past, placed orders for French military equipment valued at 8 billion francs in 1977-78. In 1977, Iraq ordered 36 Mirage F-1 planes, which began to be delivered at the beginning of this year. At the end of 1979 Iraq signed a contract for the purchase of an additional 34 planes of the same type, in addition to rockets, large helicopters and various naval equipment. Negotiations are currently taking place for the purchase of Mirage 2000 planes and warships of various sizes.

Nuclear Plant Controversy

A new dimension was added to Iraqi-French cooperation when Iraq signed an agreement for nuclear cooperation with France in 1975. According to this agreement, France would provide Iraq with a 70-megawatt plant for nuclear research. Along with the plant, France agreed to provide Iraq with 12 kgs of 93-percent enriched uranium. According to atomic experts, this means that Iraq's nuclear plant could lead to the manufacture of a type "1" atomic bomb having the same power as the Hiroshima bomb. The plant would cost 200 million francs.

We should point out the controversy which surrounded this issue as of the beginning of talks between France and Iraq to develop relations of cooperation in the nuclear field. Some French circles strongly opposed supplying Iraq with a nuclear plant of this kind, considering this transaction as inconsistent with the policy of French President Giscard d'Estaing, which calls for the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons. It should be mentioned here that a plant of the same type was going to be built at that time in Isfahan, Iran. Other circles felt that the Iraqi demand did not present any problem as long as the plant would be under the supervision of the International Atomic Agency in Vienna.

Israel and the United States strongly objected to this project. Yet, in spite of their objections, work continued on building the plant, which was ready to be shipped to Iraq in April 1979. But on the night of the sixth of the (?previous) month, components of the plant were destroyed with explosives. It is not known yet who was behind this operation, as no information has leaked about it since then. There are two hypotheses. The first implicates Israeli and U.S. intelligence, and the second implicates some French circles.

This incident did not shake diplomatic and economic relations between France and Iraq. On the contrary, it seems to have strengthened these relations. France has decided to rebuild the damaged components of the station and export them to Iraq, most likely at the end of this year.

At the beginning of June, Iraq sent Egyptian atomic scientist Yahya al-Mashad, a member of the Iraqi Atomic Energy Commission, to France on a mission related to supervision of the atomic equipment which France was exporting to Iraq. On 16 June, Mr al-Mashad was found murdered in his room at the Meridian Hotel in Paris. There is a lot of speculation, but the identity of the killer is still unknown.

It should be mentioned that the transaction is important not only because it provides Iraq with a research nuclear plant, but also because Iraqi nuclear research will in the future produce trained Iraqi experts in this field. This new Iraqi know-how will inevitably extend into other scientific fields through French-Iraqi economic cooperation. It could lead to the admission of Iraq into the industrialized world which has so far been closed to Third World countries.

NEW DISTRIBUTIONS OF POWER ENVISIONED TO END WAR

Beirut AL-MARUNI in Arabic 8 Sep 80 p 1

/Article: "The War Ends--On the Basis of a Plan Agreed to by Lebanon, the Arabs and /Foreign/ Countries"/

/Text/ News has leaked out to some Lebanese sources, official and unofficial, from international and world diplomatic circles that the resolution of the Lebanese war, that is, the war of rifles and trenches, is close at hand, according to a group of indications and data. From this it is assumed that this solution will occur in accordance with the following stage-by-stage sequence:

First, the armed forces in the Western section--that is, primarily the forces of the al-Murabitun--will take over the sites and centers the Palestinians are now occupying. Implementation of this step in a number of points of contact on the western front of Beirut has actually started.

Second, the forces of the Amal organization will assume charge of adopting similar measures in the district situated south of Beirut and extending to the town of al-Zahra'.

Third, the Lebanese army, according to a comprehensive security plan, will take charge of deploying itself over an area including Beirut the city, especially the commercial areas and the international roads, and greater Beirut, within an area whose boundaries extend to al-Rumaylah, al Shuf, 'Aliyah, Zahlah, Tarshish, al-Matnayn, Jubayl and al-Batrun; in a second stage, this be followed by the deployment of the Lebanese army to the other areas of Lebanon, in particular the entire north and al-Biqa'.

Fourth, the confinement of the detachments of the Palestinian resistance to the south, in particular to a section of the region known as the region between the two rivers, to consolidate their centers and strangthen their defense agencies there against Israel. The area of this section will range from 250 to 350 square kilometers, as is shown in the map printed above.

Sixth /sic/, Sa'd Haddad's forces will advance toward the al-Litani on a long line extending from the coast to the interior averaging 22 kilometers in width and 70 kilometers in length, that is, along an area of 1,500 square kilometers.

Fears and Obstacles

Observers anticipate that the process of deploying the Lebanese army, as well as operations of the new concentrations of armed groups in west Beirut, will take place without obstacles or obstructions. However, the difficulties will begin in terms of the distribution of the Amal organization's forces and the retrenchment of the Palestinian forces, as a result of which it is feared that severe fighting will take place between Amal and the Palestinian resistance along the area extending from South Beirut to the boundaries of the region between the two rivers, especially al-Biqa'.

Observers also anticipate that the Palestinian presence will be confined to the civilian refugee camps, stripped of light and heavy weapons, provided that the Lebanese Domestic Security Forces take charge of guard and security activities inside the camps in cooperation with some Palestinian detachments following its orders, as stipulated by the Cairo Agreement, the Melkart Agreement and their attachments and subsequent additions.

The main point of concentration of the Lebanese army will be in al-Damur, where barracks the size of the barracks existing will be built in Sarba to guarantee the safety of the international highway and the return of the people of al-Damur to their areas, livelihood and homes.

The international and world diplomatic sources' information adds that these points have been agreed to in principle and almost in actuality at the highest levels, Lebanese, Arab and international, so that it is possible to realize the following gains, with the guarantee of the /foreign/ countries and the United Nations:

1. The permanent termination of Israeli aggressions against the south.

2. The return of the refugees from al-Damur in particular and other Lebanese regugees in general to their regions and houses.

3. Guaranteeing the deployment of the Lebanese army to all areas of Lebanon.

4. Opening international Lebanese roads from north to south and from east to west in a complete, secure fashion.

5. Reopening the commercial areas in Beirut, that is, returning life to the heart of the Lebanese capital.

6. Enabling international emergency forces to perform their duties and implement the international Security Council resolutions as fully as possible.

7. Expanding the scope for the termination of the Syrian deterrent forces task?

8. Achieving national reconciliation among Lebanese.

9. Making the course of peace a success and starting the course of reconstruction in a decisive manner.

Diplomatic Advice?

Toward the end of last week other information was received to the effect that diplomatic circles in Lebanon recommended to Lebanese politicians and leaders that they arrange their affairs and persevere awhile until that plan is definitively approved and the final touches are put on means for carrying it out. This will take a few months, especially since during that time the form of the European initiative will have become crystallized, along with the resumption of negotiations among the Camp David parties, and the results of the American elections will have become known.

These circles also advised the Lebanese to exercise wisdom, skill, self-control and strong nerves so that the solution to their problem may be easy and rapid. Otherwise, if they are hasty and venture on some hasty actions, the state of fragmentation now distinguishing the Lebanese crisis will proceed to escalate until it reaches the stage of schism and disintegration.

One System for the Palestinians in Lebanon and the Arab Countries

These circles state that the abovementioned plan will have the effect of reducing the tension in relations between the Palestinian resistance and the Lebanese regime, since gathering the Palestinians in the area between the two rivers will result in the formation of a sort of state for them. This will be accompanied by distribution of the Palestinian refugees, who number 700,000 in Lebanon, to all Arab countries in accordance with agreed upon criteria and formulas and application of a single system to them in Lebanon and all Arab countries which will spell out the conditions for their residence and movements and will prevent approval of actual ultimate settlement in Lebanon.

PHALANGE ORGAN RIDICULES ARAB NATIONALIST MOVES IN NATION

Beirut AL-'AMAL in Arabic 13 Sep 80 p 2

/Article: "The Comedy of Perseverance and Steadfastness on Lebanese Soil--They Recommend That Libya Take Part in the Deterrent Forces"/

/Text/ Does the Libyan government have the right to send its military forces to Lebanon, following the announcement of the merger union between it and Syria?

About a month ago the Syrian government determined on the party and official levels to "stand fast against Israeli aggressions launched against Lebanon, against the south and against the Palestinian resistance."

Syria carried this resolution out when it moved its air force to counterattack against Israeli warplanes over Lebanon. One Syrian air force plane was downed, and those calling for steadfastness applauded because a Syrian pilot managed to break the terrible wall of silence which the whole Arab world has wrapped and is wrapping around what happened and is happening in and through Lebanon concerning Palestinian and Israeli operations. After this resolution it was observed that the Syrian government demanded, and still is demanding, that all Arab governments and armies take part in deterring Israeli aggressions and defending Lebanon and the Palestinian resistance. It was also observed that the Palestinians applauded and welcomed this step, considering any Arab hesitation in coordinating with the Syrian movement and strategy to be neglect and conspiracy.

Following the Syrian resolution and the Israeli reaction, the Libyan government proclaimed its position, in Tripoli specifically, claiming that it was necessary to open the borders of the front-line states to Palestinian guerrilla activity on the one hand and have Syria participate militarily, materially and morally in defending Lebanon, the south and the Palestinian resistance against the Israeli aggressions.

The Syrian army is present in Lebanon, in implementation of the resolutions of the Riyadh and Cairo summits to preserve security and stability, prevent fighting and thus defend Lebanese territory; this army is totally subject to the personal command of the Lebanese president and its continued presence on Lebanese territory in turn is subject to a request presented by the Lebanese president to the Arab League council through his ambassador, accompanied by causative reasons, because the Arab countries which are participating materially or morally in the Arab deterrent forces must be convinced in advance of the justifications the Lebanese president presents in his request in order to continue to participate in balancing these forces and agree to continue their operational tasks.

In the information received from Tripoli, some Palestinian and Lebanese organizations recommended to Libyan officials that the file be opened on "sending Libyan army units (aviation, infantry, armor, and naval and land artillery) to Lebanon so that it could use Lebanese territory within the perseverance and steadfastness plan as bases against Israel and its expansionist schemes and constant aggressions against Lebanon and the Palestinian resistance."

Those who raised this issue before the Libyan authorities and asked them to open this file actually meant to encourage the movement of perseverance and steadfastness against Israel among Arab countries, but they discussed providing a legal and strategic framework for the desired Libyan military presence on Lebanese territory on grounds that Israel would oppose this presence by launching immediate military operations.

The Libyan military presence in Lebanon must be in accordance with a request from the legitimate Lebanese authorities, and these authorities, which appreciate the position and gravity of adopting a decision like that, certainly will hesitate to adopt it, whatever the pressures.

However, advocates and enthusiasts of the proposal found the legal formula, or what they consider the requisite legal formula, for the Libyan military presence on Lebanese territory. They recommended to Libyan officials that their presence in Lebanon lie within the context of the Arab deterrent forces. Since the Libyan and Syrian states will become a single state after the unity merger, their armies will become a single army, their political and military decisions will become united, and the presence of the Libyan army on Lebanese territory will in turn become legitimate and acquire a legal covering through the resolutions of the Council of the League of Arab States.

Information reaching certain Lebanese circles from Tripoli states that the Libyan officials who heard this recommendation and its causative reasons were enthusiastic about it at the outset but requested more time to conduct an expanded study and obtain the agreement of Syria and the Palestinians, then Lebanon.

These plans in turn raised the future of relations between Lebanon and the unified country and in the past 2 days have been the subject of an evaluation in official and political circles, lest Lebanon awake to new steps which will not be in its interests at all.

'QNA' REPORTS ON PHALANGIST PLAN TO PARTITION COUNTRY

NC231200 Doha QNA in Arabic 1034 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Jidda, 23 Oct (QNA)--Press reports published here today indicate that some influential Palestinian personalities have warned U.S. officials of the likelihood that the Lebanese Phalangist Party, which is effectively supported by Israel, will partition Lebanon and declare the formation of an independent Maronite state.

In a report from Washington, the ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT newspaper says that these personalities have told officials in President Carter's administration that this expected step by the Phalangists will be timed in such a manner so as to benefit from the U.S. presidential elections and the Iraqi-Iranian war.

The paper adds that the Phalangists are preoccupied with an unprecedented operation of increasing their military strength and supplies, preparatory to implementing this step.

Quoting informed sources, the paper says that the Phalangist Party has militia force of about 40,000 fighters--which is double the strength of last year. The sources add that the Phalangists are receiving large quantities of arms and military equipment, including tanks, from Israel and the western states. The sources further say that the Phalangist Party is moving rapidly now to build the economic foundation of its proposed state: the party has enlarged its airport so as to be able to accommodate the Israeli transport planes which will bring the requested equipment for the new state. Moreover, the port of Juniyah is being extended as well, and the Phalangists are currently setting up a television station so as to complement their radio station's transmissions. The same sources add that the Phalangist Party has been collecting taxes assessed at about $300 million a year in order to strengthen their new state.

The sources add that there are increasing signs that the Phalangists will move soon, in coordination with Israel, to implement the partition plan. According to this plan, the Phalangists will move militarily from North Lebanon, while the Israeli forces will pour into Lebanon from the south. During this operation, the Phalangists will seize a part of Beirut and declare it the capital for their state. At least the eastern sector of the capital will be dominated by them so as to become a political symbol of the new state. The Israel forces will help the Phalangists to protect the borders of their state and will then withdraw, according to the plan that has been drawn up.

FRANJIYAH EXPLAINS HIS STAND ON RECONCILIATION GOVERNMENT, OTHER ISSUES

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 23 Aug 80 pp 20-23

[Interview with former President Sulayman Franjiyah, by Ghassan Bayram, in Ihdin; date not given]

[Text] A few hours after Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh declined the task of forming a national government of reconciliation out of Lebanese political activists, I contacted former Lebanese President Sulayman Franjiyah and asked him for an appointment for this interview.

There was more than one reason for requesting this appointment, just as there was a pressing journalistic need to conduct this interview.

Franjiyah has been in the spotlight and the focus of all contacts from the moment Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh was entrusted with forming a national reconciliation government, which is the last hope of President Sarkis in one more attempt to get out of the distressing crisis which has been shaking Lebanon for more than 5 years.

Apart from any unknown differences, Franjiyah appeared to be the only obstacle in the way of forming this government, and the foremost reason for al-Sulh's excusing himself from forming it.

Are there other hidden obstacles which have all entered into the making of Franjiyah's mind?

Are there other factors and reasons which have combined to make Franjiyah adopt this stand--including, for example, the war which he has launched against President Ilyas Sarkis, accusing him of cooperating with the Phalangists?

There are other questions for which answers must be sought in this discussion with Sulayman Franjiyah at his summer home in Ihdin, during which he said things he never said before, either about a president of the republic or anyone else.

[Question] Several days ago, Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh excused himself from forming a national reconciliation government. To what do you attribute this failure to form this government, and where should President Sarkis have begun so as to not end up with this unfortunate result?

[Answer] Al-Sulh's begging off was expected and anticipated ever since the day he was commissioned to form this government.

Before his assignment, they submitted a list of ministers' names [for a new government] which was categorically rejected. After that, they asked al-Sulh to form a government similar to the rejected one. How could someone who rejected the first accept the second? I also question the reasons which impelled al-Sulh to agree to form this government, since I know that he is a sensible man who looks at things from all angles. As to how he got involved in this imbroglio, I do not know!

I fear that the imbroglio into which al-Sulh plunged himself will cost the country dearly. All the dreams which the Lebanese people had expected to be achieved following the proclamation of the principles of national accord may have become very difficult to achieve today.

[Question] In other words, can we say that these accord principles have fallen by the wayside?

[Answer] I wouldn't say "fallen"; I would say that they have become very difficult to achieve, because it was up to the president, who announced these principles in complete freedom, to carry them out. Their implementation does not need activists or nonactivists. The president is the one who makes decisions or does not, in agreement with the prime minister. It was up to the president to implement the principles of accord, and, after implementing them, to tell the Lebanese people: "I have done my duty towards you, and now I want to choose those whom I wish to work with in the government." But to proclaim the principles, then forget them, delay their implementation, and place the responsibility for their nonimplementation on certain groups--these are cheap actions done only by petty men.

[Question] In your opinion, what should the president of the republic have done to make things proceed naturally, especially since from the start he conducted accord consultations ending in the proclamation of the principles and their premises. He then conducted other accord consultations about the need to form a government of activists to carry out these principles, and, finally, conducted traditional consultations to form this government? In your opinion, what are the other means and methods which he should have resorted to under these extraordinary, critical circumstances of the country?

[Answer] Before doing all of this, he should have begun by implementing the 14 principles. Al-Huss was right when he said: "We should have started to implement the easier and simpler principles so as to gain the people's confidence." But unfortunately, even the easiest ones were not implemented.

[Question] There is something almost universally accepted. This is that this country has from the start been exposed to a conspiracy. President Sarkis is quoted as saying that when he tried to form the accord government, he was not gambling as much as he was conducting a natural experiment to find out whether this conspiracy was continuing as intensively as ever, or whether an opportunity had developed to implement a certain solution. It is said that he ascertained that the conspiracy was still going on. What is your opinion?

[Answer] The conspiracy is still going on; there is no doubt about that. But, and this is a reiteration of what I have said before, President Sarkis announced the principles on the assumption that a voice would speak up in opposition to these principles, so that he could throw the responsibility for nonimplementation of the accord on the opposition, and tell the Lebanese people: "I have tried to carry out the accord, but the opposition rejected it." Unfortunately for him, not a single Lebanese voice spoke out in opposition to these principles, so, he had to contrive something in order to create an opposition. Therefore, he concocted the myth of a government of activists. This created opposition, not to the principles of the accord, but to the formation of the government. Some newspapers, including AL-NAHAR and AL-ANWAR, depicted this opposition to the Lebanese people as opposition to the Lebanese accord. This is a lie and a concoction by organs which support the president, so as to place the responsibility for nonimplementation of the accord on this opposition. When the only one in fact responsible for nonimplementation is the president.

[Question] Statements are circulating to the effect that one of the reasons which hampered formation of the government of activists and implementation of the accord was opposition to the person of Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh. How true is this?

[Answer] I have not heard of any opposition to the person of Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh. On the contrary, al-Sulh has a distinguished political record, and we all know that he is a sensible, mature man. But the opposition was to what was imposed on al-Sulh. Opposition was to the advance circulation of the rejected government composition.

[Question] You have had a long political history. You were active in politics, and then practiced government at its highest level, as president of the republic. Now you are in the thick of the battle. Assuming that the president of the republic had succeeded in forming his government, what do you think would have been the result?

[Answer] If the proposed government had come to pass?

[Question] Yes.

[Answer] It would have been a very serious experiment. Its results would have been even more serious, because they would have led to the adoption of policies which might have led to very grave dangers.

[Question] For example?

[Answer] For example, if the Lebanese citizenry outside the control of the single party [the Plalange] were told, "If this regime can restore normality to Lebanon, so be it. But if it cannot, you have to act." Their action could take a variety of forms. If we told the citizenry: "The regime has entered into a conspiracy against you with those who are sabotaging this country, with those who want to partition it and sell it to your enemy. We want you not to recognize its existence and behave as if it did not exist," I believe that the overwhelming majority of the Lebanese people would accede to the request.

[Question] In this connection, could you possibly shed some light on your position with regard to thwarting the formation of the proposed government, and the nature of the contacts which took place between you and a number of Lebanese parties on one hand, and between you and Syrian officials on the other hand. In particular, we have in mind Deputy Prime Minister 'Abd al-Halim Khaddam, who visited you twice for this purpose?

[Answer] Let us begin with the Syrian officials. The Syrian official function with respect to forming the new government, was that of a "postman." A Syrian official was requested to communicate a certain list of names of who would be members of the future government. He performed his function very reliably. He visited us here, submitted these names, and asked, "What do you think--acceptable or unacceptable?" Our opinion was that they were unacceptable. He visited [former premier Rashid] Karami and got the same answer. Bearing in mind that Karami was the candidate commissioned with forming this government, how could he accept such an initiative? They form a government and present it to the premier-designate, saying: "Here is a government in which you will be premier." What about the opinion of the premier-designate? Certainly, no premier-designate would agree to such an arrangement.

We were honored by a second visit by Syrian Foreign Minister Khaddam. He also called on the Lebanese state. To absolve itself of responsibility for what was happening in Lebanon, the Lebanese state sought the help of the Syrian state, so as to cover up its failure. But until this very moment, the Syrian position with respect to the formation of the new government is, I repeat, only that of a postman.

[Question] The journalist is forced to echo what the people say. At certain times, he is even prepared to play the role of the devil's advocate, if necessary. Therefore, I want to say that the present state of affairs with all its ramifications has begun to make some ordinary and not-so-ordinary people say that you have become an obstacle to the formation of a government of reconciliation, or even the achievement of reconciliation. What is your reply to such impressions?

[Answer] You are saying that some people sometimes imagine real or imaginary things. The first person to put all his resources at the disposal of the president in order to achieve these principles [of reconciliation] was Sulayman Franjiyah. I still do. But is the president the tangible or intangible property of a certain group? Does he conduct himself at any time only according to the will of this group? Naturally, this group, if it were as devoted to Lebanon as it claims to be, would not have sold itself to Lebanon's enemy. If it were defending the Christians of Lebanon, as it claims to be, it would not have killed 530 Lebanese Christians in one day. If a person places himself at the service of this group, can the Lebanese citizen, who desires only Lebanon's welfare, approve of him? It is very difficult.

[Question] Can we name the group to which you are referring?

[Answer] We can call them the Lebanese Phalangists.

[Question] You have a specific position, as do the Phalangists and the president. It has been observed that at the present time and under the present circumstances, it seems to be impossible for these positions to come together or reach mutual understanding. Where are we headed?

[Answer] Towards a resolute stand which has to be taken by the president. If the president believed in his position, he would have adhered to it and said, "This is my position and I will operate accordingly."

[Question] Not to wrong President Sarkis too much, what should he have done, and how should he have conducted himself as a president of the republic in the midst of this Lebanese and Arab turmoil? Let us determine what he should have done in the midst of this complicated crisis with its Lebanese, Arab, Palestinian and international ramifications.

[Answer] The day President Sarkis took office, the greatest resources which any president could control were placed at his disposal--i.e. military resources, which Lebanon had lacked: 30,000 soldiers at his personal command. The Arab states gave him carte blanche, and said to him, "Anything you want, we are prepared to give." At the beginning of his administration, Riyadh promised him whatever he wanted. What did he do with 30,000 soldiers at his personal command, interested in nothing but carrying out this person's orders? Was he able to collect illegal arms from the people? Was he able to insure security for Lebanese territory?

[Question] Moving along, I would like to ask the following question, in response to what you said in your answer. President Sarkis has said, or is quoted as saying, that whatever was said about the resources placed at his disposal, they were just verbal resources. So far, nobody has helped him and nobody wants to help him, be it on the Lebanese, Arab, or international level. He always finds himself moving by himself in the direction of a solution, but finds all doors shut in his face.

[Answer] Let us take his words as essentially true. Why does he remain in his position? He ought to pack his suitcases and say, "Have it your way."

[Question] It is said that President Sarkis has asked himself, "Why do I stay here?" It is said that whenever he tries to answer his own question by comparing the negative points of remaining with those of departing, it becomes clear to him that his leaving the government under these circumstances would be comparable to someone administering the coup de grace to the country. The entire country is deteriorating, the legitimate authorities are all deteriorating, and the country is being partitioned or colonized or so forth. Will the future be extremely overcast?

[Answer] That the situation should deteriorate more than it already has? I do not think so. How far has the deterioration gone? Just a few kilometers from the Republican Palace. Look at the Biqa', look at the north. Praise God, they are not deteriorating; the reverse is true. There is a boom today, be it in the Biqa' or in the north, the likes of which no one has ever seen in his whole life.

Why? Because there is no state presence in the Biqa' or in the north. They would like to imagine that the Biqa' and the north are pools of fire. I wish that every Lebanese who wants to spend a weekend would come to the north, to see for himself the situation there. Likewise, a glass of 'araq [Lebanese alcoholic drink] at al-Barduni, in Zahlah, would hurt no one. Let them look over Zahlah and the Biqa'. They would find that life there has a thousand blessings, praise be to God. Why? Because there is no state presence. The citizen's vigilance makes him concerned for his region and his security, without the need to shoot anyone. Today the incidents in the north and the Biqa' are one-tenth of what they were before 1975, all because of this vigilance, which originates in the deep-rooted Lebanese conscience and fear of God.

[Question] Therefore, do you feel that the president's stepping aside would insure an outlet to a solution?

[Answer] If this is his thinking, then I suppose that there is no other way out. When a man feels that he has become isolated and bears all the responsibility, there is no call for him to remain, for remaining would be a harm from which no benefit could result.

[Question] This precedent is perhaps not permitted because of the Maronism of the republican president.

[Answer] My dear man, Ilyas Sarkis is not the keeper of the "Maronism" of the republican presidency. This was dictated by the Moslem leaders, so that there would remain in this region some place which would show the world a picture of sectarian coexistence, not just in Lebanon but throughout the region.

[Question] Today, whether we like it or not, it has come to appear that your differences with the Phalangists are the main difficulty in the way to a solution. Even the Vatican delegates who visited Lebanon went home with the impression that there was no hope of achieving a Maronite-Maronite accord as long as this dispute existed. This in turn makes it impossible to solve the Lebanese crisis. Here it seems that the entire Lebanese problem hinges on the continuation of this dispute and this conflict between you and the Phalangists. How can we convince the people otherwise?

[Answer] Unfortunately, I must say that the papal delegate's visit to Lebanon gave the impression that the Vatican was insufficiently informed as to the actual situation in Lebanon. For this reason, after honoring me, the papal delegate went away regretting his visit.

The Vatican's delegate came in order to bring points of view closer together, but he operated on untrue, unrealistic grounds. The Vatican delegate assumed that the dispute between Sulayman Franjiyah and the Phalangists came about because of a number of osbstructionists on Franjiyah's side and a number of obstructionists on the Phalangist side, because the Beirut-Tripoli road was off-limits for some Lebanese, and because there was an exchange of fire from time to time. I informed him of the issue from A to Z, and told him that the

that the dispute developed before the treacherous massacre which the Phalangists perpetrated in Ihdin. It developed for a national reason, not a personal one. It so happened that one day it was proven to me that the Phalangists were dealing with Israel. I was still a member of the Lebanese front. I gathered up my papers and withdrew. I told the Vatican delegate that my dispute with the Phalangists began before the massacre, for they carried out the massacre to bring Sulayman Franjiyah to his knees. They did hurt me emotionally, but in practice and in principle Sulayman Franjiyah kneels only to God. I told the Vatican delegate: "Your Eminence, if this group stopped dealing with Israel today, and stopped fighting among themselves (as proved by the 7 July massacre), I would do whatever you wish. But to establish an accord today between me and the group which is preparing to partition Lebanon and which deals with the enemy, a group trying to forcibly impose its domination over this country and practice single-party rule, is not possible. Sulayman Franjiyah could not accept such an accord, not because of his own personal interests, but because of the interest of his country."

I also told the Vatican delegate, "If they partitioned Lebanon today and established a racist Christian state, what would our Arab brothers' attitude be towards this new racist state? In the past, a racist Jewish state was founded, and the Arab brothers did their duty, totally severed relations, and fought. They are still fighting this racist state. Furthermore, today this racist Jewish state is getting untold, unlimited aid from the United States. As for ourselves, would we get this kind of aid so as to continue living? From the United States? We have seen America plotting to force us to leave Lebanon. West Europe? It has never given us any thought. In fact, it asked that we Lebanese come to an agreement, as a first step, so that it could offer us aid later on."

I also told the Vatican delegate that the mere idea of creating a racist state obligates the Vatican to frustrate its sponsors. The Vatican has to declare its pleasure or displeasure with this idea. I don't suppose that there is anyone at the Vatican who is happy with this idea. I told the papal delegate, "You have to be the first one to combat this notion, because you are responsible for the 12 million Christians living in this region. If a racist Christian state were created, the future of these Christians in the region would be just like that of the Jews when the state of Israel was founded--all the Jews migrated from the Arab states.

[Question] You referred to the 7 July operation, during which the Phalangist Party undertook to wipe out Sham'un's militia, as being due to the Phalangist desire to set up a one-party system. Were there any other reasons? What is your opinion of Sham'un's conduct?

[Answer] Here I cannot answer for Sham'un. Yesterday he held a press conference, and I assume that they asked him this question. As for other reasons, I cannot think of any except that the Phalangists wanted to forcibly subjugate whomever they could not subjugate peacefully. For this reason, they perpetrated the 7 July massacre. On the night of 7 July, the Liberals and the Phalangists were meeting, and there was total accord between them. If you go back to the newspapers which were published on the morning of 7 July, and the statements issued by the Phalangists and the Liberals, you see the extent of their mutual understanding. But whoever gets used to doing something has to continue doing it. If he gets used to perfidy, he persists in it.

[Question] Recently, the scope of consultation between you and the national movement and other political leaderships in western Beirut has widened. It is said that the purpose of this is to create a broad national front. What point have you reached in these consultations?

[Answer] We have reached total understanding. Before, we had a mutual understanding without understanding each other. There was a goal we were striving for. Luckily or unluckily for one group of Lebanese, during these contacts we all had one goal, but the ways of attaining it varied. Some members of the national movement honored us and met with us in this room. Our viewpoints were in complete accord on the basis of our desire to return Lebanon to what it was before 1975--a strong state, with all of us subject to the laws without any exceptions. A statement was issued which I suppose you have seen. So far, reactions to it from all parties, except for one [the Phalangists], of course, have been positive. This encourages me to continue along the line we have charted for ourselves.

[Question] In your cooperation and alliances, how can you overlook the question of the Palestinian presence in Lebanon?

[Answer] The Palestinian presence is not a Lebanese issue but an Arab one. The day the Arab brothers decide on any stand, Lebanon will be obliged to adopt this stand. Today there are 22 Arab states. As I always say, Lebanon will always be the 14th state. Any time 13 states adopt a position, Lebanon has to adopt it also, because it represents the Arab majority. With respect to our position, we cannot take sides with any Arab state; we have to take sides with the Arab majority. The issue has been with us for a long time, and I have always wished and repeat my wish today that some sort of regime could be drawn up for the Palestinian people. It would be applicable to all the Arab states, until the issue is solved. Any rights given to this regime by any Arab state would also be given by Lebanon. But if the situation in Lebanon remains as it is now, this would not be in Lebanon's interest. So far, this situation has been proven not to be in the interest of the Palestinian cause itself.

[Question] For a long time you have espoused Arab positions and national positions. The day the PLO was accepted as an observer member at the United Nations, all the Arab presidents and kings commissioned you to speak in their behalf about the Palestinian cause. In our present situation, are you thinking of touring the Arab world in this connection?

[Answer] An Arab tour to convince whom? We are all convinced of the sanctity of the Palestinian cause. I have only two solutions for the Palestinian issue. Either the Arab brothers stand together militarily, if only for 1 month, in order to seize the land which was militarily occupied, or they should pressure America to stop its aid to Israel. Unfortunately, Arab solidarity may not be available these days, and we thank God that Syria took up positions on the Israeli borders in order to resist Israeli expansion. If we look at the Begin Program, the plans since 1952 have not changed. He is still dreaming of expanding Israel and annexing for Israel the territory stretching from Jordan to the Red Sea.

This is his dream, as can be seen in Palestinian studies. Praise God that this dear fraternal state, Syria, has taken a steadfast position. Otherwise, there would be nothing to prevent or deter Begin from reaching the Red Sea. The Arab brothers, and I am addressing my remarks to the oil producers in particular, have to take a stand today.

Yesterday they took a stand against the recognition of Jerusalem as the permanent capital of Israel. They are to be thanked for this stand of theirs, but if they took the same stand against all dealings with Israel, I believe that the result would be for the good of us all.

[Question] When you suggested your Arab tour, you did so for a reason--that for 5-1/2 years Lebanon has not only paid the price for the lack of solution of the Palestinian problem, but also the price for Arab conflicts. Your friend Taqiy al-Din al-Sulh said that we have to make up with the Arabs, so that the Arabs can make up among themselves and solve our problem for us. Therefore, why has there not been any political Lebanese approach to the Arab countries for this purpose?

[Answer] Regarding this notion, can any person intervene in matters which these states do not acknowledge as existing? If we went and told these states, for example, "You are fighting on Lebanese territory against another Arab state," what Arab state would acknowledge such a thing? No one, because this activity is illegal. Whoever does something illegal cannot acknowledge it.

[Question] How do you view the future of the region's crisis? Is it near solution or what?

[Answer] The solution is within our reach, provided that our solidarity be not propagandistic but functional. If we could take a first step which does not involve any (risk?). The first step is for the oil producers to say, "We are prepared to sell petroleum for a number of foreign currencies: the Japanese yen, the franc, the pound sterling, and some others." Let them say, "We want to sell our product for these currencies." You would see Carter coming from America to Riyadh on his knees. If they say, "The friend of Israel is our enemy," as in the proverb "the friend of my enemy is my enemy," what states would risk being friends with Israel? None. There are 120 million Arabs, 120 million consumers and 120 million owners of a fantastic resource the likes of which is unknown in history. If these 120 million said, "We want to boycott the friends of Israel," who would be ready to sacrifice 120 million consumers economically, not to mention politically, in order to stick with Israel? No one. But we lack the person who could say this. The one who could have made this statement and carried it out was assassinated by America. He was, God's mercy be upon him, the late King Faysal ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz.

[Question] What do you expect will be the future of Lebanon? Are we going to better, or to worse, or to pieces, especially since Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat recently announced that Lebanon is headed for more massacres, that the Pierre Jumayyil state will be founded, and that Lebanon will be partitioned?

[Answer] My only thought is that a president knows that he has to take stands. Today, in spite of everything which has been said, the fact remains that no man can claim that he has the resources available to the president. The president is the only one who has all the resources, and he has to take his stands on the basis of these available resources. As long as the president does not take stands, he is like a homeowner who leaves his house open to everyone. This house will never be safe.

True, people may applaud him. If he finds himself in error, he can back up. Rectifying an error is a virtue. But unfortunately, he has never at any time tried to take a stand.

[Question] If President Sarkis came tomorrow and said, "I am no longer able to do anything, and I want to resign," do you think that the election of a new president to maintain the continuity of the legitimate authority would be possible in the midst of our present circumstances?

[Answer] With 80 deputies, we could surely elect a new president. It is possible that 10 or 15 deputies who live in areas controlled by the Phalangists would boycott the elections, but who else would refuse to elect a new president? No one. This would not be the first time in the world that a presidency became vacant. Many presidents have died or resigned without anything coming to a standstill.

[Question] Suppose a new president was elected without the Phalangists' approval. What if the Phalangists came, knowing that he was their enemy and opponent, and said, "We refuse to go along, and we are declaring our own state?"

[Answer] This president would have the resources enabling him to bash them in the head.

[Question] As long as we are saying that they are allied with Israel, what if Israel came to protect them?

[Answer] The world would stop Israel at its borders.

[Question] But this world we are talking about is even now unable to stop Israel at any border!

[Answer] No, my dear man, the world can stop it. And if the world does not stop it, allied as it is with the enemy, Lebanon can ally itself with friendly states. There are many friendly states, and Israel is not such a big bogeyman.

[Question] In this case, there is no friendly state for us except the Soviet Union, because the other states, from the United States to the European states, are the ones which helped establish Israel.

[Answer] And why not the Soviet Union? Any man who helps me, I call him a good man. Whoever is good to me is, in my opinion, a benevolent and good man.

ECONOMIC SECTORS REMAIN ACTIVE DESPITE POLITICAL UNCERTAINTY

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 23 Aug 80 pp 41-42

[Article by 'Abd-al-Karim al-Khalil: "From Banking to Industry to Real Estate; The Secrets Behind Deals and Investments"]

[Excerpts] Political and security factors in Lebanon frustrate economic activity which might create outlets for energies and capabilities, and cause people to believe that right now the freezer is the natural place for any creative economic enterprise or any project which might generate activity.

There has been a climate of surprise political events, beginning with the resignation of the Salim al-Huss government on 7 June, followed by the acceptance of this resignation on 20 July, followed by a series of surprises relating to the proposed formation of a miraculous government of political activists headed by Taqi-al-Din al-Sulh, the failure to form this government, and the idea of forming a government of 2nd, 3rd or bottom line of political activists. This climate gave rise to a pretty gloomy outlook for businessmen.

The successive security breakdowns which coincided with the political crisis, beginning with the assassination of a number of press, political and religious personalities in various parts of the country, followed by the detonation of cars filled with explosives, underscored the basic difficulties of a system of localized security which had appeared to some businessmen to be a hopeful development in some regions.

However, inspite of this atmosphere which gave rise to uneasy questions about the country's fate, most sectors of the Lebanese economy are witnessing a varied succession of business transactions and buying and selling activity. At times, these transactions attracted attention with regard to their nature, size or implication.

In the banking sector in particular, there was more than one new transaction, or old one begun before the crisis became serious, which took its course in spite of the gloomy atmosphere. Transactions to increase the capital of banks operating in Lebanon by amounts consistent with the guidelines of the Bank of Lebanon, in order to improve the ratio between capital and deposits or credits, are not easy under current circumstances, especially where capital is to be raised to 50 million Lebanese pounds (as in the case of the Mediterranean Bank and the Bank of Lebanon and al-Mahjar).

The "Francebank" transaction ended with the firm of 'Adnan and 'Adil al-Qassar purchasing 70 percent of the bank's shares, which had been owned by the French "Indosuisse" group. This was a relatively old transaction begun before the new deterioration in the situation. However, the participation of a group of Lebanese and Arab businessmen (in anticipation of some foreign individuals or banks) in forming the new group which acquired the above-mentioned shares indicates that there are many men looking for investment opportunities in the darkest of hours. Why would they do it, when they already enjoy various good positions in contracting, trade, industry and real estate?

While transactions and efforts to establish banking firms and branches abroad continue, the admission of new shareholders into existing banks in Lebanon, in these dark hours, is somewhat unusual. This development is exemplified by the accession to ownership and board membership of Universal Bank by Messrs Raja Najjar, Niqula Alban, Farid Shqqayr, and Salim 'Abd al-Rahim Diyab, and by the accession to ownership and board membership of the Byblos Bank by the industrialist Rafiq Ghandur and Muhammad al-Za'tari, president of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Saida.

In the industrial sector, the most outstanding transaction taking place may be the one referred to by AL-MUSTAQBAL AL-IQTISADI 5 weeks ago. This is the offer by a group of Lebanese and Saudi businessmen to buy 90 percent of the shares of the al-Mashriq Glass Company, for the sum of 48 million pounds (more than $14 million). But the establishment of the Interback Cardboard Carton Plant in Saida, with an initial capital of 5 million pounds, in addition to more than 20 million pounds required to start it up, is no less important in a region constantly threatened by Israeli attacks.

As for the real estate sector, the major transactions in progress, involving vast, diversified capital, are those being financed by Kuwaiti capital in particular and Gulf capital in general, in more than one region, under outright Kuwaiti names or under Lebanese names covering Kuwaiti interests. Some of them consist of construction of residential complexes (such as the Dawud al-'Ali Company complex in Saida and the complex which Rafiq al-Hariri intends to build in Saida). There are also many transactions by expatriates or semi-expatriates, individuals or groups, the most recent being the Fardan land transaction in Beirut, by Rubay' 'Ammash and Ahmad Kabbarah, and the Mushrif land transaction and project near Damar, by Rafiq Sharaf-al-Din.

Naturally, we cannot enumerate everything or list all transactions in all sectors.

It is possible to explain this continued and renewed interest in investment in all sectors in terms of what we (and foreigners) refer to as the adaptability and vitality of the Lebanese people in general, and the Lebanese businessmen in particular. Still, one has to view all these investments, which are attracting millions of pounds, as evidence of potential profitability in the various sectors of the Lebanese economy.

However, recognizing the investment potential in the various sectors of the Lebanese economy does not keep one from wondering about the secrets or common secrets, behind these transactions. Is it confidence in Lebanon's future, even in the darkest hours of the crisis which created uneasiness about the fate of the country and the future of everything in it? Or is the secret the ease of quickly raising money, which might drive its owners into assuming risky ventures.

Such questions might seem strange to businessmen who are unconcerned about economics except from the standpoint of what the transaction might bring. However, what gives rise to further questions are a number of phenomena which accompanied some of these transactions.

The first phenomenon is that some transactions revealed a sort of withdrawal on the part of French capital operating in Lebanon. This withdrawal began in part with the reduction of Credit Commercial de France's (the mother company) share in Credit Commercial De France-Middle East at the end of 1977, on the grounds of increasing the number of shareholders. This was followed by the sale of one-third of the New Syria-Lebanon Bank Company, owned by French interests, to Mrs Nadiya al-Khuri at the end of 1979. Now we see the Indosuisse group relinquishing 70 percent of its ownership in Francebank. In the industrial sector, we see the "Saint (Goyen)" industrial group giving up 40 percent of the shares it owned in the al-Mushriq Glass Company, and maintaining a symbolic share not exceeding 10 percent.

The second phenomenon is that the same names were involved in more than one transaction, especially in the industrial, banking, and real estate transactions.

The third phenomenon is the volume of money involved. Aside from the ease of quickly raising money, this phenomenon has to be explained in terms of the vital fact of firm relations which continue to link Lebanese businessmen with Arab businessmen, financiers and rulers, who have vast amounts of money and are looking for investment opportunities, which, they feel, are limited in their own countries. They are stepping up their search now, because of increasing uneasiness about stability in their own countries, where they have heard more than one threat, and have seen more than one serious incident, against this stability.

Is all this discussion sufficient to give a reasonable idea about the secrets behind the investments in various sectors of the Lebanese economy during hours and days of anxiety about the fate of Lebanon?

Does this discussion answer the question as to whether these investments are an indication of continued confidence in Lebanon's future, or does it merely underscore the puzzle of these investments?

The discussion may or may not be adequate. But with all available facts and questions raised so far, we will know the answer to our questions sooner or later.

BRIEFS

TWO LEBANESE MURDERED--A state of tension and expectation is prevailing in the southern area after Al-Qulay'ah, Marj 'Uyun, An-Nabatiyah and (?Arnun), had come under heavy artillery fire. Heavy artillery fire has fallen in western Al-Biqa', particularly in Al-'Aliyah and Ra's Al-'Ayn. In the capital, the situation remains relatively calm in the traditional axes. However, intermittent sniper fire is being heard between armed positions. Meanwhile, in [words indistinct], Al-Biqa', a dispute broke out in the office of Abu Ahmad Isma'il, who belongs to FATAH. The dispute resulted in the murder of Antoine al-Hashim and a member of the Zaytun family--both of whom belonged to the Syrian Social Nationalist Party. SAHARA 'RECOVERY' ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATED AT DAKHLA

Rabat L'OPINION in French 18 Aug 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Hubert Laverne, AFP special correspondent]

[Text] Thursday the Moroccan Government once again indicated its determination to keep the Western Sahara by giving special pomp to the celebration of the first anniversary of the "recovery" of the Province of "Wadi Ed-Dahab."

On 14 August 1979, 9 days after the Algiers agreement by which Mauritania resolved to withdraw from the southern part of the Western Sahara, the region's tribal chiefs and leading citizens swore allegiance to His Majesty, King Hassan II, in Rabat. In the eyes of the Moroccan authorities, this ceremony was supposed to take the place of self-determination.

A year later, a ministerial delegation led by Prime Minister Maati Bouabid, and including representatives of the various parties represented in the government, went on locating, at Dakhla (formerly Villa Cisneros), while all over Morocco a holiday was observed to mark the event.

A Moroccan Air Force "C-130" plane landed on the airfield that no longer has anything in common with the stopover runway of "Aeropostale's" pioneers: a theatrical company, the Moroccan Radio-Television Orchestre, and approximately 30 members of Mohammedia's Yacht Club who had come to participate in a surfboat regata and a fishing competition were present.

Before the parade that opened the ceremonies, General Dlimi, the head of the king's Aides de Camp, in command of the southern zone, and the leading official responsible for the "recovery" of Morocco's military position, decorated the commanding officer of the Dakhla zone and eight soldiers distinguished for their heroic conduct during the battle of Bir Anzarane (in the south of the Western Sahara) which, a year ago, stopped the POLISARIO in its attempt to seize Dakhla and all of the province.

The parade of the troops of the three branches of the armed forces was preceded, amidst the people's applause, by the passing of the province's leading citizens wearing traditional costume. Some carried U.S. rifles distributed to them last year by His Majesty King Hassan II at the conclusion of the allegiance ceremony.

The prime minister then inaugurated two facilities that symbolize the city's future expansion: a secondary school and a water treatment plant, the volume of which should be sufficient until the year 2000.

He also presided over a mechoui (banquet-size roasting of lamb) given for everyone under tens of camel skin tents set up in rows at the edge of the city.

But without a doubt the most extraordinary event of the day was the distribution of prizes--a camel for first prize--to the winners of the regata and the fishing competition. The ceremony took place at the end of the pier under the eyes of the crews of four Spanish and two South Korean trawlers stopped and boarded in the last few days.

The waters of the Western Sahara are so well stocked with fish that master coxswain do not resist the temptation to throw their nets in without permission in Morocco's economic zone or right in territorial waters, they pointed out in Dakhla.

General Dlimi voiced his satisfaction to the AFP concerning the situation in the region: "As you see " he said, "there is no problem. The situation is very calm and very sound on the military level. The Malians, Mauritanians, and the other African nationals (who make up the POLISARIO) no longer want to fight for others."

As far as the prime minister is concerned, he feels that the situation has also improved at the diplomatic level: "Some African countries," he said, "have understood the situation. For example, Nigeria has remembered that it was supported when Biafra wanted to secede. Others have ethnic problems...So, what we need to do is continue to explain Morocco's point of view in Africa and Latin America." Regarding an eventual direct settlement of the conflict between Morocco and Algeria, that Rabat has always wanted, the honorable Maati Bouabid appears skeptical: The internal changes that have taken place in Algeria, he feels, have not changed the positions on the Sahara.

"This matter doesn't concern us," they continue to say in Algiers, according to the prime minister.

ISTIQLAL PARTY SUPPORTS AL QODS COMMITTEE CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS

Rabat L'OPINION in French 25 Aug 80 p 1

[Article: "Al-Tayif [Conference] Appeal Supported to Firmly Oppose Countries that Sustain the Zionist Enemy"]

[Text] The executive committee of the Istiqlal Party met Thursday, 10 Chaoual 1400 (21 August 1980) to discuss the results of the Al Qods committee meetings at Casablanca from 16 to 18 August under the chairmanship of his majesty the king.

The Istiqlal Party feels that the committee achieved positive results with the aid of the sustained work and basic energy his majesty the king instilled in the committee's working staff. The executive committee voices its total support of the decisions made at the conclusion of the Al Qods committee meeting. The Istiqlal Party supports the basic principles that assert the desire of Arab and Islamic states to respond to the Israeli challenge and that are committed to liberating the Arab city of Al Qods in order to make it the capital of an autonomous Palestinian state. The Istiqlal Party feels that this commitment is a national, Arab, Islamic, and human obligation demanded of all Arab and Islamic countries and allies to support the Palestinian people in their struggle for the exercise of their rights to return to their homeland, to achieve self-determination, and to establish an independent state in their homeland.

The Istiqlal Party expresses its support of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia's appeal for a religious war to liberate Al Qods as resolved and stated by the Al Qods committeee.

The Istiqlal Party also supports Al-Tayif's appeal to firmly oppose countries that support the Zionist enemy.

The Istiqlal Party regards it as essential to carry out the resolution to open volunteer offices in Islamic countries in order to mobilize citizens.

The Istiqlal Party is happy to record the appeal for the creation of public support associations like the "Moroccan Association to Support the Palestinian Struggle."

It voices its support of all the resolutions taken at the conclusion of the Al Qods committee meeting and, in the first place, the one recommending the increase of equipment and moral support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization to enable it to step up its armed struggle as well as the one calling on Arab and Islamic countries to use their strength and potentialities against all countries that support the Israeli resolution to annex Al Qods.

The Istiqlal Party expresses its support of the resolutions taken by the committee on the level of foreign contacts regarding the withdrawal of embassies from occupied Al Qods as well as the expulsion of the Workers' Party of the Socialist International, the stopping of Jewish immigration to Palestine, the recognition of the Palestinian Liberation Organization as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, or the breaking of diplomatic relations with Israel by nonalined countries.

The Istiqlal Party expresses its support of the committee's resolution inviting all countries to carry out their responsibilities vis-a-vis the challenge made by Israel.

It expresses the trust extended to the committee and its chairman, His Majesty Hassan II and feels that the effort exerted by His Majesty during the last session and at the level of the contacts that it is initiating confirm the committee's commitment to liberate Al Qods and it expresses its total confidence that the committee will undertake to set these resolutions down in the practical areas forming the best counterattack on Israel's challenge to annex Al Qods and make it its "eternal" capital.

FIRST QUARTER ECONOMIC STATISTICS REPORTED

Casablanca LA VIE ECONOMIQUE in French 12 Aug 80 pp 1, 2

[Article: "A Satisfactory Balance Sheet for the First Quarter of 1980"]

[Text] A 19-percent increase in the production of phosphates and a 68-percent increase in exported tons; a 52-percent increase in exports and a 30-percent increase in imports.

The quarterly survey of the economic situation carried out by the Office of Statistics during the second quarter of 1980 permits us to make some interesting observations on economic growth during the first quarter.

The balance sheet we can draw up is very positive and remarkable results have been obtained in some sectors. Here are the most noteworthy points:

Coal production	:	+46%
Production of electricity	:	+11%
Phosphate production	:	+19%
Zinc production	:	+42%
Lead production	:	+16%
Exports	:	+52%
Imports	:	+29.8%
Price of a ton of exported phosphate	:	+68%
Price of a ton of exported P2 05	:	+63.3%

Here are the results recorded in various sectors of the economy as they were recorded by the Office of Statistics.

Energy

The energy sector experienced a favorable growth during the first quarter of 1980. Coal and electricity production were better than in the first quarter of the preceding year, with 46 percent and 11 percent more respectively. As for crude oil, it recorded an almost 2 percent decrease, in comparison to the same period. However, this decrease is not surprising since the rate of increase was very extraordinarily vigorous in the year elapsed, largely because of the imports of this product resulting from the expansion of the SAMIR [Moroccan-Italian Refining Corporation] and the installation of the SCP [Moroccan Petroleum Company].

The consumption of petroleum products like gas, gas oil, and fuel oil, experienced a clear improvement compared to what it was during the first 3 months of 1979, except for gas where a decrease was noted during the same period.

Mines

The rise in the prices of raw materials on the world market stimulated our mineral production at the beginning of the year 1980.

As a result, at the end of March 1980, phosphates had advanced in volume by close to 19 percent, lead 16 percent, and zinc 42 percent compared to the same period last year.

On the other hand, the production of iron does not seem to have recovered yet. The latter was only 450 tons at the end of the first 3 months of this year, compared to 2,600 tons during the first quarter last year. Consequently, the overall index of the mining sector is reported at 167 points, compared to 128 last year.

Industry

According to the industrialists affected by the economic survey, the trend observed for the whole processing industry during the first quarter is rather favorable. As a result, when seen through its production index, the activity of this sector continued to experience a recovery during this period.

The branches that seem to be experiencing sound growth are paper and cardboard, leather and leather shoes, chemistry and metals. These results have been occasioned by rising demand on the one hand and by the restocking of inventories on the other hand. Nevertheless, it should be pointed out that the production of paper and cardboard has completely run out and that inventories are depleted. In the case of personal prospects for the second quarter, half of the industrialists were expecting an increase in production volume. Food products, for which 56 percent of the industrialists had observed a stabilization during the first quarter compared to the fourth quarter last year, would experience an economic upturn since 63 percent of them anticipate an increase. Perhaps it is the upcoming month of Ramadan that is responsible for this phenomenon, particularly when we know that this month has very significant effects on consumption. Because of these statistical data and also the evolution of the industrial production index over time, the latter would stabilize at 197 points compared to 194 a year ago or an increase of 1.5 percent.

Foreign Trade

In the first quarter of 1980, our trade with foreign countries produced a trade deficit of 1,691 million dirhams or thereabouts, compared to 1,563 million DH at the conclusion of the same period the preceding year. Such a change is the result of a very marked increase in our purchases of 29.8 percent and from the 52 percent increase in value of our sales that we have already reported. Therefore the reserve ratio settled at 59.5 percent, compared to 50.8 percent.

The weighing down of the expenditures incurred by imports results in particular from the rapid increase in the average prices of an imported ton of refined crude oil (95.5 percent), sugar (34.5 percent), and wheat (30.4 percent).

In the case of exports, for their part they have recovered 52 percent, as a result principally in value of raw materials (86.7 percent), semi-manufactured products (107.7 percent), food products (6.3 percent), and fuel products (225.9 percent).

Indeed, certain outstanding products like the phosphates, citrus fruits, and phosphoric acid and that represent 50.9 percent of all exports have seen their average price per ton rise 68 percent, 1.6 percent, and 63.3 percent, compared to the same period last year.

Concerning the second quarter of 1980, imports and exports would continue their rising trend, the fluctuations expected at the end of June 1980 are respectively 24.9 percent and 52.5 percent, in comparison to the same period a year ago.

Tourism

At the conclusion of the first 4 months of 1980, the number of arrivals of short-term tourists came to 400,000 tourists, compared to 391,000 for the same period last year. This outcome could be better without the continued rise in prices that is rampant in the world, particularly in the cost of transportation and petroleum products.

The growth by the various means of transportation lets it become apparent that only air travel progressed. This remaining, in addition, the principal means used was in fact used by 219,000 tourists (an 11.7 percent increase in growth). However, the entries of tourists by land and sea registered a loss, 8.8 percent and 3.4 percent respectively, compared to the same period last year.

Public Finance

Compared to the first 4 months of last year, recurring revenue rose 17 percent to reach 4,679 million DH. As for fiscal revenue, representing 95 percent of all revenue, it alone registered a fluctuation upwards of 27 percent compared to the same period of 1979. Customs duty and excise taxes are at the bottom of this growth.

As for recurring expenditures, they registered a 29 percent rise to reach 5,066 million DH, during the same period. We find the operating and public debt expenses intervene in this substantial increase 23.4 percent and 47.9 percent respectively.

As a result, fiscal savings produced a deficit of 387 million DH at the end of April of this year, instead of a surplus of 83 million DH achieved during the same period of 1979. However, beside this seemingly difficult situation, capital expenditure declined 22 percent to settle at 1,263 million DH. With regard to forecasts, because of the statistics for the month of April, the operating and public debt expenses should, at the end of June, register increases of 27 percent and 67.6 percent respectively compared to the same period last year. Reciprocally capital expenditure declined 28 percent.

Money and Credit

The money supply hit 28,264 million DH at the end of March of this year, compared to 24,605 million DH a year earlier, producing as a result a 14.9 percent increase. This rise involved paper currency and quasi-money particularly--16.1 percent and 30.3 percent respectively. As for financial credit, because of the marked improvement in demand deposits in depository banks, it rose 9.7 percent, thus representing 51 percent of the total money and quasi-money supply. Furthermore, while claims against the Treasury and economic appropriations increased 11.9 percent and 17.1 percent respectively, as for foreign assets, they declined 6.1 percent compared to the same period last year, because of the heaviness in value shown for our purchases overseas that experienced a dizzy increase of 29.8 percent during the first quarter of this year.

At the end of the second quarter, the aggregate total of money and quasi-money supplies was to stabilize at 29,729 million DH, thus recording a 13.4 percent rise, compared to 24.5 percent already noted last year. As far as economic appropriations and claims against the Treasury are concerned, they were reported by 17.5 percent and 16.8 percent respectively with an eye on responding to the needs of the economy through the restrictive policy on the inflationary creation of money.

Prices

Consumer prices slipped in virtually all industrialized countries this year. Japan, considered the toughest in the struggle to counter price increases, is currently experiencing a 10-percent rate of inflation. In France and the United States, the shift in these prices from January to the end of March stabilized at a rate of 4.2 percent.

At the national level, the cost of living index, while continuing to show an upward trend, is varying in the direction of our forecasts. It reached 204.1 points at the conclusion of the first 5 months of this year, compared to 188.4 one year before, thus recording an 8.3 percent increase.

It is pointed out, furthermore, that if the lowest rates are blamed on the "clothing" and "food"groups, with respectively 5.6 percent and 6 percent, the "housing" group has seen its index increase 11.3 percent. In addition, while it has the highest rate, the index of the "transportation, leisure, miscellaneous" group has experienced a substantial slowdown, moving from 16.1 percent at the end of January to 14.7 percent at the end of May 1980.

At the conclusion of the first 6 months of this year, we should expect an 8.3 percent increase in the overall index, compared to the same period last year.

MOTIVES BEHIND TIMING, LOCALE OF MILITARY REVIEW STUDIED

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 6 Sep 80 p 18

[Article by Sulayman Nimr: "Saudi Arms: Diversified Sources and Modern Sites"]

[Text] AMX-30 tanks were passing in front of the area of the military review which was held in Tabuk in northern Saudi Arabia last Monday and F-5 aircraft were flying overhead when one of the foreign military attaches whispered in the ear of a colleague: "Do you think there are political and military ramifications behind holding this military review no more than 200 kilometers from the Jordanian front with Israel, particularly after the call by Saudi Crown Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz al-Sa'ud for a holy war?"

The other military attache replied to his colleague: "I don't think so because it is not Saudi Arabia's habit to flex its muscles and make shows of strength. The military display now in progress and the review presented by the paratroops and the personnel of the special units yesterday were held only because the Saudi monarch was inaugurating the military city, King 'Abd-al-'Aziz Military City in Tabuk. This military city is one of those that Saudi Arabia has taken pains to establish in various parts of its territory. There is another military city in the southern area of the kingdom and construction of a military city is currently underway in the eastern area.

"However, I believe that there are ramifications to picking the time to hold this display, not to mention the number of personnel and equipment which we are now seeing, much greater than we have seen in earlier reviews by the Saudi army. This leaves me with an impression that the Saudi leadership wants to show the world, and Israel in particular, that it has a military strike force, particularly after the call for a holy war by the Saudi crown prince."

These questions raised by the foreign military attache did not appear odd to the military observers who had followed with great interest the two military displays in which various military units had participated, in addition to a display of equipment and machinery involving troop transports, armored vehicles, M-6 tanks, AMX-30 tanks, vehicles carrying TOW and HOT anti-tank missiles, 155 mm artillery, anti-aircraft artillery, HAWK missiles and various formations of aircraft including Lightening and F-5 fighter and interceptor aircraft and air-refueling aircraft.

The size of the military display prompted observers to point out in their reports that the Saudi leadership is working to station and reinforce Saudi army forces in the northern part of the kingdom. However, Prince Sultan ibn 'Abd-al'Aziz al-Sa'ud, Saudi minister of defense and aviation, when asked about that, denied it, saying: "The kingdom's defense policy is not centered on concentrating its defense and forces in a specific part of the kingdom but rather on defending all territory of the kingdom. One requirement of the Saudi defense plan is to create military cities in various areas of the kingdom because the tremendous expanse of the kingdom requires the establishment of military cities in specific strategic areas." Prince Sultan reaffirmed the arms policy of the kingdom of Saudi Arabia based on the principle of multiple sources of arms for its army, saying in this regard, "The principle of multiple sources of arms is a policy which the kingdom has pursued for a long time resulting in the conclusion of bilateral agreements with a number of arms-producing western countries. The kingdom is anxious to acquire technology to the extent it can absorb it."

The Saudi minister of defense and aviation disclosed that Britain had agreed to sell arms to the kingdom and that the British foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, had, during his recent visit to Saudi Arabia, expressed his country's willingness to cooperate with Saudi Arabia in this area and others.

AL-MUSTAQBAL asked an official Saudi source about the political and military goals of the military reviews which the city of Tabuk on the northern border of Saudi Arabia with Jordan had witnessed and he said, "As Prince Sultan ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz al-Sa'ud, minister of defense and avaiation, explained, all the military accomplishments which the kingdom is pursuing fall within the framework of Saudi Arabia's defense plan."

FRENCH NAVAL WEAPONS PACKAGE DETAILED

Beirut AL-'AMAL in Arabic 12 Sep 80 p 1

[Article: "French Naval Weapons Worth 14 Billion Francs for Saudi Arabia"]

[Text] It was learned yesterday in Riyadh that a contract worth 14 billion French francs to supply French naval weapons to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia was initialed.

The signing of this contract between the French and Saudi governments comes in the wake of the preliminary decision to entrust the supplying of a large part of the ordnance needed to defend its coasts to France. It should be mentioned that this decision was reached during the visit of French Defense Minister Yvon Bourges to Saudi Arabia last May.

These sources say that the contract calls for providing naval defense equipment, equipment for special forces and electronic equipment through a consortium comprising state-owned naval arsenals and private companies: Matra, (sinas), and Thomson-CSF. The same sources also say that the French group, Thomson-CSF, will play the role of executive overseer of the delivery of the arms and equipment. A spokesman for this company refused, however, to confirm or deny this information.

In a related concern, Saudi Arabia has agreed to provide the necessary funds to the Dassault group to manufacture the twin-jet Mirage 4000.

It should be noted that a few months ago Saudi Arabia paid the same company 4 billion francs to finance the final plans and manufacture of the aircraft. It has not been determined how many Mirage 4000 aircraft Saudi Arabia will need and it is thought that there will be negotiations about this.

It appears that the important thing at the present time is the production of large numbers of this very advanced aircraft which the French government and the Dassault group did not have the necessary financial capabilities to manufacture.

POLICE CHIEF DISCUSSES ORGANIZATION, PENAL AFFAIRS

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 15 Sep 80 p 3

[Interview with General 'Abd al-Muhsin ibn al-'A'id al-Harithi, Director of Police of the Al-Qasim Area, by 'Abdullah al-'Ayarah, date and place of interview not given]

[Text] The security aspect of things receives great attention from the government of the kingdom and it always takes pains to provide security and protection for citizens and others. Public security is handled through directorates of police in all areas of the kingdom which achieve and maintain this security and pursue crime wherever it occurs. The directorate of police in al-Qasim is one of these directorates which has witnessed a great improvement in the number of personnel and equipment and to which the police departments of al-Ras, 'Anizah and Baridah have been joined to fall under a single command. During the years 1397, 1398, 1399 and 1400, the police force has developed and has received modern equipment.

During a meeting with General 'Abd-al-Muhsin ibn 'A'id al-Harithi, director of police of the al-Qasim area, he talked with AL-RIYAD about the police departments and how to enlist in military service.

[Question] What about the most important police stations?

[Answer] The fact is there is a large number of police divisions at the present time. The most important are the Baridah division, and the 'Anizah/al-Ras/al-Bukayriyah/al-Mudhnib division. Also, there is a criminal operations division and a telecommunications division. The most important section of the latter is the operations section, because it has prime responsibility for crime prevention and for catching criminals once crimes are committed. It is also responsible for the security situation in the area in general. We should not forget that every division, branch or department of the police has a considerable role and importance.

[Question] Given the vast size of the al-Qasim area, is thought being given to opening sub-stations in a number of cities of the area?

[Answer] The fact is that the idea of opening sub-stations in the area has come up and is being studied and, God willing, will be made public at the right time. Also, when there are sufficient capabilities, a number of branches will be opened in the city of Baridah.

[Question] When we hear the word prison, we at once think that this is a place where you put everyone who violates the law of all classes and ages as well as women. There are a number of questions about this. If a person who is not yet 18 is arrested for violating the law, where is he put? If a non-Saudi who is not yet 18 is arrested for violating the law, where is he put? What about girls who are under 18?

[Answer] Prison is the administration of punishment, correction and reform and is not what some people think. Most people put there are on equal footing with no difference between them, citizen of foreigner. However, the punishments vary to fit the offense. Anyone arrested who is not yet 18--whether foreign or Saudi--is placed in an observation house. They are interrogated in a calm and psychologically relaxing atmosphere as juveniles; they are treated equally because our wise government pursues the path of the Islamic Shari'a the basis of which is justice and equality.

Women have a special, independent prison in wings of public prisons and have matrons to take care of their affairs within the prison.

There are various activities in which some prisoners engage in prison, such as carpentry, electrician, foundry work and some other manual work for women and these activities are certainly sufficient to rehabilitate a prisoner to follow the straight and narrow.

[Question] When a prisoner gets out after serving his time, is there a followup by the security directorate and attempts to help him from reverting to the crooked path?

[Answer] There is certainly a followup on prisoners when they leave prison after serving their sentences to find out if they are going straight and to keep them away from crime. There is indeed a helping hand given to them to enable them to continue honest work and to direct them away from the path of crime and, with God's help, to guide them to happiness and wellbeing.

[Question] Is there cooperation between the al-Qasim area police and some departments that take an interest in the individual, such as the vocational training center, vocational preparation and the social care house, that is, after the prisoner gets out of prison?

[Answer] There is excellent cooperation between the al-Qasim police and those departments with a common relationship.

[Question] Recently a social observation house was opened. What is the connection between public security and this house?

[Answer] There is one connection between the observation house and the security machinery, that is, dealing with problems of juveniles who are under 18 years of age who turn to committing some misdemeanors and infractions and turning them toward the right path and keeping them from the paths of evil and perversion.

[Question] It is known, God be praised, that the kingdom has one of the lowest crime rates in the world. Do you know the crime rate in the al-Qasim area (we don't mean the crime of murder but anything violating the law) and what is the rate for Saudis compared with foreigners? Are you satisfied with the security situation?

[Answer] I would say that the crime rate in the al-Qasim area is low, God be praised, although there are some incidents but not worrisome and most of the crimes are by foreigners.

In fact, I am satisfied with the security situation in the area because all personnel do their duty as well as can be expected within their specialities in accordance with the security plans. We are working to improve security conditions. Rather than my satisfaction as an official, I want the public to be satisfied in this regard because the satisfaction of the citizen is more important and my satisfaction is based on their satisfaction. We pray to God for success.

[Question] There are some young people who shy away from military service because of what they see as its tough rules. What would you say to them?

[Answer] I would tell them that the military is not like that; it is easy, education and honorable service which is the duty of everyone. Like some other activities, when a young person wants to get involved in it, it appears difficult to him but when he joins it, he finds that things are easy. The military, as is known, is a transformation in an individual's life from civilian life to the military life and this has an impact on his behavior and his treatment while performing his duty with any citizen. After an individual experiences it, he will prefer it over any other government jobs. I urge our young people to be eager to follow the military path in all its various jobs and they will see the great difference between the civilian and military lives and the psychological satisfaction.

[Question] Any last word?

[Answer] My final word is a request for cooperation between the citizen and the security man because cooperation is needed. Both are human beings and both are citizens as well.

COMMUNIST PARTY ISSUES ANNIVERSARY STATEMENT

Beirut AL-NIDA' in Arabic 17 Sep 80 p 9

[Article: "The Events of November Are an Essential Turn in the Struggle of our People; the Call for a Holy War Is a Lie; the Authorities Suppressed the Demonstrations on Jerusalem Day"]

[Text] The Communist Party in Saudi Arabia released a statement on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the announcement of its founding about conditions in Saudi Arabia, the Arab world and the world. Here is an extract of the bulk of the statement which was dated last August:

Workers and peasants, youths, intellectuals, women, men of the tribes, our masses:

This is the fifth anniversary of the announcement of the founding of the Communist Party in Saudi Arabia, the seasoned vanguard of the working class and the rest of the downtrodden people in our country. On 31 August 1975, the first constituent assembly of the party was held where it drew up the political and organizational fixed in its nationalist program, its internal structure, and elected the leading bodies.

Five years have passed filled with important and grave events from the domestic, Arab and international standpoint. They have certainly left their effect and had their impact on the activity and struggle of the party and the rest of the patriotic and democratic forces in our country. The validity of the party's course and political and combative options and directions have been tested with regard to many positions and the party has reaffirmed its sincerity and fundamental commitment to its class, nationalist, pan-Arab and international tasks and duties. One the nationalist level, the communists have fought relentlessly and selflessly at the side of all patriotic and democratic forces in exceptionally harsh circumstances against the absolute monarchial regime supported by international imperialism and its monopolistic companies. In defense of the vital interests of the working class and the other patriotic segments of the populace, this struggle has made the utmost sacrifices of its finest members and supporters.

The noble events of November, which were the product of a set of objective and autonomous factors in the economic, social and political reality, represented a major event and essential turn in the struggle of the masses and their patriotic forces in our country. The superior bravery and heroism demonstrated by the people in confronting the forces of the suppressive authorities, armed to the teeth with weapons and supported by American imperialism, reflected the extent of the anger harbored as the result of the injustice and persecution the people had received from the ruling establishment. The regime's only concern is to fulfill its narrow, egoistic interests, even if this required frittering away the values of independence and effective sovereignty over the basic destinies and wealth; in effect, pawning itself to imperialism and its oil companies.

The November convulsion underscored the fact that given the depth and evolution of the confrontation between the masses on one hand and the ruling regime and its imperialist masters on the other, the authorities will have to continuously forego their positions which are invariably hostile to the interests, aspirations and ambitions of the homeland and the people. What is needed now is the intensification of the struggle and moving it forward on all levels to tighten the noose around the absolutist regime whose crisis has worsened, whose isolation has increased, whose social base has narrowed and whose foundations have been undermined.

In order to accomplish the patriotic and democratic tasks in our country, it will be necessary to unify the efforts of all patriotic and sincere forces. This must be achieved regardless of [their] political, intellectual and ideological orientations, on the common patriotic battleground against the domination of imperialism and the absolutist regime for the sake of freedom, democracy and honor. The objective being to regain nationalist control and sovereignty over the potential and wealth of the country and to place it at the service of the development, progress and prosperity of the country.

Camp David

On the Arab level, American imperialism is working hard to extricate Camp David from the impasse it has reached because of the stumbling and failure of the autonomy negotations thanks to the stanch resistance of the Palestinian people under the leadership of the PLO. This struggle remains both within the occupied territory and on the Lebanese scene where the men of the resistance and the Lebanese nationalist movement have recorded bloody battles of herosim and sacrifice in defense of the Lebanese national destiny and the right of the Palestinian resistance to exist, and in defense of the pan-Arab destiny as a whole. In addition, the steadfastness of Syria and the confrontation front, bolstered by loyal friends in the socialist camp, with the Soviet Union in the forefront, have played a prominent role in standing firm to frustrate the conspiracy. The imperialist-Zionist-reactionary attack against all locales of the national liberation movement in the Arab area is aimed at liquidating its accomplishments in order to regain and sanctify total domination over the potential and wealth of the Arab peoples. This policy emerges in various forms and methods, the most important of which are the daily Israeli attacks against the south of Lebanon, sometimes openly and sometimes under the cover of the fascist mini-state of Sa'd Haddad, as well as through the European initiative which was raised as a complement to Camp David, not as an alternative to it. Arab reaction in general found in this initiative a liferaft in a clear attempt to deflate and water down Arab steadfastness by creating illusions about Europe's capability to formulate a resolution independent of America which would bring the possibility of a comprehensive and just solution of the Middle East issue, with the Palestinian issue at its core.

The world has witnessed important developments embodied in the successive victories and successes of the peoples and the forces of liberation, progress, peace and socialism. As the result of this, young countries have appeared on the international stage, liberated from the system of colonial domination, such as Angola, Mozambique and Guinea-Bissau, and a number of reactionary, dictatorial regimes have collapsed, as in Afghanistan, Iran and Nicaragua, and the positions of revolutionary regimes, such as the PDRY and Ethiopia, have been strengthened. All this was preceded by the great victory won by the peoples of Indo-China when the peoples of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia ground American arrogance into the dust. On the African continent, the policy of discrimination and apartheid is witnessing violent resistance from the black majority, crowned by Zimbabwe's achievement of independence. Many reactionary and dictatorial regimes are candidates for a downfall at the hands of their peoples in Latin America, Asia and Africa. The existence of the socialist ranks, led by the Soviet Union, play an important and decisive role on the international level for strengthening peace and relaxation and warding off the threat of war and aggression, for helping peoples in their just struggle against imperialism and reaction and for their future development and social progress. The ideal example of international support which the Soviet Union provided to the people and revolution of Afghanistan constitutes a manifestation of this resolute basic policy.

In complete contrast to this, the world imperialist system, whose problems and conditions are worsening, is striving to escape its crises by intensifying its aggressive military propensity and beating the drums of war, the most prominent signs of which are the implementation of the program to produce the neutron bomb, locating medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe, the call to rearm West Germany and Japan, the improvement of NATO's military fleets, intensification of the policy of regional alliances and the construction and improvement of American military bases in several areas of the world. Following the same course is the freeze in signing the SALT II agreement and the Pentagon's announcement of a new nuclear strategy. Naturally the NATO allies find Peking to be a guaranteed ally based on the tendency toward hegemony and domination, linked with super-power chauvinism, inherent in the Chinese leadership. This policy which is a threat to the peace of the whole world is spurring all forces of peace throughout the world to intensify the struggle against imperialism and its aggressive nature. In this regard, the communist and labor movement emerges as the prime defender of the future and security of peoples.

Under this framework, the last meeting of the European communist and labor parties was held in Paris. It is regarded as an event of major importance for Europe which has experienced two destructive world wars, since American imperialism is striving to spread the climate of the cold war and sabotage the positive principles of the Helsinki security and cooperation conference. The unity of all forces which oppose international imperialism, reaction and war, and which are struggling for liberation, progress and peace occupies a preeminent place in our contemporary era because it is linked to the future of all of mankind.

Our party, which is entering its fifth year, is completely confident of the inevitable victory of the cause of the people and the homeland despite all severe difficulties because it is a just cause which is in line with the requirements of inevitable historic development.

In order to contain and humble the forces of Arab steadfastness, local reaction was set in motion to engage in acts of conspiracy and sabotage. This was demonstrated clearly in Syria as the direct confrontation line against Camp David. All this was accompanied by strange and extensive American and European political and military movements in the Gulf and the Peninsula. The American military presence is being strengthened in the Indian Ocean, the Arab Sea, the Red Sea and the Gulf to be a permanent presence through naval and air military bases and facilities in Oman, Saudi Arabia and Bahrein on the Gulf and its approaches and in Egypt and Somalia on the Red Sea. All these aggressive activities are underway with the goal of insuring the complete domination of imperialism and the continued devouring of the best parts of the area and in order to confront the popular movements there and also in order to contain the revolutionary regimes in the PDRY and Ethiopia and to implement threats and conspiracies against the Iranian revolution. In order to continue these aggressive conspiracies and movements, imperialism and its local reactionary allies in the Gulf and Saudi Arabia resorted to raising the slogans of the security of the Gulf and the security of the Red Sea which were threatened by "the Soviet communist threat emanating from Afghanistan."

Call for a Holy War

It has become clear that the trickery and demagoguery which marked the statements of Saudi officials about a holy war to liberate Jerusalem did not fool the Arab peoples and were met with scorn and derision. This self-same regime which arrested citizens who volunteered to fight beside their Arab and Palestinian brothers in the 1967 war and whose national guard opened fire on the peaceful marches which took place in a number of cities of the eastern area on Jerusalem day should be the last to talk about a holy war. The road to a holy war will not come through statements to show off but by using every means available which are numerous. The measure of earnestness in the appeal for a holy war is the use of the oil weapon, the weapon of financial balances and the mobilization of the potential of the people, demonstrating its moral intiatives by releasing public, democratic freedoms. The call for a holy war requires making a clear distinction between the friends' camp and the enemies' camp. Facts confirm that American imperialism is at the head of the enemies of the Arab nation and its just issues and that the Soviet Union is at the forefront of its natural allies and friends. Any call for a holy war that befriends and allies itself with the worst of enemies and displays enmity toward the best of friends is a specious and dubious appeal.

Given the intensification of the savage imperialist-Zionist-reactionary attack against the centers of the Arab national liberation movement and the deepening of the distinction within the framework of this movement between the levels of regimes, political forces and organizations, the al-Sadat regime is no longer just outside the centers of this movement but is savagely hostile to it. The policy of the enemies of communism and the Soviets and all forces of progress in the area and throughout the world is no longer confined to traditional local reaction.

Our party is confident that despite the difficulties and conspiracies which face the national liberation movement, it will be able to continue its progress, and to achieve victory when it unifies its forces, capabilities and energies. This progress will be achieved when it allies itself with the forces of international revolution, led by the Soviet Union and the rest of the socialist ranks.

Long live the fifth anniversary of the announcement of the founding of our communist party.

May all forces opposed to American imperialism and the abolutist regime in our country be strengthened and coalesce.

Let us intensify the struggle to release political detainees and prisoners from the jails of the Saudi establishment.

Let us intensify the struggle against American military alliances and bases in the Gulf and the Red Sea.

Long live the struggle of the Arab national liberation movement against imperialism, Zionism and reaction.

Glory and immortality for the martyrs of the intrepid November upheaval.

JOURNALISTS' CONFERENCE IS STAGE FOR IRAQI AID TO EGYPTIAN JOURNALISTS

Paris AL-MUSTAQBAL in Arabic 30 Aug 80 p 29

[Article by Yusuf Ibrahim Yazbak: "Protecting the Arab Journalist From Camp David and Its Parties"]

[Text] Last week Paris witnessed the "Conference for Solidarity with Egyptian Journalists," which was organized by the Society of Arab Journalists in France, the president of which is Wafiq al-Taybi, with the guidance and support of the "General Federation of Arab Journalists. It was convened, with Sa'd Qasim Hammudi, president of the above-mentioned federation, as its chairman, on Wednesday and Thursday, 20 and 21 August, at the Hilton Hotel. The elite from the world of journalism, law and letters from Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, the Sudan, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya participated in its activities and debates, along with more than 20 Egyptian journalists, some of the most illustrious and active journalists from the Nile Valley, whom persecution had forced to emigrate from their homeland because of their opposition to the policies of the ruling regime there--the policy of submission to the enemies of the entire Arab nation. This is the characteristic fate of all those who have successively said that this policy is traitorous.

The conference's opening session was attended by representatives from some Arab embassies, the World Organization of Journalism, the International Federation of Journalism, the French national journalists' union, and many other unions.

The high point of the conference was an announcement by its chairman, Sa'd Qasim Hammudi, president of the federation, that the Iraqi government had once again reaffirmed its promise of practical support for the circumstances and guaranties whereby the Egyptian colleagues could continue their struggle against the capitulatory conspiracy. These requirements may be summarized as follows:

1. All those Egyptian journalists whose passports have been withdrawn, not extended or not renewed, or from whom citizenship has been dropped, are granted Iraqi citizenship and passports, to ensure their right to a decent life for themselves and their families, in any place of struggle they choose.

2. The Egyptian journalists will be guaranteed the right to work in Iraqi organizations, and those journalists who are overseas will be protected from all the forms of persecution and pursuit to which they have been subjected by al-Sadat's authorities.

3. A fund will be established to support all manners of struggle by Egyptian journalists, and will be placed at the disposal of the federation, to help all those who are suffering because of their patriotic political stands.

4. The necessary means of protection will be provided for those Egyptian journalists who prefer to remain in Egypt without collaborating with the al-Sadat regime, and who are exposed to various kinds of persecution.

The conferees advised the General Federation of Arab Journalists to make efforts to get Arab capitals to adopt effective measures similar to the positive initiative taken by Iraq, to support the Egyptian journalists' struggle at home and abroad.

The conferees also requested the general federation to form an international-Arab committee to defend their Egyptian colleagues in case they are brought to trial because of their views and writings, and that the friendly journalist unions defend those colleagues who are working in their countries.

The most important reports discussed at the conference were "Egyptian Journalism In Its Struggle Against Terrorism and Imperialism," by Sa'd al-Ta'ah; "Al-Sadat, the Journalists and the Conflict of Wills," by Fathi Khalil; "Syncophantic Groups and the Egyptian Press," by Sa'd Zaghlul Fu'ad; "The Camp David Journalism Law," by 'Abd-al-Mum'im al-Ghazzali; "The Subjugation of Education and Information In Light of International Law and Human Rights," by Samir Nada; and "The Democracy of the Meatgrinder," a collection of extraordinary laws passed by al-Sadat.

It was evident that most of these reports were written with total objectivity and seriousness, and that the discussions were also conducted with total objectivity and seriousness, which proved that the conference had made progress towards its goal, on the liberal nationalist level on which the General Federation of Arab Journalists operates.

Here it should be pointed out that three main positions were observed during the discussions at the conference:

1. There was extremely violent, concentrated attack on the regime of Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat and those behind him;

2. There was a violent attack on American imperialism and the presence of the state of Israel;

3. The Egyptian colleagues associated among themselves in a brotherly manner, proving their good-naturedness, in spite of the differences in their ideologies and socio-political aims.

At the end of the conference, Chairman Sa'd Qasim Hammudi replied to a question as follows: "The Arab journalists' federation is adopting this stand in order to protect and aid every journalist persecuted by his government because of his struggle against Zionism and imperialism. We at the federation are on the side of all our Arab colleagues."

REASONS FOR POSTPONEMENT OF PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL DISCUSSED

Paris AL-'NAHAR AL'-ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 14 Sep 80 p 19

[Article by N.M.: "Palestine National Council Is Postponed until 1981; Postponement of Arab Summit Is Possible"]

[Text] Some changes have been made in the calendar of Arab Political activity to adapt it to international schedules. The Palestine National Council [PNC] session has been postponed and the Amman Arab Summit is a cadidate for postponement.

A brief news item appearing in the bottom corner of the international news section in last week's press will determine, by itself, the direction of both the Arab and Israeli courses of action in the Middle East conflict.

The news item states that the Council of Ministers of the European Common Market nations will meet on 1 and 2 December to discuss the results of the trip of Gaston Thorn, foreign minister of Luxembourg and current president of the Council of Ministers of the Common Market to Middle East capitals. During this trip, he attempted to feel the pulse of the region's leaders concerning a European initiative taking shape through the UN.

No European meeting will be held before this date to discuss the final form of the European initiative.

This means that the Arab side will decide to wait and see. On one hand, the initiative could possibly clear the way to rescinding the Camp David Accords, which are now suspended at Egypt's request. On the other hand, even if some Arab nations reject the initiative, its final contents, not the Camp David Accords, could become a point of departure for the next Arab political move.

From the Israeli viewpoint, the period before December will be an opportunity for Israel to settle the PLO problem from the political and military standpoints in Lebanon, including the south, naturally. In all probability such a decisive result would be difficult to achieve, and Western Europe will have no alternative but to recognize the PLO in one form or another. Naturally, such recognition would not result in a positive reaction on the part of the new or re-elected American administration with regard to the Palestine question, but this administration would have to use the European initiative, not the Camp David Accords, as a point of departure for its next move.

In the Arab world, the first reaction to the date of the meeting of the Common Market Council of Ministers came from the PLO, which announced postponement of the PNC session, previously set for 4 September in Damascus, until further notice. AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI had anticipated this in a previous issue under the headline: "Ceausescu Adivses Postponement of PNC and Arab Summit Meetings."

This does not mean that awaiting the European initiative is the only reason for postponing the PNC meeting. However, it is one of the reasons, according to a statement from a source in the Palestinian leadership.

This source defines the reasons for the postponement as follows:

First: Convening the PNC requires more than two weeks of preparation, working sessions and administrative actions. The PLO leadership does not believe that it is possible to waste this much time while Israel is undertaking daily aggression against the south [of Lebanon], not to mention the internal clashes [between Lebanese factions].

However, the Democratic Front [for the Liberation of Palestine - DFLP] and the Popular Front [for the Liberation of Palestine - PFLP] do not see a positive development in postponing the PNC session. Rather, they believe that it is an attempt to finesse certain policies within the PLO without obtaining unanimous approval. Parties close to Hayef Hawatmah, Secretary-General of the DFLP, believe that holding the PNC meeting would solidify the Palestinian situation in south Lebanon, not the reverse.

Second: The Arab situation and the disputes which erupt every day do not permit convening the PNC without transposing these disputes into the PNC. This would not serve unity of the Palestinian position. Another reason for postponement is perhaps to wait for an Arab situation dominated by less tension and a minimal measure of solidarity. Besides, relations of the Palestinian leadership, or most of it, with certain Arab regimes, including Syria, are tense. This tension would inevitably spread into the PNC.

Third: In any event, convening the PNC would not facilitate the job of the Western European nations in trying to come up with a political settlement for the Middle East question. Rather, it might once again result in advance rejection of the European effort. If it is undersirable to announce PLO approval of this European effort, it is also undesirable to announce an advance rejection of it. Otherwise, the situation of the Palestinian leadership would become like the situation of "the young girl who rejects a man who has not asked to marry her."

Furthermore, the thrust of the European initiative may not produce support for the PLO. However, it would break the international political deadlock in the matter of settling the Middle East crisis outside the framework of Camp David.

Some Palestinian leaders see the European move as a supplement to the Camp David Accords. But others, who hold decision-making positions, believe that the European initiative may provide opportunity for Palestinian action, whereas no such opportunity exists under current conditions.

With regard to the Arab world in general, the situation is no better than it is with the Palestinians. Therefore, postponement of the Arab Summit conference, which had been scheduled for 4 November, is quite possible."

'ARAFAT EXPRESSES OPTIMISM IN PLO STRUGGLE

Santiago HOY in Spanish 24-30 Sep 80 pp 57-60

[Report on interview with PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat by HOY correspondent Maria Paz del Rio, in Beirut, date not indicated]

[Text] Beirut--At 0115 hours, the streets are deserted, and only a few night owls are still out in a Beirut which is still startled and shaken every so often by gunshots. The guards are alert at their posts, and the tense commotion of day has been replaced by the tense calm of night.

In the offices of Yasir Arafat, leader of the PLO, the stir has not ceased--according to one of the aides, "It is very early"--nor has the vigilance relaxed. Armed guards watch the building's entrance and do a friendly but nonetheless careful search of persons, briefcases, tape recorders, and cameras. The Palestinian leader is in a military meeting "because of recent events," and the interview with HOY, set for midnight, has been delayed.

Israeli attacks on Palestinian bases in southern Lebanon had increased in recent days, and for the first time Syrian Air Force planes had pursued the Jewish teams into Lebanese territory. According to PLO spokesmen, Israel is trying to destroy the bases before the American presidential elections, using Jewish votes as a brake against any pressure Jimmy Carter might want to exert.

Therefore, the Palestinians expect a new attack "at any moment" and are ready. In Arafat's office, everyone has gun in hand, and the quiet jokes and laughter do not diminish the sense of alertness.

Mythical Image

Finally Arafat receives HOY in his large and orderly office, which has a big meeting table, air conditioning, walls covered with books and photographs--including that of the Ayatollah Khomeyni--and flags.

Impeccably dressed in khaki, with his characteristic black and white keffiyan and a pistol in his belt, he walks with quick steps, shakes hands warmly, and apologizes for the delay. Fifty-one years old, not very tall, and rather plump, with a grizzled beard and hoarse voice, Arafat perfectly fits the almost mythical image that has developed during the years of struggle.

He is--and he stresses it--president of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization, commander in chief of the joint Palestinian-Lebanese forces (basically, the National Lebanese Movement, a leftist coalition that is fighting the Christian-rightists). To Palestinians he is "the president" of whom they speak with almost reverential respect. But he is also "Abu 'Ammar", whom everyone loves and is willing to follow unhesitatingly.

With this background and his reputation as a fighter, it is surprising to see him take pains with operating a small tape recorder. He too wants to record the interview and has his own recorder, but he does not use it much, so he and an aide spend long minutes pushing buttons until they are finally sure the machine is working. And he explains with a smile, "I don't use it much here in my office." He speaks a very clear English but sometimes turns to his aides in Arabic to find just the right expression.

Annoyance With the West

He is warm and smiling in the talk about himself, but when he is speaking about his cause, his tone hardens, and his fist hits the table to underscore his arguments. What bothers him the most is what he calls "the surrender of the western press to Zionist blackmail." According to him, the western media only expresses the Israeli point of view, "the aggression angle, in spite of the fact that we are the victims" and that "the correspondents are witnesses to what is happening."

By way of example, he asked HOY, "Why don't you in Chile open a PLO office? Why do only the socialist countries give their people all the information about our rights?" To illustrate his position, he rises and goes to find a copy of TIME that is on his desk. He turns the pages and shows the article--with paragraphs underlined in red pencil--about the confrontations in the southern part of Lebanon and complains, "This is the whole report; in spite of the fact that there was a big important battle, they do not even give the name of the place, and that Begin was on one side, and I was on the other." (As acting minister of defense, Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin was at the front supervising operations.)

In his opinion, the present situation in the Middle East is an Israeli escalation in all aspects:

"It is what is going on in southern Lebanon, the air raids, the massive concentrations of troops in northern Palestine and in one of the occupied Lebanese areas between Marj 'Uyun and Matullah (he is speaking of Mayor Haddad's 'enclave,' HOY 165). We must remember the last big operation, in Beaufort's castle. The Israelis sent two hand-picked brigades, including paratroopers, to occupy the area of Nabatiyah, 'Arnun, and Beaufort. And despite all their deployment, the support of helicopters, planes, heavy artillery, and rockets, they failed, thanks to the courage and decision of our fighters, who are fighting alone, with their flesh and determination, and they taught them a good lesson.

"Despite statements by Israeli military men and political leaders, they are threatening the Palestinians; they are threatening the Lebanese; they are threatening the Syrians.

"In addition, our people, within our occupied territories, are facing an escalation of repression and terrorism. We remember the expulsion of three of our leaders and the assassination attempt on three of our mayors by those terrorists, who are supported and protected by Begin himself. We must remember the fantastic laws, the inhuman laws against Palestinians living in the occupied territories. For example, they are imposing punishment for ideas and opinions. All a Palestinian child has to do is say he is with the PLO, sing a Palestinian song, or have a Palestinian flag, and he is arrested and punished. This did not happen even under the Nazis, this is the first time it has ever happened in the world.

"Another law concerns universities. All the universities must be under Israeli military administration and leadership. They are against human beings, against science, against beliefs. This is the escalation we are facing."

[Question] And where does this escalation lead?

[Answer] To war.

[Question] Another war in the Middle East:

[Answer] Yes, indeed. We must recall what happened a few days ago between the Syrian Air Force and the Israeli Air Force.

[Question] Do you believe that the Arab countries will go to war without Egypt?

[Answer] Why not? We have what we need. We Palestinians are fighting alone now. And we will fight with other Arab countries, because we have no other choice. What are they offering? Genocide, oppression, terrorism. Accepting those choices means living like slaves. We absolutely will not accept living like slaves. We will resist and the Palestinian people living under occupation will resist oppression.

Two Revolutions

According to Arafat, resistance means using all means: political, diplomatic, propaganda, information, and education. To him, the war "is a part of the political struggle; it is a political measure, but more forceful."

And he explains: "We Palestinians have to build major revolutions within the spirit of our tragedy. After 1947, when our tragedy began, we started our first revolution: the educational revolution. And through it we now have the highest literacy rate in the region, including the Israelis, a fact of which we are proud. Because we consider our struggle, our confrontation, a war against our civilization, education is very important.

"The second revolution is resistance, armed struggle. Diplomacy is part of the struggle."

Nevertheless, there are factors in diplomacy that do not interest the PLO--the talks on Palestinian autonomy between the United States, Egypt, and Israel, for example. Although many sectors, from the UN secretary general to the European Community, have stated the necessity of PLO participation in the talks, Arafat rejects the idea.

He says: "Autonomy? No! We definitely do not intend to participate in those talks. What is this autonomy? It is a new kind of slavery for my people, and we reject this new slavery. We reject the whole Camp David conspiracy, including this autonomy. It isn't even autonomy. They are only offering self-administration, and within that self-administration, they (the Israelis) must control even the water sources, even the water sources! Give me one example in the whole world where the inhabitants of a city cannot control the water they drink. Who can accept this?

"They view us as Indians. The Yankees pushed the Indians away from the rivers, away from the water sources, into the desert. This is what they envision doing to us. But we are not the Indians. We are here; this land is our land; it is our fathers' land, our grandfathers', and it will go on being, not just our children's, but our grandchildren's land. This is the Palestinian people's determination. We will not be the Indians."

Neither Carter Nor Reagan

In other respects, his feeling toward "Yankees" has not improved much. Basically, this is because "what we are suffering is part of the Camp David agreement, which was planned by the American government and has been implemented by Israel and Sadat. And they persist in not recognizing any Palestinian rights, including the right to return to our land, the right to self-determination, and the right to establish our independent state on our own land."

According to the Palestinian leader, what is happening in southern Lebanon results from the United States' "green light" [to the Israelis], including the use of American weapons, which is expressly forbidden in the sales contract. The Israelis explain that it is "self-defense."

Arafat feels "the genocide our people are suffering is taking place because of U.S. policy." Therefore, in his opinion, it will make no difference, if Ronald Reagan becomes the U.S. president.

"In superpowers like the United States, the presidency and the president's decisions are very important, but they are no more than 25 percent of the whole decision. The ones who make policy are not only the president and his advisors, but also the entire establishment; it is a continuing policy."

Arafat recognizes a slight change in the attitude of the press and the American public. "The contributor begins to ask himself, 'Why are we killing Palestinians, Lebanese, and Arabs with American weapons used by Israelis?'" However, he is not concerned about the reaction of that public in the case of another war.

"You know, I am not seeking war. The Israelis are preparing for war, not me. It is not my choice. We are resisting occupation, because we have no other choice. If you were in my place, you would do the same. We are human beings, and we want to live like human beings on our own free land."

A Time Bomb

An important part of that resistance is the attitude of Palestinians living in territories occupied by Israel. Arafat calls them "our time bomb," because "after the Camp David conspiracy, they believed our people would accept that conspiracy.

But our people were a time bomb that blew up in the face of that conspiracy. We put our confidence in those people, because we know beside whom we are fighting. We are fighting beside our people; we have the will and determination, and with that will and determination, we shall win the victory sooner or later."

The victory is the creation of an independent, secular, and democratic state that--according to the latest resolution by the Palestinian National Council [CNP], the parliament, the supreme body of the PLO--it will be declared in every part of Palestine that Israel must withdraw, or it will be liberated. Whether that is enough, or whether it will be the basis for continuing the struggle until all Palestine is "liberated", will depend, says Arafat, on the CNP, "because we respect our democracy, and what the CNP decides is what we shall do."

Democracy is very important to the Palestinian leader. If he is asked about the political structure of that independent state, he stresses that, "We shall respect our democracy; we shall give all Palestinians complete freedom to choose the kind of government they want. We are proud of our democracy, and what the majority decides will be what we will do. I shall not be the one who decides."

And he stresses, "You have to think what a democracy means in the revolution. A democracy is not easy in a jungle of weapons, but it is a new experiment."

There are those who have expressed doubt that a Palestinian state would be able--physically and economically--to receive all the refugees.

Arafat is precise: "Definitely, every Palestinian will have the opportunity to return to his country, his state. We cannot prevent anyone from coming. That Polish terrorist named Begin has the right to return to Jerusalem, and I, who am from Jerusalem, cannot return to Jerusalem?"

The voice rises, and the hand again pounds the table. But the smile appears again when one tries to find out something about Arafat the man. "No personal questions," he says, tearing himself away to go, at 0200 hours, to another military meeting (apparently 3 or 4 hours of sleep are enough for him). And he turns back to add somewhat sarcastically, "I am not a monster; I am a human being, as you can see." What does he like; what is important to him? "Only fighting for my people's salvation."

AFGHAN GOVERNMENT RESTRICTS PASSPORTS, SALE OF HOMES

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 4 Sep 80 pp 1, 6

[Article: "Fierce Bombing by Russians in Herat; Widespread Fighting; Restrictions on Passports, Sale of Property"]

[Text] New Delhi, 3 Sep (PPI/Reuter APA)--There is widespread fighting between the Mujahidin and the Russian army. According to some Western diplomatic sources, Russian planes fiercely bombed the city of Herat, and there is heavy fighting in Kandahar, a southern province. Since mid-August, the Kabul-Jalalabad road was opened only a few times. It was partially destroyed by the Mujahidin toward the end of August.

It is calm in Kabul, but reports of officers of the ruling People's Democratic Party being killed have been received. In Wardak, a province west of Kabul, the Mujahidin planted mines on a road just before a Russian army convoy was to pass over it.

According to some diplomatic sources, there was heavy traffic of Russian planes at Kabul airport on 29 and 30 August. The planes were transporting army units. The activities of Helicopter Gunships are increasing around Kabul. Reports of battle in (Panjsheer) valley, north-east of Kabul, have been received.

It is learned that many officials in Kabul's foreign ministry have either been fired or transferred to other countries. Once again, the government is denying passports to citizens who want to leave the country. Many Afghans who wanted to leave the country were detained at Kabul Airport. According to another report, no sale or purchase of property is allowed without the advance approval of the secret police. This is to prevent the sale of homes by homeowners before leaving the country.

Meanwhile, a message of President Karmal was published today. According to it, Afghanistan expects to get unprecedented cooperation from Russia after peace has been restored. This message has been sent to Brezhnev and Kosygin, president and prime minister of Russia respectively.

AFGHANISTAN REPORTEDLY REORGANIZED INTO SEVEN MILITARY DISTRICTS

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 3 Sep 80 pp 1, 12

[Article: "Russian Generals Plan to Crush Afghan Mujahidin; Government Army Divided Among Seven Districts; Administrator of Each to Be a Member of Party Presidium; 1,000 Commandos and Russian General to Assist Each District; 10-fold Increase in Salaries of Soldiers"]

[Text] New Delhi, 2 Sep (APP/Reuter)--Russian advisers and consultants are launching a large scale plan to crush the desire for freedom of the Mujahidin. The basic strategy of this plan is to get one tribe to fight another. A delegation of high ranking officers of the Russian army arrived in Kabul last month to put this plan into operation.

After consultation with the Karmal government, it was decided to divide the country into seven military districts. According to some informed sources, a volunteer army was started. A soldier of this army is paid 7,000 Afghan rupees ($175). This sum is 10 times more than the amount paid to a regular soldier. The administrator of each district will be a member of the central committee or presidium of the People's Democratic Party. Each of these administrators will be assisted by one Russian general and 1,000 commandos, in addition to his regular forces. Resources are being used on a large scale to implement this new plan.

According to some informed sources, the Russians and their puppet Karmal government are using tribes against each other. According to this plan, a unit composed of Paktra tribesmen was sent to Parwan and Badkhshan provinces to infiltrate and destroy the Mujahidin of north and northeast Afghanistan.

As a result of the new military reorganization, the Kabul area has come under the control of Mohammad Aslam Watanjar, the minister of communications. The new volunteer militia uses regular uniforms and is equipped with modern weapons. This militia has been in operation for over a month. Its major duty is to scare the people. It is reported that its mercenaries are charged with killing the Mujahidin, but they also kill innocent citizens.

An Afghan politician who is presently in India said that spies of the Karmal government are trying to get the Mujahidin to fight among themselves. The spies spread rumors about some Mujahidin groups being communists rather than Muslims. Thus, the people in power are using the traditional method of divide and rule.

BRIEFS

RUSSIA TRIES ENLISTING TRIBESMEN--Russia is offering large bribes to Afghan tribesmen to join a volunteer army. This volunteer army is being recruited to fight the Mujahidin, using Mujahidin tactics, and divide the Afghan people into two camps fighting each other. Afghan tribesmen, especially young men, are being offered top salaries for joining this army. According to the Mujahidin, Russia has spent over $200,000 so far. KABUL SEEMINGLY NORMAL--New Delhi, 4 Sep--Incidents involving gunfire or bombings happen almost every other night in Kabul. Visitors to this city are amazed that the 300,000 inhabitants of this city, many of them Europeans, do not seem to pay attention to them. From the hills surrounding Kabul, one can hear the echo of fighting in the city, but one cannot guess the actual place of the fighting. Because of strict government censorship, the newspapers do not publish anything on gunfire, bombings, explosions, their causes or who died in them. Because of the strict curfew at night, no one except the Russians and their collaborators know what exactly is happening. Travelers arriving from Kabul report that the seemingly normal situation in Kabul is a strange phenomenon. There are 48 West German citizens in the city. Among them are officials of the embassy, the staff of a German-Afghan School, representatives of several companies, and directors of the (Goethe) Institute. The West German colony includes 10 women and 6 children. [Text] [Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 5 Sep 80 pp 3, 10] 7997

MAJOR CONTRACTOR GIVES VIEWS ON MARKET CONTROL, FOOD SUPPLY

Cairo ROSE AL-YUSUF in Arabic 22 Sep 80 pp 24-28

[Interview with 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman, major contractor and close associate of President Sadat, by Mamdule Mihran]

/Text/ The beginning was a telephone call, in which I told Eng 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman "You have talked a lot to me about providing the people with food, especially meat, whose shortage you promised to end through the party's Popular Development Committee. The result was that slaughter was prohibited for a month and people raced all over one another for the modest quantities of fish and poultry which began to be offered to them."

He said, "This is not a fit subject for a passing phone conversation. What you are saying needs an explanation, so that we can put the facts in their place. I will be waiting for you after midnight when I will be fully at your disposal after completing my work program of the day."

I said, "Agreed." I went at the specified time and a heated discussion took place, in some of which Eng Mahmud 'Uthman and his wife Jihan al-Sadat took part. The conversation extended late into the night. In the course of it Eng 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman declared a group of important items of news.

The Question: Where to?

I began the conversation by saying "Where is the meat shortage going, after all the efforts that have been made?"

He said, laughing, "Meat is not a problem in Egypt. The matter requires more production and patience for a while, nothing more. Our people can produce and bear up. In general, whatever the sufferings of our people, they cannot have reached, and will never be able to reach, what I saw with my own eyes in Germany, after its defeat, when you would go down the street smoking a cigarette and two people would go behind you, each of them waiting to get a piece of it to satisfy his smoking habit. That was the point the situation in Germany reached. You certainly do not need me to explain to you what the situation there is now and the extent of prosperity it has reached. They got there only through production and patience."

I said, "We have heard a great deal about your projects, which you are embracing within the National Party's Popular Development Committee, which has given the people broad hope of a relaxation in the food shortage, especially the meat shortage. Nonetheless the problem seems to be without a solution!"

He said, "If we want to debate let objectivity be our guide. Yes, there are many projects for self-sufficiency in food, especially meat of various kinds. Numerous companies are now being established and formed in this realm. There are many projects which we are on the road to taking steps to implement. However, let me ask you if these projects can be established overnight. Are these projects, as soon as they are announced, strong enough so their production is able to start? A single company when formed requires not less than 2 years' time to produce, under a skilled businessman. However, I previously succeeded in al-Isma'iliyah, then in the Engineers' Union, prior to the National Party's Popular Development Committee, in forming dozens of companies involved in self-sufficiency in food. It takes no more than 3 months to form one, when we start to establish a company, but for us to put it on the production lines we need at least 3 more months, as far as companies with rapid production go; with some companies it takes a year."

He filled that out by saying, "Mamdouh, I don't possess Solomon's ring. I am just a person who gives what he can and travels on the road to carry out his projects, which will yield up production sooner or later, and neither you nor anyone else should imagine that it is wise for any project to begin overnight. What is important, rather, is that we make the right beginning, and continue, and that is what I and the sincere men who are with me are doing. However, in 1981 dozens of these projects will yield production and after that I am prepared to be held to account not by you but by the people, who will know the value of these projects when their production reaches them."

I said, "We must wait."

He said, "No, we must work and join forces. The party Committee on Popular Development is bearing the responsibility for self-sufficiency in food on its shoulders and God willing will succeed in its task. The committee is working with a spirit which I wish every Egyptian citizen could closely observe in order to realize what we are doing; if he did he would be confident that the current shortage is transitory and that production will really inundate the market soon, and not with words, God willing."

I said, "Do you understand where the problem lies? And where the solution to it will start?"

He said, "The problem in Egypt is not one of meat, it is one of organization. As an example, do you know that every year Egypt slaughters 900,000 calves and that the weight of each does not exceed 70 kilograms? Do you know that half of this number is females which we must not slaughter but must raise so that they may become fertile and we can increase the resource? What is happening with female calves is a national crime against animal resources in Egypt and will lead not just to high prices but also to a decline in the sources of meat.

"If there is some organization and we exempt half this figure from slaughter for example as a beginning for a period of 1 year that will mean that I will increase the meat supply by 50,000 tons. If we exempt that for 2 years the increase will be 100,000 tons--that is, 1 billion kilograms of meat /sic/, which will be provided by one method, by not slaughtering half the calves we slaughter every year. If we gradually succeed in not slaughtering them all, the quantity will reach 200,000 tons, or 2 billion kilograms of meat /sic/, which by itself will be able to create tremendous sales in the meat market. But unfortunately we have not done that, animal resources are lost, and then we scream about the meat shortage.

"The shortage we have realized in livestock resources was not created overnight; it escalated for the reason I gave you and therefore solving it will require solutions which will subject livestock resources to sound use."

And Fodder?

I said, "But the problem is in providing the necessary fodder for raising these calves, as you say."

He said, "There are two kinds of fodder. There is green fodder, which is an easy matter since we grow it, especially in the new lands, and concentrated fodder, for which we must construct factories. We have actually started to build two big fodder plants to produce millions of tons; for production to start in either will require no less than 2 years from the date on which construction of the project starts. However, does that mean that I should wait until these factories start producing? Not at all. The alternative exists, and that is imports. We must import large amounts. I do not want to provide fodder alone, I will strive to provide it at the docks for those who want it and enable them to obtain it easily and at appropriate prices."

I said, "Is that possible?"

He said, "Very much so, and why not? I had previous experience when I was appointed minister of housing and reconstruction, a shortage of building materials was sweeping the country, there was a black market everywhere, and exploitation of the public was at its most intense. What did I do? I did not do more than import tremendous quantities of all the necessary raw materials and succeed in supplying them to everyone who asked for them in any quantity at any time. The black market was suppressed at once, spontaneously. In fact, what happened was more than that. Merchants, owing to the pileup of goods in their possession, because of their large quantities, demanded that the amounts allotted to them be reduced. I challenge anyone to say that the market experienced any shortage of any kind in the period when I was in charge of the Ministry of Housing and Reconstruction."

I said, "Will that experience apply in the area of food?"

He said, "Yes, we will do that at the start and all foodstuffs, foremost among them meat, will be supplied to any citizen in any volume at any time. However, here the situation is different: in providing food, I do not want to rely primarily on imports but on production, so that I can realize self-sufficiency in my requirements. My concentration in imports will be on fodder, which the fattening process requires, and also on imports of factory equipment, materials I will process and mechanical slaughterhouses."

I said, "But foodstuff, especially meat, need preservation. Do you have storehouses suitable for them when they are imported?"

He said, "That is a very vital point and therefore in order to be able to store large quantities of meat that I can supply for consumption at the appropriate time in the appropriate quantities I will need a cooling capacity of not less than 400,000 tons in the form of refrigerators, in the form of one refrigerator per governorate. Do you know that the storage capacity of our refrigerators now does not exceed 70,000 tons!"

And Poultry?

I asked, "Does poultry enjoy a share in this concern?"

He said, "Naturally poultry resources represent a basic important source of protein and therefore in just 1 year I will double the quantities the Ministry of Agriculture farms produce to 150 million hens, in place of 75 million. Fish will enjoy a similar concern. While we are trying to provide animal meat in the necessary amounts, we are also striving to increase poultry and fish output so they may occupy a large portion of the consumption map, reducing the pressure on meat. This will be reflected in the setting of their prices."

I said, "On whom will you depend in implementing your new projects to provide food, principally meat? The subject requires awareness."

He said, "I will rely on my children the graduates of all the university faculties and technical schools."

I said, "Who will assume the chairmanship of the Popular Development Committees in the governorates, which will be in charge of implementing this idea in each governorate?"

He said, "The governors. Each governor is the head of the Popular Development Committee in his governorate."

I said, "And where do you get the necessary financing?"

He said, "From the banks. President al-Sadat has met with bank men for this purpose specifically, I mean, for the purpose of having the banks finance projects for self-sufficiency in food. Here all the problems are solved and financing will no longer be an obstacle in the way of projects for self-sufficiency in food which will be determined by the Popular Development Committee centrally or in the governorates. We will then assume charge of the process of studying and preparing the steps to carry them out, and really carry them out, through financing by the banks, which they will obtain. Then I will hand them over to the graduates, where they are, to take possession of them in stages and start managing them. I, as a committee of popular development, will take charge of supervision, problem-solving, and overcoming the obstacles in the way, so that the process may proceed on its proper path."

I said, "How will activity within the committee be organized so that these specialized people will be able to make their contribution?"

He said, "A council of experts will immediately be formed in the Popular Development Committee, under my chairmanship at the outset; then, after that we will look for someone to chair it who will possess the specifications the process requires. This council will supervise a number of branches, for instance a branch for livestock, a branch for poultry, a branch for fish, a branch for eggs, a branch for fodder, and others. Through these branches the council will take charge of studying the entire food situation in the context of the republic, area by area, from Alexandria to Aswan, having real figures at its disposal on strong points and weak points in every spot so that we will strive to remedy them as soon as they appear. This council's ties with all growers in every area will be strong and it will take charge of collecting their problems from every standpoint then solving them without obliging the growers to be concerned about losing time in this regard, so that they can save their time for the productive process. It will provide relevant production accessories in a manner whereby they will reach them as cheaply, easily and quickly as possible. Then, in another area, it will purchase the grower's output from the grower without exploiting the circumstances of the market he is involved with, at a feasible price which will encourage the grower to continue, instead of stopping."

"Here I will pause briefly."

I said, "What about?"

He said, "One of the causes of the meat shortage is speculation by merchants against producers. They plotted against them, buying their output at less than its real cost, and this frustrated these growers from continuing in this field and was reflected in the volumes supplied and their prices."

I said, "Have we forgotten the problem of the contracts?"

He said, "This in its turn is a big problem, but it has ended.

"Do you know what happened?"

"This governor would contract with a grower to give him the fodder necessary to fatten four calves, for example, provided that he buy two from him at a price of 80 piasters per kilogram live, then leave him the other two calves to sell at the price he saw fit. Here we find that the grower lost 40 piasters per kilogram at least for the calves he sold to the governorate. Therefore he would try to make up for that by raising the price of the calves he sold on the free market, which resulted in a rise in the price per kilogram of meat. This was on the one hand. On the other, do you know why 60,000 tons of fodder remain in the warehouses in the Ministry of Agriculture? The issue turned from one of raising and fattening livestock to trafficking in fodder. When a person obtained 4 qantars of fodder at 30 pounds per qantar per head, he preferred not to raise the animal but would sell the amount on the black market at 100 pounds per kantar--that is, he would pay 120 pounds and sell at 400, earning 280. Trafficking in fodder became more lucrative than raising livestock. Gradually the number of growers dropped when the fodder moved into the hands of weak-spirited persons who used it for trafficking rather than for growing. For that reason the president's decree cancelling the contracts at once was wise."

Eng 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman said, "There must not be two prices for fodder, an official price and a black market price. Rather, we must provide the necessary quantities and unify the price so that fodder can emerge from the dominance of the black market."

I said, "How can that happen when our output does not exceed 1.25 million qantars and we need 4 million qantars?"

He said, "Our factories, which we are building, will produce that, but until this happens I must import and provide fodder in tremendous volumes satisfying fattening consumption requirements."

Pricing--Now

I said, "But the meat shortage will not ease overnight. Until these solutions produce results, what will the consumer do in the face of the tyranny of the butchers' empire?"

He said, "Tentative compulsory pricing of meat is necessary now even if the pricing is mobile and can be amended every 3 months, for example, by increases or decreases according to the condition of the market--provided that this pricing take into consideration that the grower or merchant is not defrauded and the consumer is not exploited."

I said, "And if the merchants hide the meat?"

He said, "We have our arrangements. There are tremendous amounts of meat, both that available from the prohibition on slaughtering this month, the amount in storage to cover the 'Id al-Adha requirements, the amounts to be supplied next month and the other additional amounts which have been provided as a reserve for this matter. Then meat is not a commodity which can be locked up and stored and even if it is for a month, it cannot be for 2 months." He then laughed, saying, "Then if the merchants retrench, the retrenchment will result in savings in the livestock resources we want to develop, and that will help increase their quantities in the future in a manner which will make their prices appropriate. As far as the government goes, it is fully prepared to face the situation with all the means it has to prevent the exploitation of the people and provide the citizens' needs."

I said, "But is the subject of preventing the slaughter of veal calves just a view presented to growers, or are there measures to carry this out?"

He said, "Of course there are measures. They will be among the tasks of the council which will be formed within the Popular Development Committee to follow up on this matter in all governorates. For example, in a governorate like al-Qalyubiyah, the popular development committee will be established under the auspices of a number of villages and peasants who have buffaloes or pregnant cows. It will then get in contact with these peasants to determine if a calf is to be raised and it will help them in raising it. If it is to be sold we will buy it from him for more than the merchant's price and will keep it to raise it.

"It is not just this that is important. This council is appointed to be the thermometer of the supply situation, especially the meat supply situation, in terms of capacity of refrigerators, the number of calves, the poultry pens or whatnot, so that the matter can proceed through a proper fixed system which ultimately will be able to achieve balance in the equation, that is, preserving and developing livestock resources, encouraging growers, providing their requirements, storing meat, supplying it to the public in the necessary amounts, covering the weak points and increasing the distribution outlets."

I said, "On the subject of increasing distribution outlets, how far have the efforts of the National Company for Self-Sufficiency in Food gone?"

He said, "They are moving full speed ahead. We are now intending to carry out a project to provide 50 sales outlets for the company every month, and we will proceed at these rates, which we will try to increase, until the company is able to perform the role expected of it. This is in addition to popular meal counters which we will expand and deed over to our sons the graduates. I will develop the experiment so that our children can take over such food projects as Wimpey's, instead of foreigners."

I said, "Do you believe there is a meat shortage in your home, as there is in the homes of people generally?"

Here Mrs Jihna al-Sadat Jr took charge of responding, looking at Eng 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman and saying, "Blessings to 'Chief Engineer Ahmad,' who provides us with all our requirements so we don't buy from the market." Eng Mahmoud 'Uthman broke in jokingly, stating "Come on, he exploits us." We all laughed, and at this point Eng 'Uthman Ahmad 'Uthman broke in saying, "Really we don't buy chickens or eggs or meat--my son Ahmad raises about 75 egg-laying hens and cooking chicken, he raises livestock especially sheep, and his output covers all the requirements of his brothers, his cousins and the family. In fact he also raises pigeons and goes to al-Isma'iliyah, where he fishes, and his catch is enough for all of us. He likes this activity, which he pursues at home."

I said, "Why don't you allow him to establish a big project?"

He said, "He still is a student in the Faculty of Engineering. Here I am not just relating the story of my son Ahmad, I am asking every family in Egypt, especially in the rural areas, to carry out this type of small project, which will suffice for a family's consumption requirements. Providing food is easy but we must not hand our affairs over to the government. We must begin with ourselves lest we create problems then revolve around them even if there basically is no problem."

I said, "There isn't time, we have approached the dawn prayer, people are all going off," and I went home to transcribe the conversation which took place at the meeting.

ARMY OF OPPRESSED GETS MOBILIZATION TRAINING

[Article: "Special to SOBH-E AZADEGAN: Illustrated Report on the National Mobilization Camp for the Oppressed"]

[Text] Mashhad--Sabri Tabatab'i, SOBH-E AZADEGAN reporter. During the week of establishment of the big national mobilization camp for the oppressed in Baghrud of Neyshabur, we had an opportunity to discuss various questions concerning the camp with its overseer, Colonel Kuchekzadeh, acting commander of the 77th Army of Khorasan and supervisor of the mobilization camp for the oppressed of Baghrud of Neyshabur.

The photos accompanying the interview on this page of the mobilization staff's various military training exercises were especially prepared for SOBH-E AZADEGAN. [photos not reproduced]

Colonel Kuchekzadeh began by saying: I want to tell you that the mobilization camp for the oppressed that has been established in Baghrud for the sake of strengthening and unity, in view of the current circumstances in which every brother and sister is involved, meaning the imperialist plots of the West and the East and their handpicked agents in our midst, can be a gathering that shows cohesiveness, a fist in the mouth of imperialism, whether Eastern or Western.

Question: Can you explain a little about how revolutionary and government groups are working with camp officials?

Answer: You are certainly aware that this camp was erected with great haste. It must be sincerely stated, however, that all groups helped us with the erection of this camp as much as they could and their help was truly valuable. Everyone joined hands to construct a camp to accomodate around 10 thousand people (considering the allotted time, which was one week) and, praise God, we completed this important task.

Question: Could you tell us the criteria for the selection of camp members and who the people were who were chosen from the municipalities and provinces and came here?

Answer: Selection is mostly subject to the approval of the mobilization brothers. Their first priority is piety, the second priority is order and discipline and and they make their selections based on the same criteria as that used for the brothers. Of course it is hoped that the problems and difficulties which will naturally arise in this camp, which is experimental, can be put aside in future camps, with the help of God, and that we will choose forces who will have greater resistance to worldly forces. We have thus limited some of them to a certain extent, especially since we now have brothers who are 50 years old and older, but these are a minority. We have set the age at between 20 and 30 except for a limited group that has come between the ages of 40 and 50.

Question: Could you please explain about camp expenses, when they are paid, from what sources, and whether brothers who are now camp members pay their own expenses or whether the camp assumes this responsibility?

Answer: You are certainly aware that the mobilization has no budget. This is why it was said that the camp was formed with the help of groups, organizations, companies, and other brothers. This assistance, praise God, has been given, and it is through that assistance that the mobilization was organized and secured. The brothers who have come have received absolutely nothing in this connection from them.

Question: Will there be some sequel to the camp after its completion, since these people have directly received training which gives them an advantage over other mobilization brothers?

Answer: One of the areas I discussed was exactly this that this gathering is a fist in the mouth to both East and West. If you are aware, we announced yesterday in the dining hall that our brothers should help other brothers in the West of the country. They should give their names to province supervisors so that later we can pass their style of leadership on to the Western areas.

Question: What kind of weapons training are the brothers who are here now receiving, and what kind of martial arts are they learning?

Answer: Weapons are limited here. The heavy weapons we have are mortars. The small arms are the usual ones with which mobilization brothers are equipped. At the same time, however, we are teaching them destruction techniques and how to go up and down moutains and cross valleys. We also have a program for teaching marching techniques and how to carry out warfare while enroute. We were able to carry out these programs as training exercises with military brothers. At the same time we have been able to secure indoctrination training for camp participants through speeches and calls from our committed and crusading brothers.

Question: What are the daily training hours, and what is the duration of the camp?

Answer: The daily training schedule was set and announced at the first meeting of the camp's opening. According to this program, daily activities begin around 5 am, continuing with specialized training programs until 12:30. This training begins with the fulfillment of religious obligations, until after early morning, then there is military training until 12:30, when the brothers come and pray together. Then they eat lunch together and rest from 1530 to 1800 hours. At 1800 hours there is a meal and a religious talk. A program is also planned for after dinner. These programs are related to ideological questions and revolutionary films such as "Algeria" are shown to the brothers.

Question: What was the reason for establishing the camp in Baghrud of Neyshabur?

Answer: The original plan was to set it up in the north in Ramsar, but afterwards when the matter had been studied we learned that the Ministry of Education and Training had previously designated this spot and the camp was established here.

Question: Could you describe the camp's meal planning, and tell us whether or not you test camp members after the necessary training, or give them cards that show they have had this course?

Answer: Concerning the camp's food, as I have said, the mobilization must be so organized that it can feed itself, like a guerrilla, meaning it cannot rely on prepared, provided food. You can say that we have been able, so far as possible, to prepare some food for our brothers, but the basis of guerrilla activity is that he can manage himself and be self sufficient. He must be able to satisfy his needs if he goes into the mountains and he must have this preparedness. This concept of his criteria for activity is his provender.

Question: What organization helped you obtain the camp site? Do only brothers receive training here, or do sisters also receive the required training in another location in collaboration with you?

Answer: These grounds are managed by the Boy Scouts organization. Those brothers were contacted, and they truly helped us, while they turned this site over to us and helped us with other work related to the camp. Sisters do not take part in this camp. Since this was an experimental camp we did not allow sisters to participate, because it was a trial run. If possible we must get a consensus on them. Naturally sisters must be prepared for mobilization, prepared for jihad, both ideologically and militarily.

Question: Could you talk about the number of instructors, the method of their selection or the obstacles that prevent your rapid advancement?

Answer: We have around 190 military training instructors. Of course there are always shortages. It would be erroneous to state otherwise, and these shortages must be laid aside. We must identify the problems in our work so that we can truly train our brothers better in future camps, and eliminate the shortages and problems of this camp once we have become aware of them.

Question: In the course of setting up the camp, wasn't there obstructionism from beginning to end on the part of certain groups and organizations who placed obstacles in your path? If they did this, do not hesitate to identify them for the sake of the responsibility of the newspaper SOBH-E AZADEGAN so that the people can also know who they are.

Answer: No, praise God, I must say that all groups are truly brothers who have sincerely helped the mobilization. As I said at the beginning of my talk, the mobilization of the oppressed is thankful to all organizations for their help. I should also say that the mobilization is not really a group. The mobilization is like an ocean, the ocean of unity. Groups are like rivers that flow into the ocean, all becoming one. They naturally help us, and, praise God, we truly saw this. All the brothers heartily thank all groups for their help.

Question: Could you tell us whether there was ideological and religious training in this camp or not, along with the military training? If there was not, why?

Answer: As I said, the working principle is indoctrination and religious training, because we must establish that principle. When we make ideas the foundation, when a brother is armed he knows this, and how to use his weapons. He will destroy the enemy with the weapon of belief as well as with military weapons. The efforts of our brothers, and the desire of all our brothers is to strengthen the sessions on ideology. We have received help with this from all our brothers, and so far as possible we have been able to take care of this important matter.

EMBASSY IN ROME PROTECTION REQUEST--Rome--The Iranian Embassy in Rome has accused the Iraqi Embassy, in a communique, of "planning terrorist attacks on the Embassy of the Islamic Republic of Iran and its diplomatic staff" and has announced that it has "asked the Italian foreign minister in a verbal note to provide greater protection for the embassy headquarters and its other offices in Italy as well as for their staff." The Foreign Ministry has confirmed its receipt of "a number of requests concerning protection and security from the Iranian Embassy and the Iraqi Embassy." The Iranian Embassy communique attributes to the Iraqis several terrorist acts, including the occupation of the Iranian Embassy in London and armed attacks on the Iranian embassies in Vienna, Beirut and Kuwait, as well as the assassination bid on then Foreign Minister Qotzbadeh in Kuwait. COMMENTATOR CALLS FOR BURG'S REPLACEMENT AS AUTONOMY CHIEF

[Commentary by Mati Golan: "Why the Interior Minister?"]

[Excerpts] It is certainly understandable that during 1978 it was difficult to deal with anything that deviated from the sphere of the peace treaty with Egypt. However, 2 years have gone by since then. The original enthusiasm over the peace wore off, and in general the ministers have returned to engage in their own affairs. The exception to the rule is Minister Burg, whose degree of attachment to political affairs has actually intensified since then, by virtue of his post as chairman of the autonomy negotiating team.

The Interior Ministry is a vast empire, even if one devotes one's full attention to it, it is difficult to control. And when dealing with it becomes a secondary matter, as has happened, the prospect for the efficient functioning of this ramified system is negligible.

In parallel, hidden unemployment is being generated in the Foreign Ministry. What is left for this ministry to do when it is freed of the necessity of dealing with autonomy? Persons seeking to enhance the interior minister's prestige point out that there are plenty of occupations besides autonomy: the United Nations, the United States, Europe, normalization with Egypt.

This argument has no real foundation. Every political sphere today is connected in one way or another with the autonomy issue. This is the central issue of Israeli foreign policy and all the rest will be determined according to its lights. Every Foreign Ministry staffer, from the minister to the last of the officials, reveals this truth in his meetings with foreign diplomats and statesmen.

Unquestionably, the cooperation between the foreign and interior ministries is proceeding more smoothly than was the cast during the Moshe Dayan period. Minister Shamir is free of his predecessor's personal residues and ideas. He generally finds the government's political line on autonomy acceptable. Personally, he has no reason to feel offended, since he served as Knesset speaker when Burg was made head of the negotiating team.

This fact facilitates things, but does nothing for the hitches that sometimes cause not a little damage. A foreign minister who serves as an aural witness only in the central political issue cannot represent this issue in the most effective manner. If it is accepted that one of the Foreign Ministry's main functions is information [hasbara] to diplomats and for public opinion, a situation has now been created in which the ministry must explain what others have determined.

It is worth bearing in mind that the idea of establishing a separate ministry of information has come up in several governments. The chief argument against taking the information powers from the Foreign Ministry was that those who implement can explain themselves best. This argument still holds, but things have now changed unrecognizably. It is precisely the main political powers that have been taken from the Foreign Ministry; what remains is information.

One sphere in which this anomaly is acutely conspicuous is that of the normalization of relations with Egypt. It is in Israel's interest to separate this process from the autonomy negotiations. There are those who maintain that the separation between these matters--even though this was not the original aim--serves the goal well.

On the surface, this is a reasonable contention. But in fact the present situation does not meet the [country's] needs and is actually in conflict with them. Whether or not we like it, the normalization process is indissolubly linked with the contacts on autonomy. The fact that the addresses are different makes progress very difficult to attain in both areas alike.

There will be those who say that this description is inexact since the Foreign Ministry staffers are taking part in the talks through Ms Ruth Lapidot. They are preparing background papers, legal opinions, and they are consulted. All this is of course so, but all the consultations, opinions and reports cannot serve as a proper substitute for the direct conduct and guidance of the negotiations.

A final instance of this occurred about a week ago in Washington. The media there reported on a certain [Israeli] concession in the talks. The Foreign Ministry was interested in cultivating this belief, in order to blunt the sharp criticism about Jerusalem's intransigence. Then along came Minister Burg and declared that Israel had made no concession, and the few information points Israel had managed to gain melted away as if they had never been. This kind of thing could never happen if both the right hand and the left hand were attached to the same body.

I asked senior Foreign Ministry officials why Minister Shamir puts up with this state of affairs. That is how he is built, came the reply. Even though he is not satisfied, either personally or substantively, he will not publicize his viewpoint. He is an easygoing person, quiet and serious, and not looking for battle.

It is very nice to hear that. This kind of personality in the governmental jungle is a real treat. The problem is precisely that Shamir's attitude on this issue must not be a personal one. This is not a private matter between Burg and him. The autonomy matter is a crucial one and will largely determine our future. There must be no compromises in the way it is dealt with.

There were reasons that brought Burg to the autonomy issue. Those reasons are no longer valid. Burg should be thanked for his work and asked to return to his very busy ministry. In this way the position will be restored to its natural place. If Shamir does not insist on this, he may do well by Burg, but not with the nation.

JORDAN FUNDS FORBIDDEN--The military government has forbidden the Hebron Charity Association from using 40,000 dinars received from Jordan. For a long time the military administration has not imposed restrictions on bringing funds from Jordan, on the contrary, they were received willingly. PAPER SEEKS EXPLANATION--The AL-MITHAQ newspaper published in East Jerusalem obtained an order nisi from the High Court of Justice today instructing the defense minister and the military commander of Judaea and Samaria to explain why they should not allow the distribution of the newspaper in the West Bank region. Judge Shlomo Levin who issued the order nisi gave the respondents 30 days to give their reasons. The suit, filed by AL-MITHAQ, which called itself "a political daily," and its owner and chief editor (Mahmud 'Ali al-Khatib), said that on 27 September 1979 they asked the military government headquarters in the West Bank for a permit to distribute and sell the newspaper in the West Bank zone. The appellants complain that until the present day they have not received a reply to their request, which is contrary to the rules of good administration and indicates a lack of good faith. They point out that the newspaper does not serve as a mouthpiece for any party or organization and that all the articles and reports published in it undergo censorship. The suit adds that the authorities discriminate against AL-MITHAQ in contrast to other newspapers, such as AL-QUDS, AL-FAJR and ASH-SHA'B, that were permitted to be distributed in the West Bank. The newspaper and its editor compalin that the fact they did not receive the permit stems from arbitrary decisions guided by irrelevant reasons which are detrimental to the appellants and to the freedom of expression. LAND PURCHASED IN SAMARIA--Recently Jews have purchased tracts of land from Arabs in Samaria and they are using them to construct the industrial zone of the Samaria regional council as well as private homes. Our correspondent Avraham Ben-Melekh has learned that the Israel Land Authority has purchased an area of about 70 dunams opposite Qarne Shomron to establish the industrial zone. A group of settlers from Qarne Shomron has also purchased, privately, land on two hills in that area. They have already constructed a road to the hills and will begin to build houses soon. GULF WAR PROMPTS ARAB ALLIANCE IN AREA

[Editorial]

[Text] Arabs unite during wartime and disunite during peacetime. There are many examples in ancient and contemporary Arab history confirming this fact. The Iraqi-Iranian war presents new proof for this fact that at least applies to the Gulf region.

For years, Gulf Arabs have been unsuccessfully discussing the question of Gulf security, although they all agree that Gulf security is the sole responsibility of the region's states and not the Western powers.

All Western plans on Gulf security--beginning with the 1955-1958 Baghdad Alliance until the last British soldier was withdrawn from the region in 1977, when the British bases in Oman were evacuated--have always failed.

During the time of the shah, Iran claimed it was the backbone of Gulf security. In view of this Iranian stand, the question of the aims of Gulf security remained suspended. Thus, who threatened the security of the Gulf? Was it Israel? Was it the United States? Or was it the Soviets? Who was it?

However, during the time of Khomeyni, Iran has presented the answer to Gulf Arabs on a silver platter. Iran has unwittingly convinced the Gulf Arabs that the real threat to Gulf security is the Persian threat itself with all the popularity it has and its exciting impact.

The primary outcome of the Iraqi-Iranian war will be the beginning of the formation of an Arab Gulf security alliance without discussions or abuses and without indulging in legal or juridical details.

Thus, Iraq has found that its strategic support in this war, which has been prolonged, has suddenly stretched from Amman to San'a' and from Jiddah to Ra's al-Khaymah, which is near the Strait of Hormuz.

The continuation of this war means that the issue of Gulf security is being implemented and transformed into a status quo, not only during this war but forever.

JAPANESE MODERNIZATION OF REFINERY--Kuwait, 5 Oct (KUNA)--Kuwait today signed a contract with a major Japanese company for the implementation of a project for the modernization of the largest oil refinery in Kuwait, the Al-Ahmadi Port Refinery, south of the city of Kuwait. No information is yet available about the value of the contract which was signed between the Kuwait National Petroleum Company--a state-owned company--and the Japanese company J.J.C. A spokesman of the Kuwaiti company said the plan to modernize the refinery at Al-Ahmadi Port "Is in line with the policy of industrializing oil to meet local needs of energy" in Kuwait. The aim of the project is to provide liquid fuel to electric power stations and the petroleum industries. The spokesman said that Kuwait decided to modernize the refinery "after extensive studies of Kuwait's needs of energy until 1990." The project is expected to be completed during the first quarter of 1984. [Text] [LD051532 Kuwait KUNA in Arabic 1230 GMT 5 Oct 80]

MINISTER DISCUSSES FOOD, HEALTH ISSUES

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 7 Aug 80 p 6

[Text] The minister of economy and trade, Talal al-Mar'abi, said yesterday that he gave instructions to the Grain and Sugarbeets Bureau to resume the distribution of sugar to the cooperatives that have committed themselves to the distribution guidelines set by the bureau. Al-Mar'abi confirmed that the ministry has no intention of raising the prices of subsidized sugar at all.

Al-Mar'abi added in a statement yesterday: "I have requested the Consumer Protection Agency to prepare schedules of distribution operations undertaken by the cooperatives in coordination with the Cooperative Union, which assumed responsibility for supervision of the delivery of sugar to the cooperatives. Quantities will be increased to the cooperatives that demonstrate abidance by the guidelines set by the ministry.

"With regard to the municipalities, quantities will be distributed to them according to the schedules prepared by the governorates in conformity with the guidelines to be observed in the provinces."

Yesterday, in his office, the minister of economy and trade dealt with supply, health and insurance issues. He had a number of appointments with senior officials of the ministry, and examined with the director general of the Grain Bureau supply policy and measures for the proper distribution of sugar.

In response to a question about the supply policy the government will follow, al-Mar'abi told AL-SAFIR that the policy of subsidy currently followed costs the state nearly 250 million pounds, which will gradually increase with the increase of the volume of consumption of both sugar and wheat.

He added: "In spite of that, the policy is not achieving its intended result, because of violations occurring at the mills and elsewhere, resulting in the smuggling and sale of wheat in the black market for fodder.

"In the face of this situation, we decided, shortly before the acceptance of the government's resignation, to hold a working session with President Sarkis to study supply policy proposals and approve a plan of action. However, the meeting did not take place."

Al-Mar'abi mentioned that "there are three choices with regard to supply policy, ranging from full subsidy as at present, to 50 percent subsidy, to abolition of subsidy.

"I am for the policy of decreasing the subsidy, taking measures that would force the mills and bakeries to abide by prices set for bread, and checking the black market operations of a number of merchants and mills."

In response to a question about adjusting the milling fee allowed to the flour mills, al-Mar'abi said: "The mill owners have already asked for a raise in their fee from 76 to 125 pounds per ton. Technicians of the Grain Bureau were charged with preparing a study of this matter. In light of it, we decided to raise the fee to 104 pounds for 1 ton.

"On this basis, we renewed the contract with the mills to resume milling at the set fee pending approval of the new supply policy."

In reply to a question about health matters, al-Mar'abi [who is also minister of public health] said: "We had been scheduled to meet this afternoon with American University officials to sign an agreement with the university hospital regarding the open-heart surgery] center, following the decision of the cabinet to allot 6 million pounds for the said center. However, the meeting was postponed until next week."

About the new pricing policy for medicines, al-Mar'abi said: "The pricing of medicines will be announced very shortly. The delay in completing the price list can be traced to the failure of the importing companies to submit the lists requested of them. I made a decision to prohibit these companies from importing medications, because of their failure to submit the information requested of them.

ISLAMIC COUNCIL REACTS TO JUMAYYIL'S CALL TO LIBERATE LEBANON

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 5 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] The Islamic Council announced that the recent speech of Bashir al-Jumayyil has great significance, and will prompt Islamic forces to reconsider their positions. It affirmed that the situation calls on the officials concerned to strictly adhere to their legitimate authority and to defend it in a determined way in keeping with the principles of national reconciliation.

This came in a statement issued by the council, in which it said: "The administrative board of the council has taken note of news media accounts of al-Jumayyil's speech, in which he announces the formation of an 'Army of Free Lebanon,' in place of the 'Militias for the Liberation of Lebanon'; the existence of a plan about to be implemented; and the rejection of any talk of dialogue or reconciliation before the liberation of all of Lebanon."

The statement added: "This speech was preceded by an attempt to make an illegal broadcast on Channel 12 and by action to assert militarily the authority of one party [the Phalange] through what was called the 7th of July movement. All this took place at a time when the regime was trying to form a government of activists, to undertake implementation of the announced principles of reconciliation.

"The Islamic Council considers that this speech has great and serious significance. It will drive the Islamic forces not only to be cautious, but also to re-examine all their positions and their methods of reacting to what is going on in Lebanon and the region. Consequently, the council will seek alliances with other forces faithful to the unity of Lebanon in order to confront plans hatched agaisnt this country and readied for implementation.

"The government crisis appears today more serious than in the past. It calls on those concerned to make serious and determined efforts to abide by the legitimate system, defend it and assert its existence. The positions and processes of the legitimate authority must be made completely clear, and government officials must abide by them.

"The sound national principles we have repeatedly advocated to complete rebuilding the army and promulgate the decree on army reorganization; to build a just and strong state; and to achieve national reconciliation through the announced principles of accord, constitute a framework we will not give up or be complacent about."

The statement continued: "While the Israeli army defies the United Nations and its resolutions, decides to move his capital to Jerusalem, and, at the time deceitfully talks about peace in the region, we, in Lebanon face a similar deceptive situation which we must not succumb to. The legitimate authority is called upon to recognize the facts and to be aware of both its supporters and enemies.

"The citizens and their national leaderships must also recognize both the supporters and enemies of the legitimate regime. The citizens must base their attitudes on such recognition and on support for the legitimate authority, provided this authority helps its own self, not through silence as we have regretfully observed, but by rejecting and challenging what has taken place [in Phalangist areas].

GEORGE HAWI INTERVIEWED ON CIVIL WAR, CP CONGRESS

Havana TRICONTINENTAL No 67-68,1980 pp 59-67

[Interview with George Hawi, secretary general of the Lebanese Communist Party, by Moises Sa'b; date and place not given]

> [Text] In the last few years, Lebanon has become the area in which the Palestinian Revolution, the National Lebanese Movement, and the progressive forces of the Arab world are launching their bloodiest battle against imperialism, Zionism, and reaction.
>
> The struggle in southern Lebanon is so intimately related to the Arab people's cause, and especially to the Palestinian question, that it can be said that the fate of the entire Arab world will be decided there.
>
> For that reason, TRICONTINENTAL has been following developments in Lebanon with interest and has offered its readers the opinions of outstanding Arab personalities in this respect.
> Today we bring to our pages--in an interview by newsman, Moises Sa'b especially for TRICONTINENTAL--George Hawi, secretary general of the Lebanese Communist Party, who analyzes the historical and ideological roots of the crisis in Lebanon and speaks to us about the ramifications of the struggle taking place in his country.

[Question] We would like to know your opinion about the present situation in Lebanon.

[Answer] There is still a very complex and difficult situation in Lebanon. For 5 years now we have been carrying on a difficult struggle against the imperialists and Zionists and against reactionary plans related to the Middle East crisis and the situation in Lebanon.

The Lebanese crisis is intimately related to the crisis in the Middle East. During the 10 years from 1970 to the present, immediately after the liquidation of the Palestinian presence in Jordan and after the death of President 'Abd-al-Nasir, Lebanon became the most important area of the confrontation with the imperialist-Zionist front, which tried to solve the Middle East question on the basis of the interests of imperialism, Zionism, and the reactionary Arab classes. Because there is in Lebanon an essential presence of the Palestinian Revolution and a national progressive movement which forms a united front, all the conditions are present there for trying to influence Syria's position.

For this reason, in 1975, during the preparation of the Sinai accords, the reactionary Lebanese forces--in complete cooperation with Israel, the United States, and Sadat--began to carry out their plot against the Palestinian Revolution and the Lebanese progressive movement.

During the first years of the civil war, the situation was very difficult and, after a brief period of calm, of stability--no more than 4 or 5 months--another military provocation took place against the Palestinian Revolution, the Lebanese National Movement and, at the same time, against the Syrian Army. This new confrontation was also related to preparations for further escalation of the plot in that region: the visit of Anwar al-Sadat to Israel. During these preparations and immediately after that visit, Israel began its great offensive against southern Lebanon--at present it occupies a large part of this area--and at the same time, it continued its attacks and provocations.

At present we are facing a permanent Zionist aggression. In addition, we must also confront what they call the Lebanese Front--in other words, a reactionary and fascist front which is continuing its political pressures and its military agression in order to control Lebanon and divide up its territory, creating a fascist state in complete collaboration with the Zionist regime of Israel. Their position is against neither Israeli aggression nor the plot of the internal reactionary forces, but against the Palestinian Revolution and its presence in Lebanon.

Israeli aggression in the south is becoming increasingly strong. Every day hundreds of people in the Lebanese quarter and in the Palestinian camps are forced to abandon their lands and their homes. There is a steady wave of new victims of the attacks, and there is great pressure from the government, from UN forces, and from all the country's reactionary forces against the Palestinian Revolution so that they can obtain concessions from the Palestinians and force them to get out of southern Lebanon.

There is great danger and our Lebanese National Movement, along with the Palestinian Revolution, will have no other choice but to fight, politically and militarily, against that aggression, to defend the southern region, and to continue our military action to free the area occupied by Israel today either directly or through the traitor Sa'd Haddad.

Last August our comrades in the south launced a big and very important battle against th Zionist aggressors. Five of our comrades died after an hour of fighting against 250 Israeli soldiers who landed and attacked one of our bases. Israeli propaganda tried to ignore the presence of progressive Lebanese forces among the people of the south, tried to underestimate the position of the Lebanese people, and also tried to make it seem that this attack, this battle, had only been between Israel and the Palestinian fighters. However, after this heroic action and that of the following night, Israel was forced to admit openly that its troops had had to fight a big, bloody battle, and then it could no longer hide the presence of the Lebanese progressive forces. On that occasion, five of our comrades died because of the Israeli attack; and before that, in July, other comrades in another part of southern Lebanon also fought off attacks. Our party, along with the National Lebanese Movement, is with that essential force in the south which is fighting for the unity of Lebanon, for the liberation of that area, and against the Israeli occupation.

[Question] What effect have the Camp David accords and conversations had on the Lebanese crisis?

[Answer] The Camp David accords are now behind all this escalation, behind this whole situation. Lebanon is the "arena," the second objective, if your will, of these accords. Camp David may or may not be successful in the measure that its agreements may or may not be successful in Lebanon. Why? Because, unless the Palestinian Revolution is liquidated, there will be no one, not a single Palestinian, capable of joining the talks between Israel and Egypt on self-determination as a solution to the Palestinian problem. If they succeed in liquidating the Palestinian Revolution, it will be easy for them then to find some traitors to present as deserters from the Palestinian people.

This is the first aspect. The second is that the united position of the Arabs against the Camp David accords and the Baghdad summit will not remain the same if the Palestinian Revolution is liquidated, because the reactionary Arab regimes, forced to take this position against Camp David, now fear for their own interests. We can say that they are under pressure from their own peoples, who really are in sympathy with the Palestinian Revolution. Therefore, if they succeed in betraying it, they would have to fear both the Palestinian Revolution and their respective peoples. If the Palestinian Revolution was destroyed, reactionary Arab regimes like Saudi Arabia, those of the Gulf and others would be more free to participate, along with President Sadat, in the Camp David accords.

If the Palestinian Revolution in Lebanon is destroyed, Syria's position would be weakened. Therefore, pressure against the Lebanese situation is also directed at crushing the Palestinian Revolution and influencing Syria's position.

The American maneuvers to have King Husayn, Saudi Arabia, and other Arab countries support the Camp David accords have not been successful because of the presence of the Palestinian Revolution, but if that revolution should disappear, then King Husayn, as well as other reactionary forces in the Arab countries, would not continue to maintain his position against that treaty.

This means that the key to the question at this time is Lebanon. It is because of this that the escalation of Israeli aggression has begun, along with President Sadat's initiative. The interests behind the Camp David accords are trying to see that these attacks are not stopped, but rather that they continue and gain new territories, new positions, every day. We are now on the defensive, and the fact that we are able to maintain our positions is a positive factor.

After the Camp David accords, all the pressure of the United States, Israel, and Sadat is concentrated on Lebanon to break up the Steadfastness Front, which opposed the Camp David treaty. Begin said categorically in the Israeli parliament that he will continue his aggression against Palestine and Lebanon, and he invited President Sarkis to visit Israel, or failing that, to sign in Lebanon itself another treaty similar to that of Camp Cavid. This statement shows very clearly what Begin's intentions are: he would like a new treaty with Lebanon, similar to that of Camp David, and the price of this agreement would be, first, the Palestinian Revolution and, second, the independence of Lebanon, the unity of the Lebanese nation, and support of the Lebanese profascist movements. This means imposing on the country reactionary fascist regime having good relations with Zionism and under its domination, against the will of the Lebanese people and that of the other Arab peoples of the region.

We are sure now that Lebanon is the second phase of Camp David; in Lebanon, Camp David can continue or stop, and our decision is to stop it and to maintain our position, to fight the Israeli aggression and not to allow the Lebanese Government to surrender to Israel's demands, its desires, its conditions. And this is, at the same time, the decision of the Palestinian Revolution.

[Question] Does the Lebanese problem have any religious roots?

[Answer] There are some religious facets to the problem, but this is not its base, its content. Essentially it is a problem of classes and of national tendencies.

The Lebanese bourgeoisie, especially the financial oligarchy, has tried in the last 10 years to solve its crisis in the economic, social, and political spheres against the interests of the working class and the peasants and of the middle and lower bourgeoisie. The Lebanese political system is a clerical regime whose basis is religious discrimination. For example, not everybody can be elected president of the republic: for this one must be a Christian, and preferably a Maronite Christian. In general, all the leaders of the political regime are elected according to religions. In this distribution, the Maronites obtain the key positions, such as the presidency of the republic, leadership of the army, and the majority in parliament. It is apparently a clerical combination, but in reality this distribution came about in 1943, and since then there has been a great change in the population; there is a great transformation in social and economic levels, as well as in religious and political levels. This Maronite domination is one of class content, because the Maronites are dominant within the bourgeoisie. This does not mean that there is no Moslem bourgeoisie, but the latter in not the dominant force.

Lebanese industry has developed in the last 10 years, so that many factories, shops, and industries have been built along the coast. This region, in the last century, was also inhabited traditionally by Christians. Because of those factories, workers from other regions of the country, especially from the south and east--Moslems in general--came, not only to work in these centers, but also to remain in the region, to inhabit this part of the country. Others--Christians in general and from Mount Lebanon--also worked in those factories, and this brought about a new unity in Lebanon, a unity of the working class on the basis of its own interests rather than on the basis of any faith or religion. The political regime and the dominant religious forces became fearful on seeing this unity among the working class in the struggle for its interests.

This is one aspect. The other is that the economic crisis in Lebanon reached into all the important levels of the middle and lower bourgeoisie of the country, and these people also began to fight against the authority and domination of the financial oligarchy. Its struggle was also that of the working class.

Since the working class is most organized on the union level and in the leadership of our party and other forces, the struggle of the lower and middle bourgeoisie was related to the cause of the working class. The regime began to lose the historical stability which had come from domination by the lower and middle bourgeoisie. In view of the development of these events, the only path for the upper bourgeoisie to follow was fascism, through which it tried to reestablish its economic, political, and religious domination. In Lebanon this fascist solution has taken a religious form because of the historical contradiction and the interrelation between the monopoly of class and the monopoly of religion and faith. On one side is the Maronite bourgeois domination over the entire bourgeois class; on the other, the workers and peasants--the majority of them Moslems--along with most of the Christians. Finally, the clerical forces have not been able to conceal the class content, the social content, of this struggle.

On this subject, we must mention also that because there are thousands of Palestinian workers in Lebanon, as well as hundreds of thousands of Syrians who are working in these factories and businesses along with the Lebanese working class, there is another interrelation between the class struggle and the national question, concerning the history of Lebanon.

We must also say that most of the working class which comes from the south and the east has continued the fight against Israeli aggression, counter to the policy of the state and the Lebanese authorities toward those attacks. At the same time, the struggle continues on the economic, political and social level, achieving an identity between the national question and the principal objectives of the working class struggle.

There is, consequently, a certain appearance, certain phases, a certain facade of clerical and religious aspects, but the true content of the Lebanese crisis of 1974-75 is a class content, a social content.

[Question] How will the balance of forces develop in the future?

[Answer] I can say frankly and with certainty that everything depends on two principal factors. First, it depends on whether or not we are able to stop the progress of the Camp David treaty. If we succeed in stopping it, the balance of forces will incline completely in our favor, first throughout the region and then in Lebanon, as a result.

The second factor is closely related to the first and is the unity within the progressive and anti-imperialist rank and file of the Arab world. This unity is the most important condition in creating a new correlation of forces in favor of the Arab national liberation movement. We say this because we are sure that international opinion is on the side of the interests of those who are fighting for their independence, for social progress, and for peace. For that reason, creating this new situation depends solely on our position, on the position of the progressive elements in the Arab countries. We have an experience and a very clear example in Ethiopia. The balance of forces around the Ethiopian question and its revolution was once against it, but when that country's revolutionaries decided to keep up their fight against imperialism and reaction, they were successful, and then they saw the socialist countries alongside them--the Soviet Union, Cuba and other who helped them and offered them all the assistance they needed to win.

This means that the progressive Arab forces must make a decision. The international situation is on our side; we have only to unite and advance in our struggle against imperialism, against Israel, against the Camp David treaty.

[Question] Can you tell us briefly about the chief results of the Fourth Congress of the Lebanese Communist Party?

[Answer] For us this congress was the most important event in the life and history of our party, and we closed it in a situation which was very difficult for the security and political life of the country. We discussed in depth and at length all the questions concerning the Lebanese crisis and the future of our country and, at the same time, the future prospects of the Arab national liberation movement. We also discussed the international situation and the liberation movements in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

The three or four most important subjects discussed were those concerning Lebanon. We analyzed the internal crisis of the capitalist regime which gave way to fascism. To do this we presented all the documents and facts which prove the economic roots of the fascist trends. Our congress called for unity among the forces which advocate peace in Lebanon, its national independence, its democratic progress, and its good relations with the Arab world to unify the entire struggle against the aggressive plans of the imperialists, or Israel, and of the reactionary forces of the country. Our call is for the broadest cooperation among the forces to save the unity of the country, its national independence, its Arab character, and its democratic development. Our decision is to continue our struggle alongside the Pales Palestinian Revolution for the purpose of defending its existence and to mobilize the masses for the political and military struggle against Zionist aggression, with the mission of liberating the south from occupation by Israel and its lackey, Sa'd Haddad.

At the same time, we called attention to the new tendencies of the government and of the president of the republic, to prepare the country for military dictatorship if the fascist plan of isolation does not succeed. In this other plan for military dictatorship, we see that the Lebanese bourgeoisie will play the same role it played in the fascist plan. And this will not, of course, be in the interests of the majority of the people, or even in the interest of many levels of the bourgeoisie itself. The example of Greece is very clear in this respect; Karamanlis himself, 10 or 12 years ago, brought the colonels to power to put an end to the democratic process of the country; however, he was one of the victims of the colonels' regime and was forced to fight later on to get rid of that government, but Greece had already fallen many years behind. We are speaking now very openly with the Lebanese masses and especially with the bourgeoisie, telling them that they must not repeat that example.

As for the Arab world, I want to say in a few words that we support its positions and decisions against Camp David, and I see that the most important question is to stop the development of that treaty. But at the same time, we are studying the crisis in the Arab national liberation movement, and we see that it is a crisis of leadership, related to the class nature of its leaders. The lower and middle bourgeoisie, under the leadership of this national liberation movement, are trying to keep it in a centrist position: with one face toward imperialism and the other toward the masses, development and communism, against the interests of the revolution itself. This tendency, in some Arab countries, is trying to eliminate democracy, keep the masses out of the struggle, and continue this vacillating position, never firm, incapable of fighting against and winning victory over an attack such as that directed by the United States, Israel, and Sadat.

In addition, we see that this crisis is continuing because the truly revolutionary forces, the communists and others, are not completely playing their role, the historical role of the working class, and for that reason they are also responsible for this leadership crisis in the Arab national liberation movement. The participation of the working class in the leadership of the national liberation movement is not something which we should hope for, which we should beg for, saying, "Give us our role," but a right which we must take into our own hands and which depends in the first place, on the truly revolutionary program of the most advanced forces, among them the communists, to solve the national question truly and satisfactorily. If the communists do not take the national question, the question of the liberation of Palestine, of Arab unity, and social progress, into their own hands, they will leave it in the hands of the lower and middle bourgeoisie, and the latter will take it from one defeat to another.

We can say very frankly, from the revolutionary point of view, that our responsibility is very great, because the bourgeoisie is not capable of solving the national problem; on the contrary, they have led it down the path of treason. Nor is the lower bourgeoisie capable of solving this problem; only the working class can play that role, since we can see that the Camp David treaty has a social content, which is a coalition of classes against the national liberation movement among Arabs in general. In Africa, Asia, and other parts of the world, the truly revolutionary role of the working class is recognized as the force which is replacing the lower bourgeoisie.

The most important question we discussed in our congress was this leadership crisis in the national liberation movement in its two aspects: on the one hand, the lower bourgeoisie as a class and as a political organization, and on the other the truly revolutionary forces and, at their head, the Arab communist forces.

[Question] Can you tell us what is the role of the territorial division made by Sa'd Haddad?

[Answer] Sa'd Haddad is a tool in the hands of Israel to conceal the Zionist occupation, expand it, and annex that territory which he and Israel occupied in the middle of the country--occupied now by the isolationist fascist forces--so that they can in the future dominate all the national territory. For this reason, we believe that this "state" is very dangerous now and will continue to be so in the future. Therefore, we are calling on all the Lebanese people to fight against this maneuver, this separatist, divisionist, and fascist "state," and we urge all the Arab countries to face this danger and be on guard against it. Unfortunately, there is no truly patriotic and national position in the Arab countries against this danger, not only within the reactionary forces, but also within the patriotic and progressive forces. To underestimate this "mini-state," this puppet state, is, in our point of view, very dangerous, because it concerns a phase, an aspect of Israeli occupation in an Arab country. This is the first time Israel has shown this tendency in its occupation.

MERGER OF THREE NASIRITE ORGANIZATIONS ANNOUNCED

[Text] It was announced yesterday that a new Nasirite organization has been formed under the name of al-Tanzim al-Tali'i [Vanguard Organization] through the merger of three Nasirite organizations in Lebanon. The three were: al-Harakat al-'Arabiyah al-Tha'irah--Fasa'il al-Fida' al-'Arabi [The Arab Revolutionary Movement--Arab Fedayeen Cells], the Arab Socialist Union Party and the Socialist Union--Forces of the Revolution.

This was announced at a press conference held at Hotel Beau Rivage yesterday afternoon. In attendance were 'Ali al-Hajj of the Arab Revolutionary Movement, Samir Kabrit and Husayn al-Ahmar of the Socialist Union Party; and Ahmad Hammud of the Socialist-Union. A number of the other leaders of the new organization were also present.

At the beginning of the conference, the secretary general of the new organization, Mr Al-Hajj, welcomed the newsmen, praised the role of the press and the role of its martyred dean Riyadh Taha, and asked for the observance of a moment of silence in his memory.

Mr Kibrit then read a statement which affirmed that "The advance of the forces of the revolution will not be stopped," and announced the formation of the Vanguard Organization. He said: "This organization is progressive and forward-looking throughout Lebanon. It constitutes a call for the unification of forces under circumstances that cannot bear any delay. We must today adopt our unification slogan of 'Unity of doctrine and strength of unity above anything else.'"

At the end of the conference, Mr Hammud answered questions. Referring to the organization's joining the Central Political Council, he said: "Our documentary statement calls for the Nasirites to play a role both within and outside the council. However, we demand the formation of a central council, representing all nationalist parties operating in Lebanon."

PHALANGIST PLANS, INTERNAL CONFLICTS ANALYZED

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 15 Sep 80 p 15

[Report from Beirut by AL-QUDS (Jerusalem) PRESS: "The Phalangist State Appointed Its Ambassador al-Ma'iki in Washington; Three-Story Presidential Palace Near Juniyah"]

[Text] AL-QUDS PRESS has learned from sources close to the Phalangist Political Bureau that the basic steps have been taken under the tentative plan to proclaim a Phalangist state under the name of the Free State of Lebanon, and that the timing of the announcement depends on the completion of the final plan. This involves settling disputes among rival centers within the party, and consulting personnel at the front facing National Front areas.

The Centers of Amin and Bashir

Regarding the existing disputes within the party and the political bureau sources paint the picture as follows:

There are two basic centers within the political bureau.

The first center is represented by Amin al-Jumayyil who is concerned about maintaining the existing balance, in a manner that would permit him to retain his political and military influence within the party and qualify him to carry on a dialogue with the other parties. This is manifested in his concern to maintaining a good relationship with the National Liberal party [NLP], led by Camille Sham'un, chairman of the Lebanese Front. Amin al-Jumayyil's sphere of influence is tied to that of a group within the party, which includes moderate Phalangist figures like Deputy George S'adah and Attorney Karim Baqraduni. Both are members of the Political Bureau and are playing a role in mending relations between the Phalangists and Damascus and between the Phalangists and other Maronite and Moslem political forces. Among these forces are Franjiyyah's bloc and the Islamic Grouping [coalition of Moslem political leaders].

The second center is represented by Bashir al-Jumayyil who is trying hard to settle the situation to his advantage, using his full authority over the effective militias of the party. The 7 July military movement sought to bridle the NLP, and is linked to plans to subdue all political and armed minorities in the areas where the separatists are in control. This center is always trying to maintain the initiative and to place Phalangist political leaders before accomplished facts.

Bashir's Steps

Sources mention in this regard that new steps Bashir al-Jumayyil is preparing to implement include the following:

*Building a presidential palace for the new mini-state in the area of al-Rabiyah near Juniyah. It is to consist of three floors: two will be underground and the third will be above ground. The palace will be equipped with rapid warning electronic devices.

*Printing new identity cards; building centers for real property and vital statistics agencies; and issuing tax collection procedures.

*Establishing the practice of raising the flag of any country whose ambassador visits the Free State of Lebanon. An orchestra is to be organized to play the national anthems of the Free State of Lebanon and of the foreign country.

Ambassador in Washington

*The Phalangist party established an office abroad following the events of 7 July. This office is tantamount to an embassy. A person called Antoine Ma'iki has been appointed ambassador of the Phalangist mini-state in Washington. He has good relations with Harold Saunders, the Undersecretary of State for Near East Affairs.

*Dictating compulsory military service, and prohibiting travel abroad, unless the militias permit it. Landed property is to be sold only to Maronites, and an 80 percent tax on sales contracts is to be imposed.

Mobilization and Explosion

On the other hand, eyewitnesses report that Sherman and Centurion tanks were advancing towards al-Jabal to take up positions on the borders of Karawan and Upper al-Matn. Heavy movements of Phalangist militia in the capital and the suburbs have also been noted. A battery of heavy artillery directed towards West Beirut and the al-Shuf area has been set up.

Arab security forces are expecting the Phalangist forces to begin a concentrated attack in some areas, especially in al-Shuf and Upper al-Matn, while the Zionist enemy carries out an all-out attack in the south.

Inducing the Syriacs To Leave

Informed sources state that about 60 percent of the members of the Syriac Church have left the eastern area of Beirut and are headed abroad. Thirty percent of these arrived in the western part of Beirut and a similar percentage emigrated to European countries.

The Position of al-Jumayyil, Sr

At present, the position of Party leader Pierre al-Jumayyil, the father of the two feuding brothers, is like that of one who is trying to swallow a bitter pill. On one hand, he is concerned about preserving the unity of the family, and, accordingly, that of the party under the leadership of the family. On the other hand, he is interested in achieving party control over the Christian areas in their entirety under a cohesive command. Pierre al-Jumayyil appears to be concerned about maintaining good relations with the Lebanese Front and with its chairman, Camille Sham'un. He expresses his fears that the front may collapse as a political organization following continued Phalangist steps to control Maronite decisions. This would bring about the isolation of the Phalangist party from its allies, to say nothing of the party's existing isolation from other political parties.

Therefore, Pierre al-Jumayyil is trying to prepare suitable conditions for proclamation of a Phalangist mini-state. He considers such a proclamation as a weapon of last resort in the hands of the Phalangists. It is to be used only in the final stages, after complete political preparations for it have been made on the local and international scenes.

Continued Developments

Political observers in the eastern areas are not betting on a continued state of relative balance within the Phalangist party. They expect feverish developments to continue inside and outside the party to carry out the militias' plan to assume control over political and military decisions. They believe that Bashir al-Jumayyil's faction did strengthen its influence considerably after the 7 July massacre, in which the militias of the NLP which oppose Bashir al-Jumayyil's course were liquidated. This means that full control by Bashir al-Jumayyil is approaching, and that this would inevitabily expedite the proclamation of a Phalangist mini-state and the announcement that it will be tied to the border strip area. This would also lead to preparations for an extensive eruption whose purpose is to tie this mini-state with the area of Jazin and al-Jabal through al-Shuf.

PHALANGISTS ARRESTED, WEAPONS CONFISCATED

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 22 Aug 80 p 11

[Article: "Resistance Discovers Phalangist Network Involved in North Lebanon Assassinations and Plundering; Hablas and Mahbash Confess to Several Actions"]

[Text] The Palestinian resistance has announced the discovery of a Phalangist network operating in nationalist areas of North Lebanon. The general leadership of the popular front held a news conference and presented two members of the gang, Ahmad Hablas and Walid Mahbash. The front said that various weapons were found in their possession.

Confession

Following their arrest they confessed to membership in the Phalange party and revealed plans to assassinate several Zgharta personalities, the most outstanding being deputy 'Abdallah al-Rasi and his wife, Sonia Franjiyah, Philip Habib, commander of Zgharta's militia, and Abu Robert, a senior militia officer.

They also admitted to participating in a number of murders, armed robberies, thefts, and bombings, including the following:

1. Robbing and murdering the bank teller, Munir 'Oda, in his house in the Bab-al-Hadid area

2. Blowing up Shawki al-Rasi's printing shop on Centralle Street (al-Tall area)

3. Stealing 30,000 Lebanese lire from a teller near the French bank

4. Breaking into Dr Lahud's clinic and stealing 5,000 lire

5. Breaking into a store near the statue of Abd al-Hamid Karrami in Tripoli and stealing 7,000 lire

6. Bombing a cafe where Zartawis gather

7. Stealing an automobile belonging to "'Azzar' Azzar, a 1979 Fiat 132

8. Stealing 3,000 lire from Dr Rafik al-Mara'bi

9. Breaking into Dr Kasdi Al-Shahal's clinic and stealing 1,500 lire

10. Blowing up a number of Zgharta stores in the al-Zahraya area.

Financial Inducements

In answer to the journalists' question, "How did you first become linked with the Phalange?," Ahmad Hablas, 28, replied, "I was visiting a number of people, Sa'id 'Allam al-Din, Mustafa Hablas, Ma'n Barbich, and someone called Adib, and they were getting in touch with Akram in al-Ashrafiya. They offered me financial inducements to work with them; they also got in touch with Walid and Khalid Kotrayib and two Syrians called 'Abd-al-Ra'uf and 'Ali. They suggested that we get in touch with the Phalange so as to participate in destructive activities in exchange for money. So the agreement was made. They tempted us with money, and I am very sorry for these deeds. We distributed the money we stole among us." Concerning assassinations he said, "We were supposed to be only the lookout in exchange for 5,000 lire, but we refused because the amount was insufficient."

PHALANGISTS ELIMINATE THEIR COMPETITION

Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 17 Aug 80 p 18

[Article: "Phalangists Destroy Last Rivals; Sharbal removed as Head of Maronite Monks; AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM Reveals Details of Party and Personality Conflicts Within Lebanese Front Leadership; Are al-Ashrafiya Explosions a Response to Phalangist Domination?"]

[Text] Father Bulus has replaced Father Sharbal as head of the order of Maronite monks, which are a large and important Lebanese Christian religious institution. This followed closed elections lasting several days, interspersed by prayers and religious rites.

This would be a normal event if not for the situation surrounding the elections and the special role that Sharbal played in both religion and politics. This outstanding priest participated in all stages of the Lebanese civil war. In cooperation with his allies in the Phalangist and Free parties he converted Maronite monasteries, religious centers, and places of worship into militay centers and well-defended forts filled with weapons. Arrests followed by torture within these religious shrines--against Palestinians, Moslems, Syrians, and Christians supporting the Palestinian cause--have occurred and are still occurring. Leftist and progressive forces seized by the Christian militia are treated likewise.

Many questions have arisen concerning the reasons which caused the forces dominating the Christian side, presently gathered entirely within the Phalangist party, to get rid of Sharbal. The latter was a main leader of the Lebanese Front, which from the beginning included al-Jumayyil, Camille Sham'un, President Franjiyah, the poet Sa'id 'Akl, the historian Jawad Bulus, and a number of right wing intellectuals, e.g. Dr Fu'ad Bustani and Dr Charles Malik. The answer can be found in developments within the front following battles in Beirut and other sectors, the movement of the war to South Lebanon, and military movements in the interior.

Disagreement within the front began when Sulayman Franjiyah walked out following fierce disagreements between himself and his former allies, particularly the Phalangist Party. Franjiyah and northern leaders charged the latter with attempting to dominate the situation and to impose one party rule. Franjiyah and the northern leadership, young and old, repudiated the front's dealings with Israel and refused to allow the Phalangists to participate in the government, particularly after they concentrated their energies on separatist steps designed to partition Lebanon. This overriding development still influences the Lebanese political situation.

Second was the secession of a number of independent, right wing personalities from the front's leadership for several reasons. Those quitting felt that they had no "say," given Phalangist ambitions to dominate their allies and consequent suppression of free speech even within front meetings.

Some supporters of the poet Sa'id 'Akl, who has close ties with the monks and the "Hurras al-Arz" organization, disagreed with the Phalangist call for the destruction of Arabs and Arabism while at the same time seeking to build bridges to some Arab countries. Dr Fu'ad al-Shamali, who led a military organization called "'Al-Tanzim," no longer has a role within the front and is encircled by his former allies.

Third was the Phalangist ground war against Christian minorities, which has lasted throughout the past 2 years in numerous forms. It has had severe repercussions within the ranks of some in the front. The Christian minority, according to a level-headed observer, felt subject to extermination or complete one party rule. Fourth, there is present

Fourth, there is present Phalangist militia attack upon its only remaining ally within the front, former President Camille Sham'un. Throughout his political life Sham'un has labored for the same cause that the Christian right wing has fought for during the past 2 years. This cause is supported by the Israeli army's move into South Lebanon, Jerusalem, and the West Bank.

In spite of deep ties of friendship between the Phalangist Party and Camille Sham'un, the former decided to wage war against the latter with a fierceness hitherto unknown in Lebanon, including the widespread butchery of 1975-76. The leaders of Sham'un's party publicized the Phalangist butcheries of 7 July, which the Phalangists term the "noble movement of the 7th." During that time 550 people were killed, with hundreds left wounded, maimed, and homeless, and tremendous property losses.

Democratic procedures aimed at Father Sharbal, who was attending the meetings of the Lebanese front, represents a fifth Phalangist dictatorial scheme. It appears that the Phalangists were upset by the major role played by the priest and the monks within the front. In spite of close military, political, and propagandistic ties between Sharbal and the Phalangist military council, Sharbal was accused of harboring a relationship with former President Franjiyah who was carrying on a bloody conflict with the Phalangists. The Phalangist militia under the leadership of Bashir al-Jumayyil decided to get the priest replaced as head of the Maronite order at the end of his 6-year term. Although the dominant mood among those with a right to vote was to renew Sharbal's presidency, outside pressures were stronger and the congregation decided to elect Father Bulus Na'man. The latter has no problems with the Phalangists; his relationship with them and their leaders is very good.

The question is whether Bashir al-Jumayyil can totally liquidate all rivals, enemies, and friends. It is too early to give an answer to this. However, massive and repetitive explosions, occurring in east Beirut and al-Ashrafiya in particular, have caused people to live in constant terror despite the activities of Phalangist authorities. These explosions may constitute more than an "answer" to conflicts and breakdowns that are occurring on the internal front, which the Phalangists thought they could totally control.

SECRET RESOLUTIONS OF PHALANGE PARTY REVEALED

Kuwait AL-HADAF in Arabic 21 Aug 80 p 5

[Article: Phalangist Council Secret Resolutions; Sham'un Says Zero Hour Will Come 20 or 21 August 1980"]

[Text] Observers link delays in forming a new Lebanese Government to fear of another blowup that could return the country to its previous state of violent and bloody conflict. Preparations for violence are most prounounced in the two most inflammatory areas of the country, South Lebanon and North Lebanon. In South Lebanon Israel launched a lightning attack to take advantage of the U.S. presidential election and to draw attention from her announcement making Jerusalem the permanent capital of the Zionist entity.

What is going on in North Lebanon? The price of linking events in South Lebanon to those occurring on the border between Mount Lebanon and North Lebanon? During a small family celebration which took place in the presidential palace, 17 August 1980, Sulayman Franjiyah, on the anniversary of his election as Lebanese president, spoke with close associates about specific information which he continuously receives concerning Phalangist movements toward North Lebanon. He revealed that the Phalange is gathering its forces near Jurud Jubayl and al-Batrun and preparing to move on North Lebanon. Zgharta sources have indicated that a Phalangist buildup composed of three divisions is preparing to end the forced isolation of the east by attacking North Lebanon. Therefore it would appear that a Phalangist division is trying secretly to reach the town of Bsharri, under the leadership of Samir Ja'ja', while another division is preparing to leave the towns of Mayfuk and Dir al-Kattara for North Lebanon. A third division would go from the coast via al-Barbara highway, which intersects the main Beirut-Tripoli road. It appears that the Phalangist hordes moving into North Lebanon include 2,000 armed fighters, including elements from the former Lebanese army and volunteers from various eastern sections. A number of tanks and heavy artillery have been moved to Phalangist borders with North Lebanon, and reinforcements are continuing daily. All these movements are being watched by division stations in border areas from al-Batrun to Qanak, near Bashirri, and Jabal'Ayut, Darb 'Ashtar, etc. Terrorist activities have started within the Jubayl area, and a wide northern movement is occurring in Beirut in anticipation of every possibility.

The Military Council

During secret meetings held by Bashir al-Jumayyil, of the Phalangist military council, it was decided to launch an attack on North Lebanon, following the attainment of specific conditions in that sphere. AL-HADAF has obtained a copy of these resolutions, which were unanimously agreed upon by the council. They are divided into two parts. The first deals with Beirut; it calls for watching Dany Sham'un and not permitting him to move toward North Lebanon and upset the planned attack there. The second is intended to prevent Arab resistance forces from interfering in any possible battle between the Phalange and the Maradah in North Lebanon and thereby to neutralize the Tripoli front. Karm Bakraduni was given that assignment. The council received information specifically accusing Dany Sham'un of blowing up two cars in the al-Ashrafiya area. Dany was placed on a list for liquidation, whatever the cost. He refuses to go to North Lebanon because he knows what awaits him there.

Zero Hour

The information that Camille Sham'un is spreading among close associates and visitors indicates an anticipated blowup in two stages soon. He speaks thus with the help of Jordanian authorities and says, "A new wave of assassinations will begin between the 20th and 25th of this month. Following these liquidations there will be consecutive security blowups in South and North Lebanon." Camille says that the Jordanian authorities have warned him of all this and have asked that he do whatever he can to limit these activities which threaten the country. Camille and Dany have doubled security about their houses as well as military activity in the areas where they live and move about.

SEQUEL OF ARMY TEST OF STRENGTH IN AL-HADATH DISCUSSED

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 14 Sep 80 p 13

[Report from Beirut by AL-QUDS (Jerusalem) PRESS: "Army Succeeds in First Practical Test Against Phalangists"]

[Text] The armed clashes between the Lebanese army and the Phalangist militia in the area of al-Hadath ended early Thursday morning after the armed Phalangists in the area surrendered. Firing ceased, and guards at Phalangist posts were taken to prisons at army barracks in al-Fayyadiyah, al-Yarazah and B'abda. However, no sooner had the fighting ceased at 5 a.m. than two heavy artillery shells exploded, one near the presidential palace in B'abda, and the other near al-Yarazah army headquarters. It was determined that the Phalangists had fired the two bombs from one of their posts near Brummana.

The First Test for the Army

These battles are considered the first practical test of the army's ability to confront [militias], specifically the Phalangists, who have imposed their control over the entire eastern area [of Beirut], with the exception of some sections in the southern suburb. The clashes began when the National Liberal party [NLP] invited army troops to occupy their offices. This invitation followed Camille Sham'un's decision to dissolve the military arm of his party and maintain its political activity.

Army troops did in fact enter the NLP positions more than a week ago. As soon as they arrived into the area, they issued a local order that no weapons be carried in the area or transported into it. The army asked the Phalangists to stay in their positions and not to appear with their weapons in the streets. After a week of provocations and Phalangist disregard for the decision of the army, the armed Phalangists tried to provoke NLP elements in the area. The army interfered to stop that, but the Phalangists responded with violence. Two Phalangists were killed, and two officers who were trying to solve the dispute peacefully were wounded. Thereupon, the army command issued orders to its troops to return any fire, to arrest anyone who fires guns and to establish the army's full control over al-Hadath.

A number of clashes followed between special and regular army troops and the Phalangist militias. These battles led to the surrender of a large number of armed Phalangists and the destruction of their headquarters in al-Hadath. Despite political interventions by Phalangist leader Pierre al-Jumayyil with President Elias Sarkis, the president notified al-Jumayyil that the army would not stop its intervention until it had established full control over the area whose security it was charged to protect as part of its new mission. The fighting had stopped at noon, but it was resumed in the afternoon after Bashir al-Jumayyil threatened the army. Bashir warned, "Today we note with sorrow and with pain what the army did in Shahrur Valley before 7 July. We note that it was these actions that brought us where we are today. On 13 April this army was not able to protect us; we protected ourselves. If this army is politically incapable, and if it cannot maintain peace, it should at least be careful so that it does not become a tool for civil strife and for strengthening one party against the other."

He also said, "We do not want to enter areas which are occupied by the Lebanese army. We do not have a right to do so. But the army also does not have the right to do what it is doing today. These areas used [Christian] steadfastness areas. These are the areas that have protected B'abda [seat of presidency] recently and 4 years ago. These are the areas that will protect B'abda in the future."

Bashir al-Jumayyil referred openly to the army's failure to assume its responsibilities in some areas. "If the army is unable to maintain the peace, we may be forced to play its role this time also," he said.

Raiding the Dens

In the course of all this, army troops continued to raid the Phalangists with the covert assistance of some NLP groups. Army troops were able to silence Phalangist gunfire and to arrest the well-known leaders of the party in the area. The army's telecommunications devices intercepted new orders from Bashir al-Jumayyil [to his partisans] urging resistance and non-submission. The orders affirmed that aid was on the way to al-Hadath. However, al-Jumayyil's orders were not carried out this time, because the army thwarted that.

It may said that the army did settle the situation in al-Hadath, and it seems that it was able to establish full control over the area. Bashir al-Jumayyil issued a new warning to the army command and to the president. He threatened to expand the area of confrontation and to attack and occupy areas where the army is posted. Al-Jumayyil also threatened to shell the army and to divide it most deeply. However, this information remained confidential and was not ciruclated in political and media circles.

Everybody is speculating about the position of Camille Sham'un and the NLP in the area. The Phalangists are circulating information that Sham'un had denounced the disturbances and had instructed the NLP in al-Hadath not to take part in them, and to contribute to the effort to pacify the situation. But Sham'un's wishes were not carried out in the area. In fact, the members of the NLP proclaimed their absolute support for the army's action. Bashir al-Jumayyil tried to straighten things out by publicly commending Camille Sham'un. This, however, did not have any impact on the centers of power in the party. These take their orders form Dany Sham'un who takes a negative and extremist position against any position taken by the Phalangists and Bashir al-Jumayyil.

[Camille] Sham'un had held an extended meeting with Pierre al-Jumayyil and had spoken many times with Bashir. It is expected that he will convene an important meeting to determine the situation in the context of the army's new action in the eastern areas.

Position of the National Movement

But what about the position of the National Movement?

Information received at B'abda Palace from various parties on the other side [of the conflict] confirms the existence of a large group which supports the army's action and calls on it to continue imposing its control on the separatist areas which are working for partition, so that, if the army is successful, it could then pursue its basic mission. Numerous national figures in the western region [of Beirut] as well as public opinion leaders and key figures in the Chamber of Deputies have informed the president of this view. They emphasized that this course of action constitutes the only available opening to solve the problem of the continued existence of mini-states in the eastern areas. The president was also told that the army's success there would be a prelude to its move into the remaining areas, including the western [areas of Beirut] and the south [of Lebanon].

B'abda palace circles are saying that President Sarkis is considering all these possibilities with senior security commanders. He is facing the difficult choice of shifting the power of the state from the realm of radio statements to that of enforcement [of state policy]. Such a choice would make it easier for the state to implement the well-known principles of accord which the president proposed several months ago.

In general, reaction in other non-eastern areas to the army's success in al-Hadath have been positive. According to private information form the eastern area itself, public opinion was satisfied with what has happened in al-Hadath, and was hopeful that this would be a prelude to [the army's] reaching into all areas controlled by the Phalangists.

Phalangist Pressures

President Sarkis is being subjected to heavy Phalangist pressure to disregard the advice of some of those who are close to him to continue widening the army's sphere of influence into the heart of the eastern region. This, according to Phalangist threats, would have harmful consequences for Lebanon as a whole and for the army and the government in particular. The Phalangists have begun carrying out their threats. They have resumed shelling the area of al-Hadath where the army is stationed, while they negotiate secretly to stop the army's campaign.

The latest information about the clashes in the area indicates that fighting resumed after the Phalangists issued a new warning in which they asked that all detained Phalangists be released. AL-QUDS PRESS has learned that the army may release the armed Phalangists who are being detained, provided that they promise not to carry arms again or appear with their weapons in the area of al-Hadath. It was also mentioned that the army has permitted the appearance of any party faction, provided it does not make any use of weapons. Negotiations on this matter are under way between the army and the Phalangists.

Some circles of the National Movement believe that President Sarkis will pursue his course to impose the army's control, and that he will apply himself to achieve the plan proposed by former President Sulayman Franjiyyah to start deployment of the army from B'abda, until the army carries out its objective of controlling all partitionist-areas. But according to presidential circles, the president is saying that he needs political cover to enforce army control. Contacts are under way in this area, and it is not unlikely that all these demands may be met in the course of the next few days.

In any case, all indications are that the administration is at a difficult and important crossroads. The destiny and the identity of the administration in the remaining 2 years of its life depend on the decision it will take in this regard. It is also been learned that the presidential palace has initiated broad and secret contacts with all groups so that they may help this round before matters get worse and before any action is undertaken that may hurt the course of peace and reconciliation in the country.

CENTRAL BANK RAISES CEILING ON BANK CREDIT

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 6 Aug 80 p 5

[Text] The Bank of Lebanon raised the ceiling on bank credits to the private sector by 2 percent until the end of the current year. Likewise, it increased the additional allowable credit to finance the industrial and tourist sectors from 5 to 8 percent.

This appeared in circular No 268 of 5 August 1980 issued by the governor of the Bank of Lebanon, Shaykh Michel al-Khuri yesterday. It amends circular No 251 of 29 December 1979.

This measure of the central bank relaxing credit ceiling is in response to the desire of the banking system after it became clear that there was presently increased and unexpected demand for the Lebanese pound, free of risk, on both local and international money markets. The volume of bank credits given in the first quarter of the year revealed an increase in line with the limits set by the Bank of Lebanon.

The text of circular No 268 follows:

"In reference to circular No 251 of 29 December 1979, the governor of the Bank of Lebanon announces that in the session held on 4 August 1980, the board of directors of the central bank approved the following amendments:

"First, to raise the credit ceiling as set in the second article of the said circular for the period between 1 January and 31 December 1980 from 20 to 22 percent of the lower of all bank credits as of 30 November 1979 or 31 December 1979 (as determined under prior guidelines). Any bank can utilize this new 2-percent increase up to the end of 1980.

"Second, to increase the additional allowable credit defined in the third article of circular No 251 regarding the financing of the industrial and tourist sectors from 5 to 8 percent of the volume of a bank's credits as of 30 November 1979. This will be effective until the end of 1980.

"Third, every bank that exceeds the maximum limits set forth in the two previous paragraphs and in Paragraph 4 of circular No 251 will be required to place with the Bank of Lebanon 75, instead of 50 percent of the amount in excess of the maximum credit limit, as a necessary reserve. This paragraph takes effect on 1 September 1980.

"Fourth, banks may concede to other banks the right to use any unutilized part of the increased credits authorized above. This may be done after obtaining the prior consent of the Banks Control Commission.

"Fifth, this circular takes effect on 5 August 1980.

PROMINENT INDUSTRIAL REPRESENTATIVE DEPLORES FINANCIAL STATE

Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 13 Sep 80 p 7

/Article by George Bashir: "The Subject of the Instalment Payment of Debts Is Closed; Restriction of Banking Credit Has Created Economic Stagnation"/

/Text/ The current chief of the Society of Lebanese Industrialists, Dr Fu'ad Abu Salih, resembles the current chief of the Society of Banks of Lebanon, Dr As'ad Sawaya.

Dr Abu Salih is the first chairman of the Industrialists' Society to come from the ranks of technicians and managers, not the ranks of the big industrialists, after the biggest of the big factory owners--Albert 'Usayli, Butrus al-Khuri and 'Abdallah Khuri- followed one another as chairman of the Industrialists' Society since its establishment.

Dr Sawaya is the first chairman of the Society of Banks to come from the ranks of the technicians and managers, not from the ranks of bank board chairmen like Messrs Pierre Iddah and Joseph Ja'ja'.

Some people say that developments of the age and the expansion of the economic societies' tasks have brought about the presence of experts, not princes, at the top of these societies.

Some people say that technicians like Fu'ad Abu Salih and As'ad Sawaya constitute a compromise solution to the struggle among princes for the chairs of sensitive economic societies like the Societies of Industrialists and Banks.

That is, Fu'ad Abu Salih may provide more stability for industrialists in the light of the competition between the two chieftains of industry Shaykh Butrus al-Khuri and Mr Ghazi Jabr, and As'ad Sawaya may provide better stability for the banks in the light of the competition between the two bank chieftains Shaykh Joseph Ja'ja' and Mr Jean Abu Jawdah.

The problems and concerns of the industrialists, during and after the events, have increased greatly since the days of peace, and the problems and concerns of the banks increased during and after the events, because, in matters of finance, labor and workers, the trials of war always start after the war ends--they do not end as soon as there is a fragile cease fire.

On the affairs and concerns of the industrialists, AL-ANWAR held this conversation with the chairman of the Society of Lebanese Industrialists, Dr Fu'ad Abu Salih:

Instalment Payment of Debts

Question: Following continuous negotiations on the subject for more than 2 years, this draft is still the subject of negotiation, from committee to committee and from meeting to meeting. Where has the draft got now?

Answer: The draft law on the instalment payment of debts is a special exceptional solution to a special exceptional situation which the country has been going through as a result of the events and their aftereffects. Had security been established after the conclusion of the events in 1976, there would never have been need for this draft.

This kind of exceptional settlement must be negotiated amicably by those interested in the settlement to arrive at the formula for the settlement, a settlement where the woif will not die and the sheep will not disappear.

Especially since the Lebanese government in its current political economic and security state cannot impose a solution on everyone.

At least the mentality prevailing in Lebanon now does not want to impose this solution. Rather, it wants mutual understanding among groups in the Lebanese economy on solutions to the economic problems, in a manner whereby this dominant mentality will try to make the Lebanese political groups understand the solutions to their security and political problems.

The draft on instalment payment of debts, which is of interest to industrialists, merchants, hotel owners and other debtors, will naturally harm the banks. The banks are asking the government to compensate them for the losses they will suffer from the instalment payment of debts. In its current state, the government needs someone to help it. The claim is naturally not against the Italians but against "General Security."

Therefore the negotiations have gone on long, and have become ramified longer, to the point where we have lost and have made the people lose in negotiating to agree over the final formula for the draft on the instalment payment of debts.

Now, however, the joint parliamentary committees in the Chamber of Deputies--that is, the Committees on Administration, Finance and the Economy--have approved a final formula for the draft of the law on the instalment payment of debts, a formula which enjoys the agreement of the industrialists and merchants' societies and the hotel and restaurant unions, and enjoys the agreement of all banks and the Central Bank as well.

We had hoped that the Chamber of Deputies would be summoned to an exceptional session this September, to approve the draft of the law, but the cabinet crisis prevented that. We began to hope that the draft would be approved in parliament at the beginning of the ordinary session which will begin the middle of October.

Question: How long is the period for the instalment payment of debts, and what is the annual interest on the debts broken down into instalments, according to the formula of the draft law agreed to by all those concerned?

Answer: I may not be boasting if I say that the final formula of the draft law which was presented by the Society of Industrialists has been approved because it is the most comprehensive and the fairest.

This final draft will allow factories and hotels indebted to banks to request that their debts be broken down into instalments and paid back over 10 years at an annual simple interest rate of 5 percent.

The draft will allow other persons in debt to banks to request the breakdown of their debts into instalments to be paid back over 7 years at an annual simple interest rate also of 5 percent.

The simple interest rate for all debtors has been consolidated in order to prevent problems and disputes on the status of each creditor bank and each debtor client.

The repayment period for industrialists and hotels has been made longer than that for the other debtors because factories and hotels were more damaged than others by the events and because the debts which the hotels and factories have incurred are greater than the debts of others.

The draft stipulates that banks which break their clients' debts down into instalments have the right to request compensation for them from the Central Bank of Lebanon. This compensation will take place by having the Central Bank discount the paper of the debts broken down into instalments.

That is, banks which break down clients' debts valued at 10 million pounds at a low interest rate of 5 percent per year will have the right to borrow 10 million pounds from the Central Bank at very low interest--much less, naturally, than that the banks pay depositors.

In other words, the Central Bank will compensate the banks which break their clients' debts down into instalments in a manner guaranteeing them financial liquidity and compensating them for the difference between the free interest rate prevailing in the Lebanese market and the interest rate set at 5 percent for debts broken down into instalments, because the banks cannot pay 9 percent interest to depositors and just realize an interest of 5 percent from borrowers.

The interest the Central Bank will receive on the banks' "paper discount" will be variable and will differ according to fluctuations in the bank interest rate on deposits in the Lebanese market.

The Price of the Pound

Question: Are you in favor of having the price of the American dollar stabilize at its price, which now totals 342 Lebanese piasters, or do you envision broader Central Bank intervention to lower or raise the price of the dollar, on grounds that all changes in the price of the dollar in the Lebanese market are automatically reflected on the prices of all Arab and foreign currencies?

Answer: At every time in history and in every country in the world, a drop in the price of domestic currency benefits domestic industries, since domestic interests can increase their exports.

In Lebanon now, Lebanese industries are naturally benefiting from the low price of the Lebanese pound, since greater scope is being made available to factories to export their output from Lebanon.

However, the drop in the price of the Lebanese pound measured against the prices of foreign currencies is a double-edged sword. Because of it the prices of raw materials imported to Lebanese industries from abroad soon rise and because of it the wages of workers and employees in Lebanon soon rise. The prices of the other requirements and services industry consumes, such as electricity, fuel and transport also rise.

In the face of benefits from the drop of the Lebanese pound on the one hand and its deleterious features on the other, we demand stability in the prices of Arab and foreign currencies on the Lebanese market, by keeping the price of the dollar where it now is or by modifying it to rise or fall.

This is so that the employer can be confident about his near future and build his works domestically and his relations with the outer world on the basis of an approximately known currency price, because rapid severe fluctuations in the price of currency are a kind of gamble and adventure which could make some rich and bankrupt others.

One should realize that there are very rich advanced countries which deliberately lower the price of their domestic currency to encourage the exports of their national output abroad.

The issue of the currency price is an instrument in the hand of the government to be used in accordance with the domestic economic interest. Drops in the price of hard currency do not always mean that the country's economic state is collapsing. This is an old fanciful view which the era has transcended and which reality and practice have dispensed with.

90 Percent for the Arab East

Question: What are the total exports of Lebanese industries, as a share of total production, and how are Lebanese exports broken down among the nations of the world?

Answer: I imagine that about 30 percent of the total production of Lebanese factories is exported outside the country and 70 percent of it is consumed within the country.

I estimate that about 90 percent of total Lebanese industrial exports are exported to countries in the eastern Arab world and only about 10 percent are exported to other Arab and foreign countries!

The Arab countries which import 90 percent of all /exported/ Lebanese manufactured goods are the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Kuwait, the state of the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Bahrain, Jordan and Syria.

That is, Lebanese industry, especially since the events of 1976, have come to rely on the markets of the countries of the Arab east, first because of the great wealth which has been obtained by these countries through the rise in oil prices and the increase in construction and consumption in the countries of the Arab east and second because of the difficulty of sea transport when Lebanese products are exported to African Arab countries and foreign countries (the security situation about the port of Beirut and security conditions between Lebanese areas).

Restriction of Credit

Question: The Central Bank of Lebanon imposes restrictions on the lending of funds from banks to clients in order to improve the exchange rate of the Lebanese pound. Are these restrictions, which are being imposed for the first time in Lebanon, suitable for industrialists?

Answer: The goal of the Lebanese Central Bank in restricting the banks' freedom to lend to clients is to achieve two purposes:

The first purpose is to limit commerce in land and buildings, a commerce which has been transformed into speculation and a black market where a land or building is bought today at a price of 2 million pounds then sold in a week at a price of 4 million pounds!

The second goal is to limit the transfer of funds from Lebanon abroad with the purpose of depositing them in western banks at very high interest, especially after the interest on bank deposits in America jumped to 18 and 19 percent toward the end of last year.

By virtue of Central Bank Directive No 251 dated 29 December 1979, banks operating in Lebanon were prohibited from giving new credit to clients in excess of 20 percent of their total credits on 31 December 1979 in 1980.

The banks have been permitted to give new credits to owners of industrial and tourist organizations equivalent to just 25 percent of their total credits on 31 December 1979 in 1980.

However, in accordance with Central Bank Directive No 268 dated 5 August 1980, these restrictions have been lessened slightly. Banks are permitted to give new credits to their clients in 1980 equivalent to 22 percent of their total credits on the last day of 1979, or 28 percent of their total credits at the end of 1979 if they were credits given to industrial and tourist organizations.

The restrictions the Central Bank has imposed to limit bank credit have not just led to a reduction in loans to land and building speculators; they have also led to a reduction in bank loans to other employers and productive projects, including industry, agriculture and trade, and these restrictions as a consequence have a created perceptible paralysis in the course of work in the country.

While it is difficult in this pressing period to discuss the policy of tightening bank credit, I consider in brief that specialized banks should be obliging in granting medium-term and long-term credit to clients.

That is, I recommend that the Industrial, Agricultural and Real Estate Credit Bank, the Financing Bank and the Housing Bank open their treasuries and lend to every reliable person who is in need.

The government owns half the shares in these three banks. The purpose of these three banks is to lend to productive projects. This specifically is a time for these banks to perform their functions.

In activity there is a blessing, much more explicitly, in these difficult circumstances when banks are deliberately and intentionally being kept from their rights and freedom to lend to the clients they consider appropriate.

National duty dictates an exceptional government policy to urge these government-national banks and other specialized national banks to lend over the medium term, so that their credit may be expanded.

In paralysis there is restraint, despair and discouragement. Let the government move to get the frozen funds in these banks moving. Money should not be frozen in treasuries. Shaykh Shakhbut's point of view has vanished.

For example, but not exclusively, the national government Financing Bank (headed by Mr 'Abd-al-Rahman al-Tayyarah) allotted the sum of 400 million pounds to lend to industrialists over long terms at low interest. We have promised to allocate another 800 million pounds for the same purpose after lending out the initial 400 million pounds.

However, 3 years after allocating the 400-million loan, it has been feasible for the industrialists to borrow only 100 million pounds out of the original 400 million; 300 million are still frozen in the bank.

The reason for that is not the industrialists' lack of need to borrow but rather the debilitating conditions which the Financing Bank imposes on the borrowing industrialists; we do not exaggerate in saying that those conditions nearly bankrupt the borrower.

A Federation of Employers' Committees

Question: It has been proved through practice that the General Federation of Labor in Lebanon has been more able to exert influence, act and obtain gains for the workers than the Lebanese societies of employers, which have seemed fragmented in the face of the Labor Federation's demands. Why isn't an office of "economic committees" established, which would be tantamount to a general federation of employers in Lebanon, as recommended by the president of the Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry, Mr 'Adnan Qassar, so that a balance of forces can be established between the two parties to labor?

Answer: I do not consider that the General Federation of Labor has achieved anything but negative gains. That is, it has achieved continuous large wage increases for workers, and these increases in turn have led to a great rise in living expenses where the workers have lost with their left hand what they gained by increasing with their right hand.

Then employers' societies, by the nature of their structure, in every country of the world, are more concerned with economic stability than workers' unions. Therefore the employers' societies remain constantly compelled to offer concessions toward demands for increased wages in order to avoid strikes and eliminate political auctioneering.

I personally do not oppose the establishment of a kind of general federation of employers' societies to limit the oppression of the General Federation of Labor, in its capacity as the only representative of the workers.

However, we must realize that the interests of employers are sometimes in contradiction. An example of that is the contradiction in positions on import policy between merchants and industrialists. Meanwhile the interests of the workers, which are always to demand increased wages and compensations and reduced work times, are homogeneous.

In spite of this bitter fact, I consider that the coordination which exists between the chambers of commerce and industry and the societies of industrialists, merchants and banks is reasonable and acceptable.

Dominance by the Beirut Chamber

Question: What is your position on some people's statement that the chairman of the Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry, Mr 'Adnan Qassar, dominates the activities of the other chairmen of chambers of commerce and industry and creates reluctance on the part of some of these chamber chairmen to cooperate firmly with the other economic committees?

Answer: I see no dominance and I see no reluctance. There is a difference in views between Chairman 'Adnan Qassar and one of the three other chamber chairmen. This is logical, because the Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry is the biggest Lebanese chamber and by virtue of the importance of the Beirut chamber and by virtue of its situation in the center of Lebanon its activity seems bigger and its role greater. Opponents and critics must emerge before every power in the world.

Smuggling

Question: The problem of the smuggling of goods to Lebanon which became blatant in 1975 is still broad in scope. What are the late developments in this?

Answer: Smuggling is smuggling; there are no statistics on the quantities of goods smuggled. However, in the past 4 years it has certainly become a dangerous operation, threatening national trade and industry, because at least about 20 percent of total imports into Lebanon enter the country through smuggling without payment of any customs duties to the government.

Smuggling is a basic security problem more than an economic one. Therefore we are now making an attempt to remedy it with those who are active politically and in security terms.

Question: Are your efforts for example concentrated on forming a national unity government or are they more urgent than the formation of a government?

Answer: We hope that a government of national unity will be formed, because such a government might solve most of the smuggling problem, if not all of it. However, there is no good our making efforts in this field because the problem of formation of a government is bigger than we are.

Our efforts which we are making quietly, are concentrated, through effective politically active persons, on attempting to create a radical peaceful solution to limit smuggling.

I do not want to expand on a description of these efforts, lest I stir up sensitivities here or there.

It should be stressed that all labor unions and all economic bodies are against smuggling and that all political and party activities share our view that smuggling is harmful to national industry and trade.

However, there are circumstances and conditions which are causing some politically active persons temporarily to hesitate to adopt decisive positions to prevent smuggling. We hope to arrive at solutions in a manner where the fox will not die and the sheep will not disappear.

Question: It is said that some politically active persons are in favor of preventing smuggling if it is easy to create "Lebanese financial resources" for political parties which will enable them to do without the "duties" they collect from the "private ports," on grounds that these parties do not get foreign oil assistance or international aid. Is your effort being made in this framework?

Answer: That question revolves about details. I have no answer to it. Let us try, because our goal is to solve a problem, not create problems.

BANKER DISCUSSES POSITIVE DEVELOPMENTS IN BUSINESS

Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 13 Sep 80 p 7

/Article by Habib al-Bustani: "Lebanese Banks abroad Have Been Active in order To Survive: 'Ashi: I Have Participated in Holding onto Clients"/

/Excerpt from Text/ During the Lebanese war, around 1975, work stopped on the street of banks in Beirut, prompting the bank owners to think of moving their banking activity in the desire to guarantee the course of activity and work outside the borders of the nation. Activity in branches of Lebanese banks in some Arab countries was stimulated.

However, this was not enough to respond to the needs of clients, especially well-heeled ones, outside the Arab countries, most of whom sought refuge in Europe in general and France in particular. Lebanese banks opened in France.

On this subject, and other banking matters, we had a meeting with Dr George 'Ashi, manager of a bank operating in Lebanon and member of the Society of Bank Owners.

Questions and Answers

/Question/ What is the reason for establishing Lebanese banks abroad and how large is their number?

/Answer/ The basic motive for establishing Lebanese banks abroad, especially in Paris, is, on the one hand, to create a center outside Lebanon containing all the services needed to pursue the bank's activity in a country where all the services the bank requires are available, and, on the other, in a country where the biggest number of bank customers reside who emigrated from the nation temporarily or for good as a result of the events which occurred during the years of the trials. Therefore Paris was chosen. What made matters easy was French legislation, which encouraged the opening of banks, not in the form of branches of Lebanese banks but in the form of French joint-stock companies subject to French law. On this basis, as of the latter part of 1975, Lebanese banks or joint banks existing in Lebanon started to establish subsidiary companies for themselves in Paris subject to French law. As regards the number of these banks, they total about 10.

Conditions for Establishing Banks in Paris

/Question/ What conditions do the French authorities set forth for establishing such banks, and are there difficulties?

/Answer/ The conditions applied to these banks are general ones adopted from the French law and statutes in force. The minimum capital must be 7.5 million French francs and the agreement of the National Monetary Council and the Bank of France to the measures to be taken to establish the bank, including the bank management, must be obtained.

The Bank of France has now started tightening up. If the bank it is intended to establish is a Lebanese one, it must have the participation of a large acceptable French bank in France. Such conditions did not exist before. The banks established recently have been companies belonging to big bank organizations and companies. For example, when the Credit Suisse pour le Moyen Orient bank, 96 percent owned by Credit Suisse, was opened there was no need for any conditions because the bank had international support and sufficient expertise, and the same was true in the case of Credit Commerciale de France. However, there are Lebanese banks which have been requested to provide French participation through a French bank.

/Question/ Is there fear on the part of the French of the danger of an invasion by Lebanese banks?

/Answer/ The Lebanese banks which open in Paris are not aimed at speculating against the French banks there. They open for Lebanese and Arab clients, to finance the operations of Lebanese who are residents and expatriates in France, Africa or America, and to finance operations Arabs perform. Therefore the fact is that the Lebanese banks do not take away any of the business of the major French banks.

Advantages of Banks abroad

/Question/ It is said that Lebanese banks abroad give more facilities than other banks.

/Answer/ Lebanese banks open for specific clients, which helps them to know the clients more exactly. Their knowledge of the condition of clients, through lengthy dealings with them,especially their knowledge of the clients' properties in Lebanon and other Arab countries, by the nature of the case makes them better able to give appropriate facilities suitable to their conditions, which are not available in big French banks which rely only on the individual's assets and possessions in France.

/Question/ What is the effect of opening the banks on the Lebanese economy?

/Answer/ The opening of Lebanese banks abroad has helped develop the economy, since that has helped retain the clients of the Lebanese banking system abroad and keep them within its area of influence. At the same time, the profits which these banks realize are profits which return to Lebanon through the Lebanese participants, although these banks have performed services, elevated Lebanon's name, shown the world the Lebanese ability to adjust to various circumstances and conditions, and have shown the degree of solidity of the Lebanese banking system.

/Question/ What is the number of Lebanese employees in banks abroad?

/Answer/ Essentially, when the opening of Lebanese banks in Paris started, between 1975 and 1979, recourse was made to a large number of Lebanese employees because bank street closed during this period; there were no banks except on that street, and their closing resulted in a large number of unemployed workers, until these banks opened branches in a number of areas to adjust to the new condition in the capital and enable the largest possible number of clients to benefit from banking services. At this time, the number of employees was abundant, permitting the banks that opened abroad to seek recourse in its employees in Lebanon. Likewise, the presence of a large number of employees who were receiving money but not working made it necessary for the banks abroad to seek recourse in these people. In exchange, the French authorities let this pass at first.

In 1975-76 France was extremely tolerant with Lebanese regarding their residence, facilitating their affairs and providing for their children in schools. Among those who were blessed with the facilities were the Lebanese banks and their employees. Now, however, there is a quota; the ratio of non-French employees may not exceed 35 percent of the total bank employees.

Without a doubt, the banks which have opened outside Lebanon need to have a Lebanese management system to deal with Lebanese and Arab clients. Fluency in Arabic is essential, as are the banking techniques in use in Lebanon. These techniques are very flexible; the bank can tailor banking services to the requirements of the patron. Therefore there is no way to avoid employing Lebanese workers.

/Question/ Do you believe that opening these banks will be for a specific period?

/Answer/ Banks do not open in a temporary fashion. Banks are not like shops; if they open, they stay open. Among the things which are not at all liked in the banking world is closing a branch or banking company belonging to a bank. Thus these banks opened in accordance with newly arising circumstances under the pressure of need but did not open to close down, even after the disappearance of the need and the pressure. Banks open with flexibility, in view of the circumstances Lebanon is passing through. When banking activity inside Lebanon is paralyzed the ability of Lebanese banks abroad reaches its maximum. This ability declines when matters return to their normal state inside Lebanon.

An Unsound Situation

/Question/ What is your opinion regarding the banking situation in Lebanon from the standpoint of work?

/Answer/ The banks' work in Lebanon is active. During periods of inflation, banks function, profit and expand the their deposits expand also. However, all the banks' work is now based on financing: financing old projects, financing emergency activities, providing the routine requirements of citizens. In other words, there is no new investment creating production and increasing the surplus national product which is to be considered an element in developing the Lebanese economy. There is a turnover in the economy despite the existence of inflation. Lebanon imports 3 billion and has now started importing 6 billion; tomorrow it will be 8 billion. Thus the value of imports is increasing, prices are rising, inflation is occurring and profits are rising. In my view this economic situation is unsound. A country which wants to prosper must rely on production in its various sectors, industrial, agricultural, service and so on. This is not happening now in Lebanon. What we are seeing is the continued use of what had existed and the assets remaining, and this constitutes a very grave phenomenon.

/Question/ So there has been a transformation as regards the investment of bank funds since the time prior to the events. What is the banks' reaction? Have they resorted to foreign or perhaps Arab investments?

/Answer/ The fact is that participation of the Lebanese banks in existence here in international foreign financing activities is not great but without a doubt it exists. The law and the statutes allow that and the banks opening to the outer world conduct operations like that.

/Question/ What about the banks which have opened branches for themselves abroad?

/Answer/ Alongside the banks which have opened subsidiary banking companies in Europe, especially in Paris, there are banks which have opened branches and subsidiary companies in Arab countries, especially in areas which permitted the opening of branches even before 2 years ago, such as Dubai, Sharjah, and Abu Dhabi. But the banks which have opened branches in Arab countries have managed to provide the main centers in Lebanon with foreign financing.

Lebanese Law Is More Flexible Than French Law

/Question/ Is there a difference between French law and Lebanese law as regards Banks?

/Answer/ Lebanese law was taken basically from French and Belgian legislation, but in France there is something which does not exist here. There is oversight on currency, meaning that there is a corpus of legislation necessary for oversight regarding currency and regarding lending. Thus currency oversight exists and Lebanon does not need it. In other words, the banking system in Lebanon is more flexible and less subject to severe stipulations.

Deposit Activity Is 20 Billion

/Question/ So Lebanon will regain capital soon in view of its flexible banking system?

/Answer/ Lebanon has not lost any capital. If we calculate the deposits in Lebanon before 1975 in comparison with today we will see that they are three times what existed in 1975. Some capital has left and other capital has come in. The capital which has come into Lebanon and is helping to stimulate deposit activity now exceeds 20 billion pounds, which is a fantastic figure in terms of the conceptions which had been set forth for a country like Lebanon. Unfortunately, most of the capital belongs to resident or expatriate Lebanese /abroad/. Without a doubt Arab and foreign deposits are few, but their share never was high. Talk about Arab capital in Lebanon was an illusion; at its maximum it did not exceed 10 percent. Thus one must not depend on Arab deposits in Lebanon. We have the deposits of Lebanese working in Arab countries, Africa and so forth, which constitute the major portion. The major blessing which always must be emphasized and which makes the Lebanese banking system an interesting one is currency freedom. Lebanon is distinguished by a currency freedom which does not exist in any other country of the world; this is the secret of the survival of the banking system in Lebanon, the secret of the prosperity of the bank market and the secret of the increase in the Lebanese people's deposits.

/Question/ Recently the funds of the Iranians in the United States were frozen; perhaps that will have an effect on Arab funds in the future. Is there a Lebanese or Arab banking initiative and policy to correct such a situation and attract this capital?

/Answer/ Without a doubt the danger exists. The danger of freezing foreign funds as regards the subjects of a number of countries is relevant. This occurs in wars between the subjects of enemy countries. Ordinarily the depositor rectifies this situation by transferring his funds to another country but I do not believe that Lebanon in its current circumstances can play a role in this field. For example Iranian funds did not seek refuge in Lebanon. The Iranians' funds sought refuge in France, Switzerland and other countries.

STATE INDEBTEDNESS TO NATIONAL SOCIAL SECURITY FUND GIVEN

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 8 Aug 80 p 5

[Text] Total state indebtedless to the National Social Security Fund through the end of 1979 reached nearly 39 million pounds. This amount should have been paid in the first part of the current year at the latest.

The director general of the fund informed the [fund's] Finance Commission of this during one of its hearings. He explained the accrued debts of the state as the largest employer in the country. It pays dues for both full-time and part-time employees, whose number is about 18,000 and are not members of the civil service. The state also contributes 35 percent of the cost of health services.

It is estimated that dues owed by the state will rise to 75 million pounds by the end of 1980, and to 116 million pounds by the end of 1981, due to the rise in wages and costs of health insurance.

The director of the fund proposed that a sum of not less than 70 million pounds be set aside in next year's state budget to cover the balance owed for 1979 and 1980.

It is understood that the chairman of the Finance Commission of the fund, Dr Khattar Shibli (who is at the same time director general of the Finance Ministry) promised to form a committee representing the Finance Ministry, the National Social Security Fund and the Audit Office to propose firm guidelines regulating relations between the fund and the treasury.

It should be noted that in contrast to past years, the 1980 budget did not include any provision related to the payment of state obligations to the fund.

ROLE OF MERCHANT MARINE IN BOLSTERING ECONOMY PRAISED

Khartoum AL-AYYAM in Arabic 29 Aug 80 p 4

/Article by Muhammad Ushik Hashal: "Sudanese Shipping Lines Are One of the Pillars of the National Economy"/

/Text/ Although the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company management prefers to work in silence, on grounds that that is better, in its view, since the nature of its activity requires that, one must pause before the main aspects of this economic edifice which has started to be influential, with an effectiveness which has developed clear features, in a stretch of the course of our national economy which has not been easy. We must pause briefly to review the growth of the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company, which we all know is the sole government company operating in the sphere of marine transport and the biggest marine transport operation in the Sudan now, and the stages which it has passed through and the successes it has achieved. To that end I sat down with Mr Salah-al-Din 'Umar 'Abd-al 'Aziz, director general of the company, in his office in Port Sudan, after the cluster of eight new ships had been rounded out by the arrival of the vessel al-Nil al Azraq the last week of June.

The Beginning of the Meeting

The beginning of the meeting there occurred when Mr Salah met me with his familiar simplicity and permanent smile. He set aside part of his time, in spite of the pressure of work and the continuous meetings he holds every day with officials in various sections of the company to learn about the course of work and follow it up in order to reduce all difficulties which might obstruct the smooth flow of performance in the company. I started my conversation with him by venturing to ask the man a question on the history and the manner of growth of the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company and the foundations on which it was based.

Mr Salah arranged himself in his seat and pondered awhile, as he searched his memory, and said, "This company was established for the first time in 1962 with a capital of about half a million pounds, divided equally between the Sudanese government and the Yugoslav government." Mr Salah says that the first ship to enter service was the vessel Sinnar, which reached Port Sudan for the first time on 23 April 1962. Its capacity was 4,950 deadweight tons. It was then followed by the vessels Kordofan, 4,980 deadweight tons in capacity, al-Jazirah, also 4,980 tons, Shindi, 7,601 deadweight tons, Maridi, 7,648 deadweight tons, Niyala, 8,563 deadweight tons, and Omdurman, 13,716 deadweight tons.

Development and Termination of the Partnership

The general manager continued his discussion, stating "The development the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company witnessed during the period between 1967 and this year, 1980, after the arrival of the eight multi-purpose new vessels was complete, also witnessed the termination of the partnership with the Yugoslav government in 1967 after all the demands of the Yugoslav party had been met by the company. At that time the capacity of the fleet did not exceed 20,000 tons and the ships were four in number, the Sinnar, Kordofan, al Jazirah, and Arkawit, which subsequently sank." He declared that the capacity of the fleet has now risen, with the arrival of the new ships in service, to 153,000 tons and the number of ships has risen to 15. He mentioned that the new ships are the al-Abyad, the Dongola, the al-Qadarif, the Marwi, and the Darfur. The capacity of each comes to 12,200 deadweight tons. There is the vessel Khartoum, whose capacity comes to 14,400 tons and there are the two ships al-Nil al-Abyad and al-Nil al-Azraq, which are roll on roll off ships with a capacity of 12,600 deadweight tons each. Mr.Salah stated that the rate of increase in the capacity of the merchant marine fleet rose above its level at the dissolution of the partnership in 1967 by 600 percent.

The Successes

We asked Mr Salah 'Umar about the successes the company realized in the field of sea transport and he said, "The company as a Sudanese marine transport firm now enjoys a very good international reputation and a high degree of confidence from companies operating in the field of marine transport, since we, for our part have been able to cover some of our country's requirements in this sphere, transporting a large volume of our exports and imports, of which about 50 percent are transported, thus saving our country more than $100 million a year in hard currency which had been paid to other bodies for ocean freight, in addition to the revenues arising from chartering, concentrating our services on all shipping routes, and competing in them as a competent carrier enjoying international confidence and observable capability in spite of the intensity of competition from foreign companies." He stressed "In spite of that also the company offers Sudanese citizens, especially those who are active in the export area, the best bids available in the marine transport market. One believes that it has been important that there should be a minimum national commitment toward the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company in the Sudanese private sector, on grounds that it is the sole national marine carrier in the Sudan, so that it can achieve its national goals of saving the hard currency that is paid to non-Sudanese carriers for ocean freight and can also take part in greater and greater fashion in developing the national economy." Mr Salah declared that "the two vessels Khartoum and Omdurman have been put up for international charter, and stressed that the vessel Khartoum was chartered in the past 2 months by the state of Kuwait and People's Republic of China to bring it cargoes from the United States of America.

Other Results

The director general of the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company, Mr Salah-al-Din 'Umar 'Abd-al 'Aziz, continued by stating "The positive results are also considered among the successes which inspire pride and respect. The first is that the proportion of Sudanese workers in this company on sea and on land now totals 95 percent as compared with 5 percent when the company was first established and this has occurred as a result of a firm training plan the company has followed, observing commitment to the competence incentives in use internationally, especially in the marine field." He stressed the continuity of this training plan and declared "The coming 3 years will mark the end of the journey in Sudanizing all the positions in the company 100 percent." He stated "The company, since its establishment, has created labor which had not been taken into account, helping provide stability for hundreds of families and also creating qualified Sudanese staffs in the marine transport field."

The director general of the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company talked about the shipping routes, pointing out, "The company runs a basic shipping route, the Red Sea-United Kingdom-northerwestern Europe route," pointing out "This area accounts for the greatest percentage of the Sudan's import and export trade, totalling 40 percent of it, and all of that is transported on the Sudanese /Lines/. The company also operates a shipment every 10 days in each direction." He said, "The operating capacity of Sudanese Shipping Lines vessels exceeds the requirement of the route it operates on, giving the services of the commercial fleet of the Islamic port of Jiddah in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and the ports of North Yemen the same number of shipments as the Port Sudan harbor." He states, "The Sudanese Shipping Lines' activity is not just restricted to operating ships. It goes beyond that to functioning as an agent for about 30 major international shipping companies." He mentioned, "They received in 1978 190 ships in addition to those of the company, or one ship every other day." The man said, "Receiving the ship means answering its captain's request for fuel, supplies, unloading its cargo, creating cargo for it, representing it in collecting freight charges, and other various activities of performing as agent." He stresses, "The persons delegating the agency functions always record a high degree of satisfaction for the excellent services they receive."

Transudan

We turned the conversation to the Transudan Company, and Mr Salah said "It is a new company with a legal personality, one of the establishments of the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company." The man stated, "The development of means of transport is no longer restricted to transportation from port to port but also operates from factory to warehouse to specific sites in the receiving country, which has made companies supply new ships with a thousand containers." He considered that there will be no benefit in these containers if their use ended at Port Sudan. To that end, he said "They have established the Transudan Company and supplied it with a fleet of trucks by which transport operations may be continued." He pointed out "These trucks make four monthly trips between Port Sudan and Khartoum-Madani, shipping 500 tons per trip." He stressed, "This company also will undergo development and modernization in order to keep abreast of the country's requirements after the preparation of container storehouses is completed in Port Sudan and Khartoum and they are outfitted with the equipment they need."

An Aside

It remains for us to point out that the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company, between its establishment in 1962 and the end of last year, realized revenues totalling 81 million pounds. Revenues last year alone totalled 17 603,844 pounds; the company's net profits in the same period came to 19 million pounds, of which 5,724,891 were last year alone. The total foreign currency the company saved between its establishment and the end of last year came to 51 million pounds, all of which would have gone to foreign companies were it not for the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company fleet. We must point out, as we conclude the discussion on the Sudanese Shipping Line facility, that the company faces severe competition and that, in spite of the faith and solidity of the men managing it as their national duty, it is mandatory that the efforts of all sincere Sudanese businessmen, especially those working in the export-import field, act in solidarity with more abundant national commitment, which will motivate them to allocate all their exports to this company so it will be their carrier, in order to save every millieme which goes to foreign bodies. Let us not forget, either, to urge officials at the summit of power to think clearly about the matter so that they will be able to give incentives for further cooperation with this company, if only by using such encouragement incentives given to every exporter to transport all his exports via this company as reduction of all types of the tax he pays, for example, so that he will be able to break the thorn of intense competition this company faces, preserving the hard currency which goes out of the Sudan in the form of ocean freight charges, in order to maintain our abilities and provide another incentive for our domestic economy of which none of us denies the Sudanese Shipping Lines Company has become a strong pillar. At the end, it is necessary to say a final word which we direct to Mr Salah-al-Din 'Umar 'Abd-al-'Aziz, apologizing to him for delaying in publishing this meeting because of special circumstances which accompanies us as we were in the process of preparing it for publication, and thanking him for the generosity with which he received us, giving us an opportunity to learn much that the reader did not know about this company.

MZALI ADDRESSES POPULACE OF SILIANA

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 28 Sep 80 p 1,5

[Excerpts] --Make the young aware of the advantage in choosing manual work.

--The administration must be in the service of the people and not the contrary.

--The people know how to distinguish between the sincere official and the charlatan.

Mr Mohamed Mzali, the prime minister and secretary general of the Party spoke yesterday to the citizens of the Governorate of Siliana during a people's meeting which was held in the Siliana House of Culture, where there were also present: Mr M'hamed Chaker, minister of Justice, Lasaad Ben Osman, minister of Agriculture, Abdelaziz Ben Dhia, minister of Higher Education and Scientific Research and a number of national and regional officials.

Mr Mohamed Mzali began by transmitting to the audience the greetings of the Supreme Combattant.

"The inspection trip which I am undertaking in the Governorate of Siliana, accompanied by a certain number of colleagues and officials on the regional level is only one proof of the interest which the government has in the region and its interest in bringing together to a greater extent conditions favoring its development and placing it definitively on the path of progress and prosperity," declared Mr Mzali, who then continued:

"Because of a lack of time, my visit was limited to a few delegations. I promise you that I will visit the rest of the delegations later."

"This visit and the popular character which we tried to give it constitute a reaffirmation of the Bourguibian and Destourian influence which was based from the beginning of our struggle for liberation and development on direct contact."

Mr Mzali continued: "Such visits aim first of all at increasing the number of contacts with the population in order for us to gain first hand knowledge of the situation. We are not content during these visits to look at a few graphs and figures and charts.

"We believe that the popular masses must be kept informed of the reality of the situation and that they can contribute to changing it.

"The state can, relying on experts and technicians, build roads, dams and factories, but such accomplishments can only be valuable and beneficial if the popular masses feel that they are involved, that they have a role to play, that they have their say.

"Without participation, the popular masses are in danger of going off in one direction, while the technicians and experts go off in another.

"That is what has happened in certain countries such as Iran.

"The Shah had tried to make of Iran the strongest country in the Third World. He was presumptuous and vain, up to the point of saying that Iran would be the fifth most important country in the world.

"But the Shah had not tried to understand the real desires and aspirations of the Iranian people.

"The government," added Mr Mzali, "is anxious to follow the Bourguibian approach. It considers, therefore, the solution to the psychological problems as being of prime importance, which must be acted upon now and feels it must speak frankly with the people about the numerous obstacles which are holding back the concretization of integral development.

"It is also essential that the popular masses know that the officials are determined to reduce these obstacles as soon as possible and with a sincere will.

"We know that there exist problems and we recognize their existance. Because all it takes is to have a leader visit a region for letters from the citizens to rain down on him. This shows that the situation is not as good as we have a tendency to believe and that some leaders abstain from meeting with citizens and from speaking with them frankly and listening to their grievances.

"These numerous letters prove without any doubt the existence of certain problems of a psychological nature. I do not reproach the citizens for sending me their written grievances. My reproach is directed toward those officials who avoid direct contact with the citizens in order to know their situation better.

"That explains, moreover, the interest which we attach to the realization of decentralization, to the Adminstrative Reform, and to the services which the public officials and the administration are called upon to render the citizens so that the administrative apparatus may be placed in the service of the people and not the other way around.

"Our administration has become bogged down in structures and paperwork, which has tended to worsen the situation. Because of this, the government has taken a series of measures aimed at reducing the delays and simplifying procedures. But the slowness of the administration is reducing the effectiveness of the political desire for various reasons, the most important of which is psychological, that is on the level of prejudices, traditions and errors in value judgments which our minds are affected by."

Mr Mohamed Mzali asked, in this context, the civil servants to treat the citizens with respect and to serve them quickly. He added: "We must restore magnanimity in our hearts and a deepened feeling of solidarity and affection between citizens. That is a psychological task which requires the combined efforts of all our citizens.

"A minister cannot accomplish this task alone, all officials at whatever level they function are called upon to intensify the efforts in education and orientation in order to make our reform of administrative structures succeed and to make of them instruments in the service of the citizens. We must also reinforce our contact with the popular masses and be sensitive to their problems and to the most appropriate means to find adequate solutions to them. The letters which are given me here and there show that some citizens have problems which remain unresolved and that it is because some officials have not done their job and have not taken the trouble to meet the citizens so as to get to know their concerns and be able to help them solve their problems.

The prime minister added: "The problems become less acute when each official accepts his true role and tries to get in contact with the citizens whenever it is necessary. Actually, every official must have a true understanding of his responsibilities and must be present wherever duty requires him to be, that is, close to those for whom he is responsible. To keep in permanent contact with them, and to keep abreast of their problems and their concerns. It was Bourguiba who taught us that principle and who continues to teach it to us.

"We must be in contact with the people, because that contributes to strengthening the Party, to assuring its influence and its duration. The Party can be strong and overcome underdevelopment only if it has the confidence and the support of the population and that is possible only to the extent that the Party is in the service of the people, and its officials and staff members feel mobilized to serve the higher interest of the nation. Any person who wants to take on a responsibility must prove himself worthy of it through hard work and by furnishing the required effort. But for any person who tries to reach other ends, he should look for another activity more in keeping with his ambitions.

"That is why I reaffirm the necessity of choosing the officials in a democratic way and taking advantage of congresses and general assemblies, of party organizations to ask for an accounting from the officials, frankly and courageously.

"I would like," added Mr Mzali, "to mention with satisfaction the new positive climate which I have noted in Siliana. That is the reason the new governor visited the different regions and suspended a policeman for having violated the rights of the citizens.

"I have been very happy to learn that the governor urged the officials in all sectors to carry out their mission correctly and that he criticized any official who neglects his duty, blaming him at that time.

"Our relationships," he added, "must come out of our work and not from personal affinities. The person who is one of us is the person who demonstrates his seriousness and devotion in his work. Our sympathy must go out only to those who work for the good of the country.

"That is why I take satisfaction in the fact that the new governor and the officials of the Coordinating Committee have become aware, through direct contact, of the problems of our citizens.

"My wish is to see the regional staff bring their support to the governor, in order to win the psychological battle because we can only succeed in our development efforts if we create a favorable psychological climate, suited to the reinforcement of confidence, to reawakening the enthusiasm of the citizens and strengthening in them the will to accomplish and to succeed, while realizing that the political action of the Party is based on direct contact with the people, aimed at raising their level.

Mr Mohamed Mzali emphasized in addition the government's desire to promote the agricultural sector in the governorate of Siliana by strengthening regional development. "To do this, we have taken several steps. Other steps will also be taken in the near future. We are going to direct our efforts essentially toward the promotion of the farmer and the improvement of his standard of living. We are also going to encourage the establishment of industries involved in processing agricultural products and to work for the creation of middle sized industries in the governorate while at the same time giving serious attention to the housing sector."

"President Bourguiba, moreover, gave instructions for revising government policy in the area of low income housing. It is possible to take steps to reduce the delay required by CNEL [expansion unknown] for the granting of loans to savers. These delays could be reduced from 4 to only 2 years.

"In addition, we are going to continue our efforts to promote the education sector. It is in that way that each delegation of the governorate of Siliana now has a secondary school, with the exception of the delegation of Kisra, which will have its secondary school in the next few years. We also plan to establish a technical high school in Siliana."

"The prime minister emphasized on this subject the concern of the government to encourage vocational training and employment so that each young person may find a job once his training is completed."

and Mr Mohamed Mzali added: "We must revise our methods of action. The Destourian cells and all the organizations are called upon by us to help so that the education dispensed by the Ministry of National Education, by the Department of Social Affairs or of Agriculture is adapted to our needs and that it encourages a spirit of initiative.

"The objective which is being pursued," continued the prime minister, "is that of convincing the students graduating from the schools to remain in their area and to orient themselves toward productive industrial branches with all the difficulties and all the constraints which that implies.

"Asking for help from management and from the heads of businesses in the creation of jobs for young people, we are working so as to make young people become aware of the benefits in choosing manual work, struggling against an old-fashioned attitude which gives more prestige to administrative jobs," the prime minister added.

"It is in the advanced countries that one finds the best examples of caring for those who take up trades such as electrician and plumber whose earnings are far higher than the salaries of teachers and certain categories of civil servants.

"Change, moreover, has become possible thanks to the transformation in thinking, the change in the idea held about certain jobs.

"What we are suffering from in Tunisia," added Mr Mzali, "is rather slow change in the thinking of certain Tunisians who do not place themselves in harmony with the needs of modern life.

"Today, we need more than ever before manual workers, particularly in the agricultural sector, where the average age of the workers is on the order of 55 years. Who will replace them in a few years?" asked the prime minister, who pointed out that we are seeing a change in thinking. "Actually," he said, "this morning, I met in Oued Lakhmes, a farmer who, with the help of his son, is working, with remarkable enthusiasm, the land of his ancestors. That forces us, as leaders, to create a revolution on the psychological level, to analyze the situation and to understand the true problems which bear on social action, such as the role of the woman in the home and in family planning and the status of handicapped and disabled people.

"These are the kinds of problems which the Party and the militants must be concerned with--that is our conception of political action," he said.

The prime minister also added: "I am happy to find this positive atmosphere and to see that we are going in the right direction. I reaffirm what I have already said, that is, the government is counting on the governors, the delegates, the secretaries general of the Coordinating Committees and all the other officials, to be, each of them an example to be followed concerning their attachment to the Bourguibian method of direct contact with the masses. They must find solutions to the psychological problems, must listen to the citizens, speak with them frankly and act so as to make them aware of the real problems which we are facing. As for the problems of development, be reassured, because Bourguiba is there, thinking of you and your problems.

"I am anxious," added Mr Mzali, "to put my finger on the origin of the problem because I am one of you and we must help each other in order to combat underdevelopment in us and around us, calling for the good and getting rid of the bad, by adopting as our motto, sincerity in words and loyalty in deeds, spreading high moral values and by caring about the higher interest of the nation, of the invulnerability of Tunisia and the future of the rising generation.

"That is what gives meaning to our struggle and what can satisfy our conscience and our people, who appreciate fully our efforts because they know how to distinguish the sincere official from the charlatan.

"If the people trusted Bourguiba during their national struggle, it was because they were convinced that Bourguiba was sincere and he spoke the language of sincerity. They felt that that sort of language which came from the heart was not the language of a hypocrite. On the contrary, Bourguiba was the first to make use of this language because he had had to endure the rigors of colonial cells and jails.

"He had made use of it because the destiny of his people concerned him. That is the reason the people granted him unlimited affection and embarked upon the path that he had chosen.

"We would like each one of us to take Bourguiba as an example and take the route he showed us, always remaining loyal to the people, sincere in his relations with them and devoted to their service. The future can then only offer hope.

"Iam relying on you," he said, "and I am sure that all the officials in the governorate, with governor at their head, are prepared to serve you. I remind you, moreover, that the governor represents the chief of state in the region and that he is the man in whom the government has placed its confidence."

Speaking of decentralization, the prime minister said that it did not mean the creation of a state in each region. It was instituted for the purpose of bringing together the administration of the citizen and the management structures of the governor so that the governor can make use on the spot of all the possibilities which are offered him without having to go to Tunis and so that he can assure the coordination between all these potentialities in order to obtain the best results.

"In our opinion, decentralization means then bringing together the services of the administration and the citizens and simplifying administrative procedures.

"Therefore, I must rely, for this, on the governor and the delegates in the matter of political and administrative action as well as the Destourian cells and the national organizations and the Union of Youth Organizations, which are being called upon to be the "motor," the conscience of the people and the "transmission belt" to take the aspirations of the citizens to the officials and the directives of the officials to the citizens, explaining to them the content of the programs of the government and informing them of the obstacles with which we are confronted."

The prime minister added: "As I said yesterday, the mission of the Party does not consist in directing.

"On the other hand, it must lead a effort toward reflection, creation and verification. Moreover, President Bourguiba in person reaffirmed it on many occasions and I am merely reminding those who may have forgotten."

"The prime minister, in addition, wished the governorate of Siliana a happy future and expressed the conviction that by joining efforts, by winning the psychological battle and by making a healthy climate reign, the impossible will be realized.

"I hope to be with you again in a few months as I promised the citizens of other delegations," he concluded.

Mr Mohamed Mzali then decorated certain militants with the order of Chevalier of the Order of Independence.

EUROPEAN LOANS FOR POWER PROJECTS GRANTED

London 8 DAYS in English 4 Oct 80 p 23

[Text] THE EUROPEAN Investment Bank (EIB), the European Community's financing institution, has granted a loan worth 4 million European units of account (1 EUA - $1.3) to help build an electricity network in the Zerga region, to the north east of Amman.

The loan is for 15 years, with interest at 9.15 per cent, after deduction of a two per cent interest subsidy drawn from Community budgetary resources. It has been given to the Jordanian government under the terms of the EEC-Jordan Cooperation Agreement, which also includes financial and technical assistance. The EEC loan will be channelled to the Jordanian Electricity Power Company which holds the domestic and industrial electricity supply concession for Amman.

The project, which will cost about EUA 8.6m, covers the construction of two 33kV sub-stations, some 30km of underground cable and 80km of low-voltage power lines. The project will start in late 1982, and should accelerate industrial development in the Amman-Zerga corridor, Jordan's largest industrial belt.

EIB has also granted a loan to Lebanon, worth 3 million EUA. The loan will provide part-finance for two new 125 MW generators for the thermal power station at Zouk, near Beirut. The project is estimated to cost approximately EUA 140m. The two new generators are scheduled to come onstream at the end of 1983.

The loan has been made available for 14 years, at an interest rate of nine per cent. The European community has agreed to bear a two per cent interest subsidy. The loan, made under the terms of the EEC-Lebanon cooperation agreement, will be given directly to the Lebanese Council for on-lending to Electricite du Liban. The credit is part of an EIB deal which could amount to as much as EUA 15m.

The Zouk power project is a key feature of the Lebanese government's efforts to pump new life into the economy. It will be the second Lebanese power station to be built with EEC bank aid. A total of EUA 20m was given to the Jieh power station, also built by Electricite du Liban.

ISLAMIC INVESTMENT COMPANY'S VENTURES ON RISE

London 8 DAYS in English 27 Sep 80 pp 34-35

[Article by Phil Finnegan]

[Text]

PROSPECTS are looking bright for the world's first large investment company run strictly according to Islamic tenets. After pioneering the development of Islamic bonds and insurance, the company is planning to embark upon the first major Islamic industrial and commercial ventures.

The Islamic Investment Company (IIC) was set up in 1978, in the Bahamas so it could receive the tax benefits of Bahamian incorporation. Its avowed goal was to establish subsidiary companies throughout the Islamic world, the first of which was the Islamic Investment Company of the Gulf. IIC's board of directors is headed by Prince Mohammed al Faisal, son of the late King Faisal, and chairman of the International Association of Islamic Banks.

Since its formation, the IIC has offered a number of Islamic bonds or investment trusts, in which the giving or taking of interest is strictly avoided in accordance with the teachings of the Quran.

The first offering, in early 1979, was for one and three year bonds while the second was for five year bonds. Each bond is divided into 'loan' and 'participation'. The loan is repaid without interest when the bond reaches maturity and the portion of the bond devoted to participation will share in any profits or losses accruing from investments made by the company.

The investor can choose options of 75 per cent participation and 25 per cent loan, 50 per cent participation and 50 per cent loan, 25 per cent participation and 75 per cent loan or a 100 per cent loan.

The company also offered the first Islamic life insurance in October 1979. The trust opens and closes quarterly, allowing new participants to enter throughout its 20-year life.

Participants contribute $1,000 each year for 20 years. This sum is returned to the participant at the end of the period, plus any profits made from its investment. If a person dies before the period is up, the full $20,000 is paid to the participant's heirs.

This scheme is financed by a special 'solidarity fund' to which all participants contribute five per cent of their annual $1,000. The trust is limited to applicants aged 20 to 45, but a later offering is planned to cover those from 20 to 55 years in two separate pools, the first covering applicants aged from 20 to 45 and the second those from 45 to 55. In this way the younger applicants will not suffer from the participation of older individuals.

The IIC also plans to offer car insurance and, like the life insurance, it will be cooperative. Participants will make yearly payments for the first five years. If they make no accident claim during that time they will begin receiving free insurance coverage and eventually receive profits from invested funds.

If the insured party has an accident, then the trust will cover his claim and he will begin contributing to the trust again for five years. If the insured party withdraws at any time he will receive his funds and any profits.

There have been two offerings of a trust designed especially for Islamic banks. The bankers' financial certificate is issued in denominations of $100,000. Banks are allowed to withdraw their money from this trust on a monthly basis. The primary aim of this issue is to help Islamic banks solve one of their most pressing problems — liquidity.

The Bank of America and Bank Suisse Italiano are participating in this offer by guaranteeing the Islamic banks purchasing the financial certificate access to withdrawal rights of up to four times their bond's face value. The two western banks have discovered that encouraging Islamic banking can be profitable because it gives them a chance to meet wealthy clients from the Middle East and at the same time gives them a great deal of prestige in the area.

Proceeds from the sale of bonds go only into very safe investments such as the leasing of computers, railway cars and heavy construction machinery. However, according to Ibrahim Kamel, executive vice president of the IIC, once the company is firmly established investments will be made in other ventures, even in such speculative areas as oil and mineral prospecting. Kamel estimates that the IIC is currently getting a 15 to 17 per cent return on investments.

Bond offerings planned to finance large scale industrial ventures, run according to Islamic principles, have encountered serious difficulties. Negotiations with Volkswagen to set up a joint car assemoly plant to produce VW Beetles in Egypt broke down last year. Volkswagen would have provided the machinery while the IIC was to provide the land and some liquid funds for construction. When these funds were exhausted, IIC was to have made another bond issue for the project instead of resorting to an interest-bearing loan.

'Volkswagen was keen on working with us, but they could not understand how we could avoid resorting to commercial bank loans,' said one employee of IIC. 'They were afraid that the time lapse between bond issues might jeopardise the project.' Consequently Volkswagen withdrew and found a new partner.

The company then began lengthy negotiations with a European pharmaceutical producer to take over one of its European plants, which is on the verge of closure, as a possible alternative for their industrial bond issue.

Kamel says that the company wants to become involved to a greater extent in providing for the basic needs of the Islamic world, particularly in such areas as food supplies. The first project, planned for November, will finance the reconstruction of a large, Arab food supply firm. The IIC is to purchase cargo ships — perhaps as many as eight — at a cost of $8m to $12m each, and will allow the food supply company to use Islamic leasing in order to purchase the ships.

A second issue, which has been planned for some time, is to expand the cultivated area in Prince Mohammed al Faisal's 243,000 hectare agricultural development project at Damazin in Sudan. The issue has been slowed down by complex negotiations with the Sudanese government over allowing the new area the benefits which the original project enjoys.

In accordance with the company's wish to help meet the basic needs of the area, an offering is planned to help an unnamed Gulf country finance the construction of two power stations at a cost of $30m. 'They were ready to sign with a consortium of European banks but when we showed them our terms they realised they were much better so they decided to finance the construction through us.' The offering should further contribute to the IIC's growing prestige.

Kamel is optimistic about the IIC's future. Revenues of oil rich states are increasing each year. According to the Bank of England, Opec's foreign assets, most of which belong to Islamic countries, totalled about $115bn at the end of 1979. 'Our target is to have about $6bn of that surplus under management by 1985.' (Total funds now under the IIC's management are a closely guarded secret because oil states investing with the IIC do not want their total investments known.)

The company is expanding its operations to include new countries. Currently, bonds are sold through offices in Cairo, Qatar, Abu Dhabi, Sharjah, Damman and Geneva. A new subsidiary is being created in Pakistan with a capital of $3m, 51 per cent owned by the IIC. Other new branches are being considered in Nigeria and Turkey.

Particularly crucial to the company is the official approval of Saudi Arabia. Already some 60 per cent of all bonds are sold to Saudi investors, but official sanction would greatly facilitate increased sales. Crown Prince Fahd wrote to the company in December 1978 saying that approval would be given, but the Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency has waited to see how the company does before giving its approval.

There is a long term goal involved in the sale of Islamic bonds — the creation of an Islamic financial market. Abdul Aziz Hegazi, Egypt's former prime minister who initiated Egypt's open door policy and who is now a convert to Islamic banking, told 8 Days that Islamic bonds are one of the major factors which, he hopes, will lead to the creation of an international Islamic stock market.

USSR OPENS POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE IN KABUL

Kabul KABUL NEW TIMES in English 14 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] The friendly country of Soviet Union has taken a major part in the efforts of Afghanistan towards development. The remarkable economic and technical cooperation of USSR has been instrumental in the achievements made by people of Afghanistan in all socio-economic fields. One of the remarkable assistance of Soviet Union to this country is the gigantic educational establishment of Polytechnic Institute, a most modern educational institute in the country, where 2,000 students are enrolled, studying various fields such as industrial and civil engineering, hydrotechnic engineering, road construction, geology, development of useful mines, development of gas and petroleum, extraction of mines, electronic, etc.

In an interview the Chancellor of Polytechnic said that after the victory of Saur Revolution the Kabul Polytechnic Institute has been recognised as an independent institute, functioning within the framework of the Ministry of Higher and Vocational Education. The Institute has three colleges such as college of architecture, college of geology and college of technology. The duration of study in the institute is five and half years at the end of which the students are given masters degree.

The Institute, built through grant-in-aid of our great neighbourly country of Soviet Union, was officially opened in 1969. Some six million roubles is spent by Soviet Union in construction of the Institute.

At the beginning 185 Soviet lecturers and personnel helped the Afghan personnel in carrying out the teaching programmes of the Institute. And, now some 100 Soviet lecturers and laboratory technicians and some 135 Afghan teachers are teaching at the Institute.

In the course of eleven years since the opening of the Institute, 1100 engineers in various fields and at high level of education have been graduated from the Institute.

In reply to another question the Chancellor of Kabul Polytechnic Institute said that when the Institute was separated from the Kabul University, the ground was prepared for establishing three colleges within the Institute and in the future other fields such as repair of vehicles, and tractors and electrifications of urban areas and industrial plants will also be included in the programme of the Institute.

The Institute was able to revise its teaching programmes and implement the post graduate programme with the commencement of the first year of the five year development plan of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. To further enrich the educational level of its local lecturers the Institute plans to introduce the doctorate programme too.

To carry out scientific researchers a scientific research department was established within the Institute. A computer centre is also functioning within the Institute.

The abovementioned measure will prove very useful in raising the academic standard of students and scientific competition with other universities in the country.

Expounding on the construction and educational aspects of the Polytechnic Institute, the Chancellor of the Institute recalled that the cornerstone of the Institute was laid on 14 October 1963 by Leonid Brezhnev, General Secretary of the Central Committee of Communist Party and President of Presidium of Supreme Soviet. The construction work of the Institute began on April 1965 and on 14 April 1967 the first group of students, numbering 250, were enrolled in the Institute. On 29 May, 1969 the Institute was officially inaugurated.

In the first years only general subjects were taught at the Institute and later the Institute was gradually developed and specialised departments were established and as is now seven specialised departments are functioning within the Institute.

The first group of studdents, numbering 109, were graduated from the Institute in 1973.

Likewise, more than 2,000 Soviet manufactured tractors are functioning in agriculture sector in the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. Another 350 tractors with ploughs and trailors, ordered by Afghan Agricultural Development Bank is being supplied, which will be delivered in the course of next year.

The technical service and repair of equipment is carried out in two stages, one included a year guarantee given by company for 1,000 hours operation or one year after the delivery of the equipment. The service and repair is done by technical personnel and at the expense of the company. The second stage includes service and repair after the elapse of period for guarantee. This services are rendered by the company but at the expense of the buyer.

As most of the tractors in Afghanistan are operating in northern provinces, well-equipped repair plants are established in Mazare Sharif, centre of Balkh province.

Prior to the Saur Revolution the volume of sale of machinery by Traktorexport reached to one and a half million dollars, however the figure is reached during the current year to six million dollars due to greater attention being paid by the DRA government in development of agriculture in Afghanistan.

The representative of Soviet Traktorexport company said that agreements have been concluded as regards purchase of tractors and agricultural equipment, road construction with concerned Afghan authorities, with some three per cent reduction in the prices.

The products of Soviet Traktorexport company has the satisfaction of customers in view of technical dependability, and it has won more than 100 golden medals in world affairs. As is now the products of the company is exported to 67 European, American, Asian and African countries.

The Company is carrying intensive publicity programme through issuing pamphlets, posters and other means to introduce the Company's products.

The Soviet Traktorexport Company has prepared a training programme for the Afghan personnel. Some Afghans are undergoing training at the Rastkov factory and three other groups are to be sent to the Soviet Union for the same purpose, noted the Soviet Traktorexport company representative.

STUDENT UNION DECLARES OPPOSITION TO EDUCATION MINISTRY MEASURES

Kuwait AL-TALI'AH in Arabic 24 Sep 80 p 11

[Article: "Press Statement of National Union of Bahrain Students"]

[Text] Members of the Kuwait chapter of the National Union of Bahrain Students were taken by surprise when two of their members who were studying at Kuwait University were dismissed without having any specific charge leveled against them. They had been in the final stages of their education.

While we denounce the dismissal which has befallen our students, it is of concern to us to emphasize certain facts that are considered to be the background behind the step to dismiss [those students]. These facts are:

First, the dismissal of the two students was carried out under direct instructions from the educational authorities in Bahrain. The two students did not engage in any activities that would disrupt the security of Kuwait. This was evident in the response which the security official made to the students [who are members] of the union when a union delegation proceeded to follow up on the matter with the security agencies. In addition, there have been numerous precedents in this regard: these occurred from December 1974 to 1978 to our students who were studying at the university. The request for dismissal came through Bahrain authorities or through the cultural office of the Embassy of the State of Bahrain in Kuwait.

Second, the educational authorities in Bahrain did issue a decision early last August demanding that 17 students studying at Kuwait University and a similar number of students studying at other Arab and European countries be denied admission [at their respective institutions].

The National Union of Bahrain Students had adopted a position on the decisions that were issued by the Ministry of Education to regulate students' missions abroad. The union was able to create among students in Bahrain a general state of non-acceptance of these resolutions. The government then resorted to preventing this number [of students from completing their education] in an effort to arouse fear among the students and compel them to endorse these decisions. We believe that the recent step to have those students dismissed [from their institutions] comes under this series of steps that are being engineered by Bahrain's Ministry of Education.

Third, we are rejecting the aforementioned decisions not only because we disagree with them, but also because those decisions are based on an infringement upon a student's freedom and constitutional rights. Suffice it [to say] that one of those decisions stipulates that the student's parent sign a pledge that his son who is studying abroad will not engage in any activities that go against the state's supreme policy. Not only is such an expression adaptable to various interpretations, we refuse to have our parents become hostages in a situation where they could be taken to court by the authorities for actions they did not commit.

Fourth, this point pertains directly to us, the students in Kuwait. We had continuing disputes last year with the cultural office regarding receipt of our passports. As a result, the grants offered to us by the Ministry of Education were suspended. The step to have students dismissed is considered to be a form of moral pressure exerted on students who are union members to make them accept the embassy's point of view in this matter.

The Kuwait chapter of the National Union of Bahrain Students values the efforts that are being made by the Dean of Students Dr Musa'id al-Harun to safeguard the educational future of our students who are studying in the university. At the same time we are calling upon university officials to take action to stop any steps for dismissal that may be likely in the future. The union is calling upon all student organizations and popular Kuwaiti authorities to establish solidarity with its positions and to obstruct the plan of Bahrain's Ministry of Education to paralyze our students' wills and to force upon us positions and policies that we do not accept.

HENDERSON'S DEPARTURE UNANIMOUSLY REQUESTED

Kuwait AL-TALI'AH in Arabic 24 Sep 80 p 16

[Article: "The Arabian Peninsula; Readings in Forbidden Papers; Bahrain: Request for Henderson's Deportation Is Unanimous"]

[Text] A person who has been following the activities of Bahrain's National Opposition will note that part of its general activities is centered around the demand to "deport Henderson" who has been responsible for the agency of political investigations for the past 10 years. The 5 March editorial in the bulletin that is published by the Popular Front in Bahrain stated that "The earnestness of any real openness in Bahrain, or rather the first prelude to such openness, would be manifested in the final deportation of Henderson and his gang from the country."

The editorial added, "People have numerous demands, and we want those demands to be achieved. Despite the points that separate and bring people together, the Popular Front thinks that it is necessary to achieve a basic central demand that would be an introduction as well as a pre-condition to the achievement of the remaining demands. This central demand is exemplified in the deportation of Henderson." The editorial concluded by saying, "To avoid the repetition of this evil tune which more than anything else is an indication of bankruptcy--associating communism and sabotage with this demand--we are saying that this is a regular measure in any country whose people enjoy a minimum of freedoms."

An article in the same issue discussed the six decisions that were issued by Bahrain's Ministry of Education to impose stricter control than had been the case in the past on the activities of students abroad. The article stated, "When the Ministry of Education stands in the way of any student who wants to study abroad, this means that a vast majority of secondary school students will be denied a university education and large numbers will be added to the armies of unemployed in this country."

The article added, "With regard to the decision to prosecute students abroad [because of] their political ideas and beliefs, we are saying that the ministry has no right to interfere in students' political convictions because any citizen has the right to discuss the questions of his country. The constitution which was promulgated by the same authorities gives [citizens] that right."

The article concluded by saying, "We find indications in the ministry's decision of the extreme confusion that is prevalent in the government. We find evidence that the government does not want to have stability and security in the country, but that it rather wants chaos and disturbances so as to give Henderson further justifications to stay longer in this country."

It is noteworthy here that the aforementioned decisions include the ministry's right to bring back a student who is studying abroad if that student engaged in activities that were contrary to "the supreme interests of the state." The student's parent is to pay the Ministry of Education a sum of money, and the parent is subject to trial during the period of the student's study if the student does not abide by the instructions of the state.

The cover story of that issue included a quick review of the events of the past 5 years which followed the dissolution of parliament on 23 August 1975. We quote the following from this review: "During these 5 years Henderson executed four citizens while they were being brutally tortured. He did so without presenting a single piece of evidence that any one of them had committed a murder or any other crime that would justify comparable treatment or putting him on trial, not to mention killing them."

In another section, "It was sufficient for a member of the National Assembly to talk about the illegality of dissolving the assembly to be taken to prison. This is what happened to Attorney Muhsin Marhun. It was enough for a former assembly member to ask for a return to parliamentary life in 1976 in order to be deprived of [participating in] all the biddings of the Ministry of Public Health. This is what happened to Representative Rasul al-Habashi."

The cover story touched upon the economic, social and political conditions that prevailed during the absence of the National Assembly. These conditions were tantamount to the material evidence that the government's program had failed to solve the general crises from which most of the citizens were suffering. The ouster of the government had become necessary so as to make room for a givernment elected by the people. However, the price that is being asked for that is calling the former officials to account for their actions during the foregoing period.

The leading article on the Labor Affairs page referred to the sweeping arrests to which the members and leaders of the organizational committee of the Union of Bahrain Labor were being subjected. [The government] thus wishes to divest the masses of the Bahraini people and their national movement of their action arm which can lay down the actual foundation of the question of openness and can in fact bring this matter to a head if the government does not comply with the demands of the people of Bahrain and ignores their struggles for the past years.

The August issue [of the bulletin] included news and numerous political commentaries that dealt with the affairs of the Gulf area and the Arabian Peninsula.

TESTS PREPARING FOR 1981 GENERAL CENSUS DISCUSSED

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 10 Sep 80 p 21

[Article by Sami 'Amarah: "Three Successful Experimental Census Operations; Population More Than Doubles in Past 10 Years; Women Lower Their Ages; Men Give Approximate Age"]

[Excerpts] The three experimental census operations conducted in Bahrain during the past few months and concluded a few days ago, in preparation for the 1981 census, confirm that Bahrain's population has more than doubled during the past 10 years.

The tests confirm that the number of Bahraini citizens exceeds that of non-Bahraini residents. The June census operation confirms that there are 250,000 Bahraini citizens and 150,000 non-Bahraini residents. In light of the three experimental census operations, census department officials expect Bahrain to have a population of 400,000 by 1981, compared to 216,000 according to the 1971 census. [This does not substantiate claim in preceding paragraph, and in subslug, that population has more than doubled.]

The census operations confirm the ancient theory that women always tend to claim to be younger than they really are. Men who do not know their exact age, give the closest rounded figure, that is, 30, 35, 40, 45, or 50. The average marriage age of Bahrain citizens is 24 for men and 19 for women; for non-Bahrainis, it is 25 to 28 years for men and 25 to 27 years for women.

According to the director of the census department Shaykh Muhammad ibn 'Atiyyat-Allah Al Khalifa, the first general population census in Bahrain was conducted in 1941, the second in 1950, the third in 1956, the fourth in 1965 and the fifth and last in 1971, when the population of Bahrain reached 216,000 residents. The sixth census will be conducted on 6 to 15 April 1981. The population of Bahrain is expected to be 400,000 in this coming census.

A Mini-Census

Relative to the recent experimental census concluded a few days ago, Shaykh Muhammad said: "The cabinet gave the census department the privilege of planning and implementing the 6th population census, which pleases us. The work we are currently doing is all being performed by Bahrainis, including preparation of the census form, home calls, the sorting out of forms, and the extraction and analysis of data by computer.

"The third experimental census was a mini-census of residents and dwellings. For this census, we chose a random sample of around 400 Bahraini families from various areas of Bahrain, for the purpose of studying two basic factors:

1. To test the suitability of the census form specifically designed for special locations with constant population increases or decreases, such as hotels, old people's homes, workers' homes, etc.

2. To test the possibility of using the system of census blocs, based on the current address numbering system.

"We began the third experimental census on Monday, 18 August and completed it in a few days.

"The purpose of using random samples is to test specific things. The intent is to learn something specific, not carry out a complete census. For example, in relation to the questions in the forms, are the questions clear or vague? And how many cases could the census worker complete per day?

"On the first day of work, for example, we faced the problem of the very long form with room for 15 family members. It took the census worker 45 minutes to complete one form the first day. On the second day, he was able to complete the form in 25 minutes.

"We are taking into consideration all the above matters in preparing for the general census of 1981. This will be useful in determining how many census workers are needed and how long it will take each worker to do his job.

"In the first and second experimental operations, it took the workers a long time to complete forms for seven families. In the third operation, the forms for seven families took only 3 hours to complete. Therefore, the census committee chairman recommended that each worker complete forms for seven families per day."

Difficulties and Problems

Mr Yasir al-Nasir, director of the third experimental census, discussed the difficulties and problems encountered by census workers on their first day of work. He summarized these problems as follows:

"The training period was short. It consisted of 2 days, 1 theoretical and 1 practical. This caused very minor errors to occur. Of course, these errors appeared on the form, but we corrected them.

"Some people may ask: Why didn't we increase the training period? In reply, I say that this could not be done, because there were many other important things to take care of. The accuracy rate on the first day of the census was 70 percent, increasing to 85 percent on the second day, and to 100 percent on the third day. We have to bear in mind that the young Bahraini census takers are bright and that the citizens spared no effort to provide all that was required of them. Their cooperation undoubtedly encourages us to feel certain that the sixth population census will be the most accurate census taken in Bahrain.

"Another problem may have been communications difficulties, but we tried to overcome these by using radio. The census worker was required to go from his place of residence to the census center (operations room) and then to his work area. Anyone facing problems could contact us at the operations room by radio. By radio, we in turn could give him instructions to help him solve the problem he was facing, such as needing a car because his car had broken down."

Recognizing Mistakes

Shaykh Muhammad, the director of the census department said: "We are trying, through this census, to know our potential, or the potential available to us. We are trying to recognize mistakes, so as to avoid them in the coming general census, God willing.

"For example, in the first and second experimental operations, we noticed that the population pyramid was irregular. An analysis of available information revealed the cause of this, and we are currently trying to rectify it.

"For example, we found that men who do not know their real ages try to give approximate ages, to the nearest round numbers, such as 30, 35, 40, 45, 50, 55, 60, 65. We also found that women, like everywhere else in the world, try to say that they are younger than they really are. We found these discrepancies after we asked some families for their birth certificates and passports.

"We have asked for birth certificates and passports only to get accurate figures. We only ask for these documents to achieve accuracy."

EGYPTIAN AGRICULTURAL REFORM PROGRAM DISCUSSED

Cairo AL-AHRAM AL-IQTISADI in Arabic 8 Sep 80 pp 16-19

[Article by Mu'tasim Rashid: "Engineer Sayyid Mar'i Makes Accusations Concerning Bureaucracy and the Problems of Agriculture, and Absolves the Egyptian Model of Agricultural Reform of Any Blame"]

[Text] The Egyptian experiment in agricultural reform is related 100 percent to the level of agricultural production in Egypt or, in other words, to increasing this production, whether the increase is vertical or horizontal. Therefore, in order for us to evaluate this experiment as we view it on 9 September 1980, we must attempt to review the results which it has succeeded in achieving since 9 September 1952. It was in this light we began our interview with Engineer Sayyid Mar'i.

General Principles

What we had to do was to review the features of the application of agricultural reform in Egypt in order to clearly perceive the basic general principles upon which the implementation of agricultural reform was based. We are not setting new principles here. Nor are we inferring matters which did not concern Egyptian legislators when faced with the issuance of the law or did not concern government executive agencies when faced with actually putting the law into practice.

As Mr Mar'i said: "The fact is that we set up for ourselves a system or model of agricultural reform which has its own direction and goals which derive from the very core of the Egyptian countryside, its needs, and its nature. As I have stated in my first book about 'Agricultural Reform and the Population Problem in Egypt,' the basic foundations of this system are as follows:

1. Determining the maximum amount of property to be owned by an individual and distributing property in excess of this maximum to the peasants. This distribution is supposed to be in the form of property owned by individuals, and rejects the idea of collective farms which threatens individual private ownership.

2. Adopting the cooperative system as a means of guaranteeing the best utilization of the land distributed and the earning of the highest possible income from it.

3. Expansion in the utilization of uncultivated lands. At the time, we made it clear that methods of agricultural reform should be based on private ownership of land, and that it is necessary for the individual peasant to have his plot of land which is distributed to him and for him and his family to be within the framework of a cooperative system which provided a link between him and his fellow-peasants. Since a peasant's feeling of freedom is considered one of the most important pillars of his progress and eagerness to make the best use of his land and increase his production, then there is no doubt that the system of private ownership, supported by the cooperative system, becomes a means of rendering service simultaneously to the peasant and to the national interest."

The Philosophy of the System

Mr Mar'i went on to say: "There was a social, political, and economic philosophy behind this system. Agricultural reform legislation was based on this philosophy, and the application of this legislation was also based on this philosophy. Perhaps this is what induced international organizations, in particular the food and agricultural organizations of the UN, to call the Egyptian system 'the Egyptian model of agricultural reform.'

The reason is that this 'model,' with the philosophy behind it in terms of legislation and application, was based on technical and economic principles. Perhaps the most important of them were the principles of combining the individually-owned farmlands into organized crop rotation cycles and the creation of production, credit, and marketing cooperative bodies in all realms of agriculture at a time when this philosophy achieved the realization of the final objectives of maintaining Egypt's agricultural production."

The Level of Production

Mr Mar'i said: "For any country, being able to maintain or increase its level of agricultural production while at the same time introducing agricultural reform is the real criterion for the success of a given system or 'model.' It is the only sure means of guaranteeing further progress in the carrying out of agricultural reform laws without suffering setbacks. When agricultural productivity decreases in a given country, this is a sign that it has deviated from putting the law into effect. There are many examples of this among the countries of Latin America and in some of the countries of Asia."

Mr Mar'i explained: "If we recall the year 1953, when the 'irrigation districts of the property-owning elite' were seized and distributed to the small peasant farmers and when the critical agricultural systems and necessary cooperative bodies were set up, we find that the results of the philosophy upon which the 'Egyptian model' of agricultural reform is based have clearly become visible in the increase in production of, for example, sugar cane. Other evidence of this is the statistics of the Sugar Co. which we have seen year after year."

The Law Has Its Enemies

"At this point I do not want to digress and talk about the history of agricultural reform in Egypt. But I do want to make it clear that agricultural reform in Egypt did have its enemies when the law was issued. It also had its enemies when lands were confiscated, and up till the present day it still has its enemies!! Their opinions crop up from time to time. For them, agricultural reform is a type of scapegoat which they use to blame for some of our economic or agricultural problems when in fact these problems originate in other economic sectors.

"Without wishing to digress, I would like only to point out that some people oppose agricultural reform in Egypt not because it is a social project which has the goal of protecting small peasant farmers and, at the same time, fully maintaining agricultural productivity, but rather because they consider it to be a socialist decision which enables the weak to assert their rights in the face of the strong. They oppose it because it provides these peasants, as best as it can, with the means to live a decent life instead of allowing a minority of people to monopolize Egypt's agricultural crops in order to exploit them for the purposes of enjoying their wealth outside of Egypt and spending their excess capital as consumers outside of Egypt--instead of saving it to invest in projects inside the country. I do not say that all of the people in the wealthy Egyptian landowning class did this, but a large number of them did. In fact these people used to wait until they had gathered in and sold the crops before determining the exact amount of money which they collected from the small peasant farmers as rent to be paid for the land which the peasants planted!!

"The purpose of agricultural reform in Egypt was to deal with these abnormal phenomena and to determine the characteristics of the relationship between the landowner and tenant farmer after determining a suitable maximum of how much farmland it was allowed to own. The result was that the agricultural reform law gave rise to a new class in the Egyptian countryside. The people of this class had been virtually salves of the land and constituted the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants of the rural areas."

The Problem of Production

Mr Mar'i added: "Perhaps these circumstances created a suitable climate for increasing agricultural production in Egypt in comparison to what it was before 1952. But whether or not his production today is sufficient or insufficient is quite another problem, and it is unjust to hold either the system or agricultural reform or its Egyptian experiment responsible for this problem. We all know that our population has doubled and that our limited increase in agricultural land areas has not at all kept pace with the population increase. This is especially true if we take into account what has been subtracted from this slight increase because of the building and construction which has taken place on some of the best agricultural lands in the countryside and on the outskirts of the cities. There is this on the one hand."

The World Economic System

"And on the other hand, we all know that the present world economic system is moving in a direction which is completely opposed to the welfare of the developing countries. We see that the industrial products which are produced by the wealthy countries and the petroleum products which are extracted by the OPEC countries are imported by the developing and agricultural countries--are continually showing a rise in prices. We also see that the world level of production of agricultural products is more or less stable or, at best, increases at a rate which does not keep pace with the size of the increases in the prices of oil and industrial goods."

A New Economic System

"For this reason, we have appealed both inside Egypt and, in particular, outside Egypt, at international gatherings and in UN organizations, for what is called a 'new economic system.' This is a system which has the goal of achieving some degree of balance between world prices of agricultural goods and world prices of the oil and industrial goods which the developing countries depend on both for their agricultural production and for their other economic sectors.

"In order to present a clear picture of the extent of the harshness and fraud which is being suffered by the developing countries because of the present world economic system, let me quote only one example: In 1950 or 1951 an Egyptian peasant could buy a farm tractor for 10 gantars of cotton which he produced. But today, in order to get this farm tractor or perhaps even something which is inferior, he has to pay 140 gantars of the cotton which he produces. There is no doubt that our cotton production today, from the point of view of quality, is better than our cotton production of 1951.

The Fault

"Agricultural reform," according to Mr Mar'i, "is not responsible for all aspects of the agricultural problem since agricultural reform has performed its function for society without giving rise to the slightest harm to the level of agricultural productivity.

"As I have pointed out, the fault lies with the population explosion problem, the problem of the present world economic system, the problem of the scarcity of agricultural lands, and the problem of insufficient horizontal expansion which matches the increase in population.

"It may be said today that our cotton production is not sufficient in order to cover our requirements of imported sugar--and this is something that we say with great reservation--but this is not the fault of agricultural reform. It is the fault of the world economic system, on the one hand, and is the fault of our lack of expansion in land cultivation, on the other."

Agricultural Reform Legislation

"As for agricultural reform legislation," Mr Mar'i said, "there is a current trend toward modifying some of this agricultural reform legislation and transferring the ownership of desert and uncultivated lands, on a large-scale basis, to individuals, cooperative associations, and corporations on the condition that they cultivate these lands within 5 years of the date when they take possession of them. But this trend, although it does not conflict with the philosophy of agricultural reform, probably does not represent a basic solution for the problem of expanding our area of agricultural lands. I believe that the government's basic duty in this regard should be to extend the basic facilities and conveniences or the necessary economic infrastructure in order to have these lands cultivated and planted, in order to encourage mechanized agriculture, etc."

The Basic Solution

In the words of Mr Mar'i: "In our opinion, this is the basic solution to the problem of maximum expansion for our agriculture. This is a problem which does not affect the essence of the philosophy on which the Egyptian model of agricultural reform has been based. On the contrary, I emphasize that this model of agricultural reform has fulfilled its role as well as possible and has achieved its mission. If it has achieved its mission, then today we are faced with a problem which is a ramification of it. This problem is that of the bureaucracy within the agricultural reform program. We have established the relationship between the merchants and the tenant farmers, and we have established the maximum limits of ownership of farmlands. The farmlands belonging to the large landowners have been confiscated, and we have completed the distribution of these lands to the small peasant farmers. All of this has been accomplished. Then why is it that today we find that we have a large government bureau which is called the Public Bureau of Confiscation and Distribution!? We find that the committees and some of the courts are drowned in a vast ocean of legal and legislative inquiries. I have already appealed, and I am taking this opportunity to repeat my appeal, for doing away with these bureaus and doing away with these legal ramifications and court cases so that those occupied with them will be free to engage in other more productive activities and promote land cultivation projects. Right now it would be sufficient for us to have a technical agricultural bureau which would undertake to provide guidance for those who are benefiting from the agricultural reform and show them the way toward a continuation of the increase in agricultural production and a continuation of vertical expansion."

VIOLENT ATTACK UNLEASHED AGAINST QOTBZADEH, BAZARGAN

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 16 Oct 80 p 12

[Article by A. Agah: "That Government's and 'That Minister's' Mistakes"]

[Text] Radio Monte Carlo quoted a former cabinet minister [preceding Raja'i's cabinet), as having said that he considers the Iraqi attack on Iran as the outcome of numerous "mistakes" committed by the present Iranian Government. The aforementioned minister, who has held lengthy interviews with foreign press and television, and whose hostility towards the student followers of the imam became evident, more than any other minister, by the statements he made during the program [Voice] and Profile of the Islamic Republic, has also added that: "The present government is not in a position to efficiently run the country."

This former minister, whose premature and untimely judgments regarding the news about the arrest of the shah in Panama, and the hue and cry which followed it, helped more than anything else to provide foreign media with ammunition needed to "discredit" and point out the "mistakes" of the previous government. Even though, he was and is well known as a liar, part of his statement quoted by Radio Monte Carlo is not far from the truth. He has called the Iraqi attack on Iran as being the result of "numerous mistakes" committed by the Iranian Government. Among one of these mistakes committed by the Iranian Government was the appointment of "that minister" to one of the country's most sensitive positions at a time when the nation was engaged in its most crucial struggle against one of the most bloodsucking international colonial powers. People and many newspapers, at the very outset had protested and were quite aware that the "line" followed by the minister was very much different from that of the imam. In his speeches, in his meetings with foreign guests, and in his contacts with domestic and international media, whenever the opportunity presented itself, he attacked and scorned the courageous action of the students who follow the imam's line and continued to cleverly negate the nation's anticolonial struggle.

At that time, many followers of the imam and those who believed in the revolution, warned against the existence of such ministers in the government, insisting that such individuals were doing more harm, than good to the revolution. Unfortunately, no one paid attention to these warnings until Raja'i formed his government. The reason for the protests of the adherents to the revolution and the press was that they believed that considering the importance of the ministry he was in charge, the minister was acting, intentionally or not, in a manner that could be effectively reflected outside the country as that of the government. This was certainly true. During the entire period he was in charge of that ministry, no policy was formulated to distinctly represent the policy of the Islamic Republic of Iran. No basic and fundamental actions were ever taken by the minister and organizational appointments were made based mainly on the minister's personal attitude and assumptions and, therefore, hopes and expectations from the ministry were not fulfilled. Thus, it was clear from the very beginning that inclusion of that minister in the government had been a "mistake." He has now proven this in his Radio Monte Carlo interview. If the previous government (prior to Raja'i) had committed "numerous mistakes," one of those "mistakes" was the appointment of this man to a sensitive ministry. The other "mistake" was the dismissal of protests and warnings issued by the people and the press regarding the keeping of the minister in such a position which later became the source of further "numerous mistakes" by the government.

Judgments of a Morning Newspaper Writer

When tens of thousands of Moslem fighters, city folks as well as people from rural areas, are risking their lives to defend the honor of their country, one of the "morning" newspapers, a latecomer who wants to get ahead early, has published, on page six, the views expressed by a leading clergy. With all due respect to religious leaders, their views and recommendations, publishing the views expressed on 20 Shawal 1400 [31 Aug 80], "a month and a half later" and during the war with Iraq, could not be dismissed as a purely innocent act by the "morning paper," especially when it discusses such issues as guardianship of the jurisprudent [rule of the grand ayatollah], distribution of wealth, property seizure, decrees of the revolutionary courts and judgeship. These are complex issues, which, ever since the formation of the Islamic Republic and the Assembly of Experts, have been subjects of discussions and were used as a means of creating division and dissension among people.

At a time when enemies have surrounded us, on the ground and in the air and the Iraqi, American and Israeli mass media and their supporters are busy doing everything to unsettle our nation, it is unfair for a newspaper, which has blossomed under the shadow of the Islamic Republic, to be managed by people so "unbalanced",* who stand ready to ignore conditions created by war and try to sow dissension on the one hand, and swim against the current and turn back the clock, on the other.

*[The word "unbalanced", or "namizan" in Persian, is a transparent remark to identify former prime minister Bazargan, who is publishing a newspaper called MIZAN, which means "balance," whereas the word "namizan" means "lack of balance." I.E. Bazargan is indirectly being presented as an unbalanced person.]

In the Persian language, such actions are called "a stab in the back." The attention of the entire nation has now turned west, to the criminal Saddam, to the consequences of his action and to his disgraceful fate. Our people are observing the blackout and are passing a portion of their existence in darkness. Most business activities are either stopped or are slowed down because of the war-imposed restrictions. Unpredictable shortages and inadequacies lie ahead. Yet people endure all these hardships in order to be able to settle their accounts with the blood-thirsty enemies, namely America and its protege Saddam. Why are you trying to undermine this unity of mind and national solidarity?

When thousands of farmers and their sons are risking their lives thousands of kilometers away in the west defending their country, not only you are not with them in the trenches but are also busy using a 2-month old letter written by a religious leader to complain about the taking of land away from some fugitive landlord, which perhaps has not been given yet to that fighting farmer's son.

Whether it is true or not, but the BBC reported several nights ago that invading Iraqi soldiers are busy stealing sewing machines and bicycles stored in warehouses of Khorramshahr's customs. Barely have they arrived and already they are taking away war "booty."

The action taken by that morning newspaper is not only similar but much worse than those taken by the Iraqi soldiers. It is not yet quite clear what is to be done in our war with Iraq just as the Islamic Republic is not quite sure how to deal with the opponents and dissension makers. These gentlemen are already trying to divide the "booties" of the war.

It is no surprise that the people end their slogans, saying: "Death to dissension causers." Truly, death to dissension causers.

AYATOLLAH SHIRAZI CRITICIZES RECORD OF REPUBLIC

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 13 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] TEHRAN – The Islamic Republic of Iran has not turned out to fulfill the aspirations of the Islamic Revolution in all respects, charged Ayatollah Shirazi, a prominent religious leader, in a letter addressed to President Abolhassan Banisadr, Prime Minister Mohammadah Rajaie and deputies of the Iranian Parliament.

He said in the letter which was published in the Persian daily "Mezan" that the Islamic Revolution had been achieved with sacrifice of tens of thousands of lives of young martyrs, and its primary objective was to effect a transformation of society on Islamic lines.

It was the hope and wish of one and all who cherished the revolution that there would have been greater unity and a sense of fulfillment in the Islamic Revolution, he continued. However, such hopes had been less than met the expectations of these people because of the ever increasing friction within government circles, between those in authority on the one hand and between groups of people who held divergent opinions on the other, Ayatollah Shirazi argued.

The prominent religious dignitary alleged that false accusations, unislamic judgements and punishments, executions and unjust confiscations of property seemed to have been the order of the times.

He said that he had earlier referred such misdeeds to the president, to the interior minister and to the Revolutionary Council but was surprised by the indifferent response to his appeals and to their refusal to publicise his allegations.

He added that if his arguments had been given a hearing and investigated it would have resulted in advantage to the Islamic Revolution.

Ayatollah Shirazi said that a complete review should be made of all earlier bills passed in Parliament, of all regulations and promulgations, and all those which did not conform to Islam should be annulled.

As regards the Constitution itself and certain laws contained in it, the religious leader said, they were mostly in conformity to Islam but a few articles needed amending. He did not say what the articles were. But he suggested that the members of the Guardian Council in Parliament should meet with representatives of the Maraje-Taqlid (Supreme religious leaders) in order to effect one hundred per cent Islamic changes in the parliament.

He stressed the importance of upholding Vilayat Faqih – the supreme authority of the religious head of the state – saying that this was a cornerstone in an Islamic administrative system and no article in defining this should be left in doubt, or contain flaws in interpretation. In order to effect truly Islamic changes the clauses in respect of the Vilayat Faqih should be looked into with care, the Ayatollah said.

In the same way the question of the judiciary and the appointment of all judges should be exercised with the greatest of care. The status of the judiciary stood only next to that of Imamat (the supreme religious authority which devolves from the special religious eminence of the 12 Shi'ite Imams, Ayatollah Shirazi said. All judicial positions from that of Supreme Judge to lesser positions, carried important political as well as religious responsibilities, he added. Care should, therefore, be the rule in appointment to such sensitive posts, he concluded.

REPRESSION MOUNTS AGAINST BAHAI COMMUNITY

Blantyre DAILY TIMES in English 26 Sep 80 p 6

[Article by Anthony Hyman]

[Text]

WITH the news that seven leaders of the Bahai faith in Iran have been shot by order of the Revolutionary Tribunal, the Bahai community in Britain has voiced its fears for the 300,000-strong minority in Iran. The Bahai faith is looked on by most Iranians as a deadly heresy or perversion of Shia Islam,

There are renewed fears in the 300,000 strong Bahai community — the largest religious minority in Iran — of a campaign of repression organised by militant Muslim leaders.

The Bahais are one of five main religious minorities in Iran, together with Christians, Jews, Ismailis and Zoroastrians, but they are the most exposed to waves of popular fanaticism, which have led to serious incidents of killings and damage to Bahai property, ever since the middle of the last century, when the religion was founded in Iran.

In recent incidents in towns all over Iran, local Bahai leaders have been arrested merely because they were members of this faith. Some have been executed. In Yazd, central Iran, seven Bahais were killed recently.

There are well-grounded fears that in the present state of politics in Iran, popular prejudices may be whipped up against Bahais by interested circles, and that they may be made scapegoats for Iran's problems.

Some observers have seen a parallel with Bahais in the Jews in Europe, where anti-semitism has flourished in the past and been exploited for political purposes. Like Jews in many European countries, Bahais in Iran tend to be better educated, more prosperous than average, and provide obvious targets for envy.

It is also the fact that the Bahai faith is looked on by most Iranians as a deadly heresy or pervesion of Shi'a Islam that makes members of this numerous and influential community fear that intolerance and prejudice could be converted into a nationwide persecution.

Already this year, numerous confiscations have been made of Bahai holy places, hospitals and other properties owned by the community, while mullahs (Muslim leaders) have repeatedly called for Bahais to be dismissed from state service and to be handed over to the revolutionary courts.

Bahai leaders maintain that the sole crime of which they are guilty is belonging to this controversial community — all too often branded by Shi'a leaders as a harmful political faction and an agent of Imperialism or Zionism.

Accusations of being part of an international conspiracy against the Iranian revolution are commonly made against Bahais. They arise from the international nature of the religion, with converts scattered around the world. The historical accident that the chief shrine of the Bahais lies in Israel is a serious complication for them, with present-day tensions and strong sympathies with the Palestinian cause in Iran.

Some Bahai spokesmen assert that another motive for attacks on their community inside Iran is the wealth available for redistribution after confiscation of property — and there is no doubt that the notoriety of certain Bahai businessmen who became very rich under the Shah's rule (along with many Shia's too) have added to public prejudices against them.

The other religious minorities in Iran are certainly less exposed, enjoying a more honourable status as 'People of the Book' (i.e. a revealed scripture which Muslims too recognise) like Christians and Jews or like Zoroastrians and Ismailis, having lived side by side with Muslims for so many centuries that they have become accepted to a large extent.

Yet even among the Armenian and Assyrian Christians, who account for most of the 200,000 Christians in Iran, signs of stress and strain have appeared; only this summer Armenian Church leaders advised Armenian women to "pay special attention to the issue of their dress in offices and work places," by wearing headscarves and long-sleeved dresses.

In effect, this means that Christians are being asked to adopt 'Islamic dress,' as ordered by Ayatollah Khomeini for all Muslim women, although theoretically, the new Iranian Constitution imposes no such duty on protected religious minorities.

Although Armenian Church leaders have co-operated so far in trying to lessen potential causes of friction, the atmosphere of religious bigotry and fanaticism in Iran is likely to bring further disputes both within the Christian community and between their local leaders and Shia-dominated komitehs, which have become a law to themselves.

There are, of course, limits beyond which many Armenian Christians will not wish to go, however great the spirit of compromise or acceptance of the inevitable shown by Church leaders. An end to co-education of the sexes, as well as the ending of separate Armenian schools themselves, are aims of Shia bigots which will certainly be hotly contested.

The future does not look too bright for religious minorities with foreign connections, a feature not only of the Bahais, but also of the Jews and various small Christian denominations with close links to Churches based in Europe.

In spite of repeated assurances from Ayatollah Khomeini and his entourage in the early months of the Iranian revolution, the place of these communities is still unsettled, with the Anglican Church facing persecution of a very ugly nature.

While many of the richer Jews left Iran, along with the rest of the Iranian middle classes, in the last half year of the Shah's rule, perhaps 40,000 out of the 60,000 strong Jewish community remains in Iran.

Judaism has been established there for some two and a half thousand years — since the time of Cyrus the Great (6th Century BC) — and it is difficult to imagine the sudden extinction of such a well-established community, whatever the current difficulties.

Moreover, the remaining Jewish population is for the most part poor, living in Teheran in a well-defined ghetto, with their own trades and good relations in the past with Shia neighbours. —GEMINI

KHO'I ALLEGEDLY SUPPORTED BY IRAQ VERSUS KHOMEYNI

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 17 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] A religious element has now been introduced into the Iran-Iraq struggle. Foreign correspondents in Baghdad report that the Iraqi Government considers Ayatollah Abolqasem Kho'i as the leader of the Shiites of the world in exclusion of Ayatollah Khomeyni.

According to the report published in LE MATIN, Ayatollah Khomeyni has on several occasions told those close to him that he intends to transfer the Shiite religious center from Najaf in Iraq to Qom in Iran. After the success of the Iranian revolution, Khomeyni feels that the location of the center of Shiism in Iran will provide it with greater security than in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. Khomeyni has accused Saddam of being a "small satan", one who is not Shiite but an ardent advocate of secularism in his capacity as the leader of Iraq's Ba'th Party.

Khomeyni's decision has been defied vehemently by Iraq and particularly by Ayatollah Abolqasem Kho'i who resides in Najaf and is the highest religious authority in Iraq and a rival of Ayatollah Khomeyni. He has said, "I shall stay here and keep Najaf as the religious center of Shiism." With this statement made to an Iraqi journalist, Ayatollah Kho'i has purported to underscore that he is the leader of the Shiites of the world, not Ayatollah Khomeyni.

The Iraqi regime that has embroiled Iran in a war of attrition obviously backs Ayatollah Kho'i in this contention. The location of the Shiite theological schools in Iraq makes it possible for Iraq to control the more committed wing of the religious movement. Besides, Baghdad derives satisfaction from pitting an opponent against Ayatollah Khomeyni who has called for the overthrow of "traitorous Saddam Hussein."

The report adds that in fact the Shiites in the world of Islam, particularly in Lebanon, Iraq and even Turkey, are divided. Those who are against administration of politics by the clergy outnumber the others and support the leadership of Ayatollah Kho'i who is based in Najaf.

OPPOSITION LEADERS LABELLED 'QUISLINGS', 'LAVALS'

[Text] By unilaterally declaring the Iran-Iraq Treaty of 1975 null and void, Baghdad has virtually declared war on Iran. In addition to claiming sovereignty over the entire Shatt al-Arab, Iraq also claims about 400 square km of Iran's territory, including Qasr-e Shirin. According to recent reports, Iraq ultimately plans to sever Khuzestan from Iran.

Despite the victory-claiming communiques and press releases of the Iranian Army, the reports received here all speak of the fact that the Iraqi forces are advancing in Iran and have captured several areas. In addition, since yesterday all the foreign ships going through Shatt al-Arab have been flying the Iraqi flag.

What all the mass media agree on and the Iraqi Government has also confirmed is that the Iraqi forces have 'invaded' Iran and are publicly trying to cut off part of its territory. Consequently there is now a state of war between Iran and Iraq. ...However, despite this state of war, a number of Iranians who had made deals with Iraq in order to enrich themselves are still continuing their treachery.

In the pre-war Europe many people used to advocate the Nazi philosophy. But as soon as the war broke out they, too, like the rest of their compatriots, took up struggle against the invading Germans. ...And those who did not fight against the Germans were later executed as traitors. In Norway, an officer called Quisling, and in France a politician called Laval, named themselves patriots and collaborated with the Nazis. However, the courts found them to be traitors to their countries and condemned them to death.

Iran, too, is now facing an invasion. Regardless of whether they favor or oppose the Islamic Republic regime, it is the duty of each honorable and patriotic Iranian to defend his national borders and refrain from cooperating with the enemy under any condition. Those who act otherwise have betrayed their country and they shall be remembered as "Quislings" and "Lavals" of Iran.
